About the death of pope Hildebrand (or not long after) followed the death of king William conqueror, in the yer 1090. after he had raigned in England the space of one and twenty yeres, and ten moneths. The cause of his sickenesse and death is said to be this: for that Philip the French king vpon a time (iesting) said that king William lay in childbed and nourished his fat belly. With this the foresaid William hearing thereof, answered again, and said, when he should be churched, he would offer a thousand candles to him in France, wherewithall the king should haue little to do. Whereupon king William in the moneth of July (when the corne, fruit, and grapes were most flourishing) entred into France, and set on fire many cities and townes in the west side of France. And lastly, comming to the city of Meaux, where hee burning a woman being as a recluse in a wall inclosed (or as some say, two men anachorits inclosed) was so feruent and furious about the fire, that with the heat partly of the fire, partly of the time of the yere, thereby he fell into sickenesse and died vpon the same.

By the life and acts of this king it may appeare true, as stories of him report, that he was wise, but guilefull; rich, but couetous; a faire speaker, but a great dissembler; glorious in outward and strong in armes, but rigorous in oppressing whom he ouercame, in leuying of taxes pilling all others. Insomuch that he caused to be inrolled and numbred in his treasury euerie side of land, and owner thereof: what fruit and reuenewes surmounted of euery lordship, of euery township, castell, village, field, riuer, and wood, within all the realme of England. Moreouer, how many parish churches, how many liuing cattell there were, what and how much euery baron in the realme could dispend, what fees were belonging, what wages were taken, &c. The tenor and contents of which testament yet remaineth in rols. After this taking or numbring, which was the yere before his death, followed an exceeding murren of cattell, and barrennesse of the ground, with much pestilence and hot feuers among the people, so that such as escaped the feuer, were consumed with famin. Moreouer, at the same season appeared many certaine other cities, a great part of the city of London, with the church of Pauls was walled with fire, in the yere of our Lord 1085.

In hunting and in parks the foresaid king had such pleasure, that in the country of Southhampton by the space of 30 miles, he cast downe churches and townships, and there made the new forrest, louing his Deere so dearly, as though hee had beene to them a father, making sharpe lawes for the preseruing thereof, vnder paine of losing both the eies. So hard he was to Englishmen, and so fauorable to his owne country, that as there was no English bishop remaining, but onely Wolstan of Worcester, who being commanded of the king and Lanfranke to resigne vp his staffe, partly for inability, partly for lacke of the French tongue, refused otherwise to resigne it, but only to him that gaue it, and so went to the tombe of king Edward, there he thought to resigne it, but was permitted to inioy it still: so likewise in his daies, there was almost no Englishman that bare office of honor or rule in the land. In so much that it was halfe a thanne at y time to be called an Englishman. Notwithstanding hee some deale fauored the city of London, and granted vnto the citizens the first charter that euer they had, written in the Saxon, with greene wax sealed, and contained in few lines.

England peaceable from thence vp.

Among his other conditions, this in him is noted, that so giuen he was to peace and quiet, that any maiden being laden with gold or siluer might passe through the whole realme without harme or resistance. This William in his time builded two monasteries, one in England at Battell in Sussex, where he wan the field against Harold, called the abby of Battell: another besides named Warmoundsey in his countrie of Normandy.

The abby of Battell. The abby of Warmoundsay.

After the life and story of king William thus briefly described, (with the acts and order of battell betweene him and king Harold (although much more might haue bin written of that matter, if the booke had come sooner to my hands, which afterwards I saw) now remaineth in the end of this story to describe the names of such barons & nobles of Normandy, which entred with him into this land, as well of them which were imbarked with him, and slaine also (as appeareth in the battell) as also of them who were planted and aduanced by the said Conquerer in the lands and possessions of English lords, whom he either expelled, or else beheaded. The names of which Normans here follow vnder written.

Out of the annals of Normandy in French, whereof one very ancient written booke in parchment remaineth in the custody of the writer hereof.

THe day after the battell, very early in the morning, Odo bishop of Baieux sang masse for those that were departed. The duke after that desirous to know the estate of his battell, and what people he had therein left and were slaine, he caused to come vnto him a clerke that had written their names when they were imbarked at S. Valeries, and commanded him to call them all by their names, who called them that had bin at the battell, & had passed the seas with duke William. And hereafter follow their names.

Duer and besides the great number of knights and esquires that were vnder them. In the same battell betweene the said William the bastard, duke of Normandy on the one part, and king Harold on the other part, there were slain on king Harolds side of Englishmen, 66654. And on duke Williams side there were slaine 6013 men, as it is to be found in the chronicles of S. Peter of Westminster, besides those that were drowned in the riuer of Thames.

Whsenas the aboue named and many other great lords were so called, some of them appeared, other some did not, for some of them were slaine there in the field, and others so wounded, that they could not come forth to shew themselues. Then gaue the duke commandement, that the dead should be buried; and those that were sicke comforted and eased the best that might be, &c.

A little aboue, mention was made of the bishops sea of Shirebourne, translated from thence to Salisbury. The first bishop of Salisbury was Hirmannus a Norman, who first began the new church and minster of Salisbury. After whom succeeded Osmundus, who finished the worke, and replenished the house with great liuing, and much good singing. This Osmundus first began the ordinary which was called Secundum vsum Sarum, An. 1076. The occasion whereof was this, as I find in an old story booke intituled Eulogium. A great contention chanced at Glastenbury betweene Thurstanus the abbat and his conuent, in the daies of William Conqueror. Which Thurstanus the said William had brought out of Normandy from the abby of Cadonum, and placed him abbat of Glastenbury. The cause of this contentious battell was, for that Thurstanus contemning their quier seruice, then called the vse of Saint Gregory, compelled his monks to the vse of one William a monke of Fiscam in Normandy. Whereupon came strife and contentions amongst them, first in words, then from words to blowes, after blowes then to armor. The abbat with his gard of harnest men, fell vpon the monks, and drawe them to the steps of the high altar, where two were slaine, eight were wounded with shafts, swords, and pikes. The monks then driuen to such a strait and narrow shift, were compelled to defend themselues with formes and candlesticks, wherewith they did wound certaine of the souldiors. One monke there was (an aged man) who in stead of his shield, take an image of the crucifix in his armes for his defence, which image was wounded in the breast by one of the bow-men, whereby the monke was saued. My story addeth more, that the striker incontinent vpon the same fell mad: which fauoreth of some miracle in addition betweene the text. This matter being brought before the king, the abbat was sent againe to Cadonum, and the monks by the commandement of the king were scattered in far countries. Thus by the occasion hereof, Osmundus bishop of Salisbury deuised that ordinary, which is called the vse of Sarum, and was afterward receiued in a manner through all England, Ireland and Wales. And thus much for this matter, done in the time of this king William.

The first bishop of Salisbury. Osmund bishop of Sarum. Ordinale ecclesiasticæ officij secundum vsum Sarum. Ex Eulogio historiar. lib. 1. The vse and ordinary of Sarum, how and when it was deuised.

Which William after his death by his wife Matildis or Maud, left three sonnes, Robert Courtheise, to whom he gaue the dutchy of Normandy; William Rufus his second sonne, to whom he gaue the kingdome of England; and Henry the third sonne, to whom hee left and gaue treasure, and inioined William to be to his people louing and liberall, Robert to be to his people sterne and sturdy.

In the history called Iornalensis, is reported of a certaine great man, who about this time of king William was compassed about with mice and rats, and flying to the midst of a riuer, yet when that would not serue, came to the land againe, and was of them deuoured. The Germans say that this was a bishop, who dwelling betweene Cullen and Mentz, in time of famin and dearth, hauing store of corne and graine, would not helpe the pouerty crying to him for reliefe, but rather wished his corne to be eaten vp of mice and rats. Wherefore being compassed with mice and rats (by the iust iudgement of God) to auoid the annoiance of them, he builded a tower in the midst of the riuer of Rheine (which yet to this day the Dutchmen call Rats tower) but all that would not helpe, for the rats and mice swam ouer to him in as great abundance as they did before, of whom at length he was deuoured.

Example of Gods iust iudgement vpon a bishop, who being vnmercifull to the poore, was eaten with rats and mice.

William Rufus.

WIlliam Rufus, the second son of William Conquerour, began his raigne in the yeere of our Lord 1088, and raigned thirteene yeeres, being crowned at Westminster by Lanfrancus, who after his coronation, released out of prison by the request of his father, diuers of the English lords, which before had been in culloby. It chanced that at the death of William Conquerour, Robert Courtheise his eldest sonne was absent in Almanie; who hearing of the death of his father, and how William his younger brother had taken vpon him the kingdome, was therewith greatly moued, in so much that he laid his dukedome to pledge vnto his brother Henry, and with that good gathered vnto him an army, and so landed at Hampton, to the intent to haue expelled his brother from the kingdome. But William Rufus hearing thereof, sent to him faire and gentle words, promising him dedition and subiection, as to the more worthy and elder brother; this thing only requiring, that being he was stoln in place and possession, he might inioy it during his life, paying to him yeerely three thousand markes, with condition; that which of them ouerliued the other, should inioy the kingdome. The occasion of this variance betweene these brethren, brought a great dissention betweene the Norman lords and bishops, both in England and in Normandy. In so much that all the Norman bishops within the realme almost rebelled against the king, taking part with duke Robert, except onely Lanfrancus, and Wolstan bishop of Worcester, before mentioned, an Englishman, who for his vertue and constancie was so well liked and fauoured of his citizens, that (emboldened with his presence and prayer) they stoutly maintained the citie of Worcester against the siege of their enemies, and at last banquished them with vtter ruine. But duke Robert at length by the aduice of his counsell (hearing the words sent vnto him, and wagging his head thereat, as one conceiuing some matter of doubt or doublenesse) was yet content to assent to all that was desired, and so returned shortly after into Normandy, leauing the bishops and such others in the byers, which were in England taking his part against the king.

Wolstan bishop of Worcester.

This Rufus was so ill liked of the Normans, that betweene him and his lords was oft dissention. Wherefore (well neere) all the Normans tooke part against him; so that he was forced of necessitie to draw to him the Englishmen. Against so couetous he was, and so vnmeasurable in his talks and takings, in selling benefices, abbies and bishoprickes, that he was hated of all Englishmen.

In the third yeere of this king, died Lanfrancus archbishop of Canturbury; from whose commendation and worthinesse, as I list not to detract any thing (being so greatly magnified of Polydorus his countryman) so neither doe I see any great cause why to adde any thing thereto. This I thinke, vnlesse that man had brought with him lesse superstition, and more sincere science into Christ his church, he might haue kept him in his country still, and haue confuted Berengarius at home. After the decease of Lanfranke, the seat of Canterbury stood empty foure yeeres.

Anno 1091 The death of Lanfrancus archbishop of Canterbury.

After the counsell of Lanfrancus aboue mentioned, there in was concluded to translating of bishops seas, from villages into head cities; Remigius bishop of Dorchester, who (as ye heard companied Lanfrancus vnto Rome) remoued his bishops seat from Dorchester vnto Lincolne, where he builded the minster there situate vpon an hill within the said citie of Lincolne. The dedication of which church, Robert archbishop of Yorke did refuse, saying, that it was builded within the ground of his precinct. But after, it had his Romish dedication by Robert Meuet, next bishop that followed. By the same Remigius also was founded the cloister or monasterie of Stow, &c.

Remigius bishop of Lincolne.

Lincolne minster builded.

Stow abby builded.

In the fourth yeere of this king, great tempests fell in sundry places of England, specially at Winchcombe, where the steeple was burned with lightning, the church wall burst thorow, the head and right leg of the crucifix, with the image of our lady on the right side of the crucifix throwne downe, and such a clink left in the church, that none might abide it. At London the force of the weather and tempest ouerturned fiue hundred houses. In which tempest the roofe of Bowchurch was hurled vp in the wind, and by the vehemencie thereof was pitched downe a great depnesse into the ground.

Anno 1092 Winchcombz steeple burnt with lightning. The hundred houses blowne downe with wind. The roofe of Bow-church ouerthrowne.

King William (as ye haue heard, an ouerdoing potter, or rauener rather of church goods) after hee had giuen the bishopricke of Lincolne to his chancellor Robert Meuet (aboue mentioned) began to enuill, auouching the sea of Lincolne to belong to the sea of Yorke, till the bishop of Lincolne had pleased him with a great sum of money of fiue thousand marks, &c.

Robert Meuet paid fiue thousand marks for his bishoprick. Herbert Losinga bishop of Norwich. Losinga i. adulator.

And as nothing could come in those daies without money from the king; so Herbert Losinga, paying to the king a piece of money, was made bishop of Thetford, as he had paid a little before to bee abbat of Ramsey. Who likewise the same time remouing his seat from Thetford to the citie of Norwich, there erected the cathedrall church with the cloister in the said citie of Norwich, where he furnished the monks with sufficient liuing and rents of his owne charges, besides the bishops lands. Afterward, repenting of his open and manifest simony, he went to Rome, where hee resigned into the popes hands his bishopricke but so, that incontinent he receiued it againe. This Herbert was the sonne of an abbat called Robert, for whom he purchased of the king to be bishop of Winchester, whereof rose these verses:

Filius est presul, pater abba, Simeon vtrique:
Quid non speremus si nummos possideamus?
Omnia nummus habet, quod vult facit, addit & aufert,
Res nimis iniusta, nummus sit presul & abba, &c.

Pope Victor the third.

He heard a little before of the death of pope Hildebrand, after the time of which Hildebrand, the Germaine emperor did graunt to lese their authority and right in the popes election, and in giuing of benefices. For next after this Hildebrand, came pope Victor by the setting vp of Matilda, and the duke of Normandy, with the faction and retinue of Hildebrand, who likewise shewed himselfe stout against the emperour. But God gaue the Emperour ouer thorow his enemies.

Pope Victor poisoned in his chalice.

Pope Victor (as some say in his chalice,) sate but one yeere and a halfe. Notwithstanding the same imitation and example of Hildebrand continued still in them that followed after. And like as the kings of Israel followed most part the steps of Ieroboam, till the time of their desolation: so for the greatest sort all popes followed the steps and proceedings of this Hildebrand their spirituall Ieroboam, in maintaining of false worship, and chiefly in vpholding the dignity of that sea, against all rightfull authority, and the lawfull kingdome of Sion. In the time of this Victor, began the order of the monks of Charterhouse, through the meanes of one Hugo bishop of Gracionople, and of Bruno bishop of Cullen.

A comparison betweene Hildebrand pope of Rome, and Ieroboam king of Israel.

The order of Charterhouse monks began.

Next to Victor sat Urban the second, by whom the acts of Hildebrand were confirmed, and also new decrees enacted against Henry the emperor. In this time were two popes at Rome, Urbanus and Clemens the third, whom the emperor set vp. Vnder pope Urban came in the white monks of Cistercian order, by one Stephan Harding a monke of Shirebourne, (an Englishman) by whom this order had his beginning in the wildernesse of Cistercy, within the prouince of Burgoyne, as witnesseth Cestrensis. Others write that this Harding was the second abbat of that place, & that it was first founded by the means of one Robert abbat of Molisme in Cestercium, a forrest in Burgundy, Anno 1098, (perswaded perchance by Harding) and afterwards in the yeere of our Lord 1135, it was brought into England by a certaine man called Speke, which builded an abbie of the same order called Perinale. In this order the monks did liue by the labor of their hands; they paid no tithes nor offerings, they wore no fur nor lining, they wore red hoses, their coules white, and cotes blacke, all vpon the same a little circle, they eat no flesh but only in their iourny. Of this order was Bernardus, &c.

Pope Urban the second.

Two popes in Rome.

The order of Cistercian or white monks began.

This Urban held diuers councels; one at Rome, where he excommunicated all such lay persons as gaue inuestiture of any ecclesiasticall benefice. Also all such of the clergy as abiected themselues to be vnderlings or seruants to lay persons or ecclesiasticall benefices, &c.

Synodus Romana vel Placentina.

Another councell he held at Clermount in France, there among other things, the bishop made an oration to the lords being there present, concerning the voyage and recouring of the holy land from the Turkes and Saracens. The cause of which voyage first sprang by one Peter a monk or hermit, who being in Jerusalem, and seeing the great misery of the christians vnder the Pagans, made thereof declaration to pope Urban, and was therein a great solicitor to all christian princes. Wherevpon therefore, after the foresaid oration of pope Urban, 30000 men (taking on them the signe of the crosse for their cognisance) made preparation for that voyage, whose captaines were Godfrey duke of Loraine, with his two brethren, Eustace and Baldwine, the bishop of Pody, Bohemund duke of Puell and his nephew Tancredus, Raimund earle of Saint Egidius, Robert earle of Flanders, and Hugh le Grand, brother of Philip the French king. To whom also was ioined Robert Curthoise duke of Normandy, with diuers other noble men, with the foresaid Peter the hermit, who was the chiefe causer of that voyage.

At that time many of the said noble men laid their lands and lordships to mortgage to prouide for the forenamed voiage; as Godfrey duke of Loraine, who sold the dukedome of Bollogne to the bishop of Eburone for a great sum of money. Also Robert Curthoise duke of Normandy, laid his dukedome to pledge to his brother William king of England for ten thousand pounds, &c.

Thus the christians, which passed first ouer Bosphorus, hauing to their captaine Peter the hermit (a man perchance more deuout then expert to guide an armie) being trapped of their enemies, were slaine and murthered in great numbers among the Bulgars, and were to the towne called Ciuitus.

The acts of the christians in their voyage to win Hierusalem.

When the nobles and the whole army met together at Constantinople, there Alexius was emperor; passing ouer by Hellespontus going to Hierusalem, they take the cities of Nicea, Epesela, Tarsis, and subdued the country of Cicilia, appointing the possession thereof to certaine of their captaines.

Antioch was besieged, and in the ninth month of the siege, it was yeelded to the christians by one Pyrrhus; about which season were fought many strong battels, to the great slaughter and desolation of the Saracens, and not without losse of many christian men. The gouernance of this citie was committed to Bohemund duke of Puell, whose martiall knighthood was often proued in time of the siege thereof.

And not long after, Corbran maister of the Persians chiualry was vanquished and slaine, with an hundred thousand infidels. In which discomfiture were taken 15000 camels.

Anno 1098

Hierusalem on the nine and thirtith day of the siege, was conquered by the christians. Robert also duke of Normandy was elect to be king thereof. Howbeit he refused it, hearing of the death of king William Rufus of England; wherefore hee neuer sped in all his affaires well after the same. Then Godfrey, captaine of the christian army, was proclaimed the first King of Hierusalem. At the taking of the citie was such such a murther of men, that blood was congealed in the streat the thicknesse of a knife. Then after Godfrey raigned Baldwin his brother. After him Baldwin the second nephew. Then Gaufridus duke of Gaunt, and after him Gaufridus his sonne, by whom many great battels there were fought against the Saracens, and all the country thereabout subdued, saue Ascalon, &c. And thus much hitherto touching the voiage to the holy land. Now to our owne land againe.

About this time (as Matt. Parisiensis writeth) the king of England fauored not much the see of Rome, because of their impudent and insatiable exactions which they required, neither would he suffer any of his subiects to goe to Rome, alleaging these words in the author thus expressed: Quòd Petri non inhærent vestigijs, præmijs inhiantes; non eius potestatem retinent, cuius sanctitatem probantur non imitari: that is, Because they follow not the steps of Peter, hunting for rewards; neither haue they the power and authority of him, whose holinesse they declare themselues not to follow, &c.

In the first yere of this kings raigne, Malcolme king of Scots, which foure times before had made great slaughter of old and young in the north parts, as is before theined, burst into Northumberland with all the power hee could make, and there by the right iudgement of God was slaine with his son Edward, and also Margaret his wife, sister to Edgar Adeling aboue minded, a vertuous and deuout lady, within three daies after.

Exampl of Gods rightfull iudgement in punishing cruel murther.

The same yere he gaue the archbishopsick of Canterbury (after that hee had detained the same in his owne hands foure yeres) to Anselme abbat of Becke in Normandy.

Anselme made archbishop of Canterbury.

This Anselme was an Italian, in the citie of Augusta borne, and brought vp in the abbie of Becke in Normandie: where he was so strict a follower of vertue, that (as the storie recordeth) he wished rather to be without sin in hell, then in heauen with sin. Which saying and wish of his (if it were his) may seeme to proceed out of a mind, neither speaking orderly according to the phrase and vnderstanding of the scripture, nor yet sufficiently acquainted with the iustification of a christian man. Further, they report him to be so far from singularitie, that he should say, it was the vice which thrust the angels first out of heauen, and man out of paradise.

The saying of Anselme pondered.

The vice of singularity.

Of this Anselme it is moreouer reported, that he was so ill willing to take the archbishopsicke, that the king had much adoe to thrust it vpon him: and was so desirous to haue him take it, that the city of Canterbury (which before Lanfrancus did hold but at the kings good will and pleasure) he gaue now to Anselme wholly, which was about the yere of our Lord 1093. But as desirous as the king was then to place the said Anselme, so much did he repent it afterward, seeking all maner of meanes to defeat him if he might. Such strife and contention rose betweene them two for certaine matters, the ground and occasion whereof first was this:

Anselme ill willing to take the archbishopsicke. Canterbury first giuen to the archbishop wholly. Strife and contention betweene the king and Anselme.

After that Anselme had been thus elected to the sea of Canterbury, before he was fully consecrate, the king communed with him (allaying by all gentle maner of words to intreat him) that such landes & possessions of the church of Canterbury as the king had giuen & granted to his friends since the death of Lanfrancus, they might still inioy the same, as their owne lawfull possessions, through his grant and permission. But to this Anselme in no case would agree. Whereupon the king conceiuing great displeasure against him, did stop his consecration a great season, till at length in long processe of time, the king inforced by the daily complaints and desires of his people and subiects for lacke of an archbishop to moderat the church, was constrained to admit and authorize him vnto them. Thus Anselme with much adoe, taking his consecration, and doing his homage to the king, went to his sea of Canterbury. And not long after, the king sailed ouer to Normandy.

Anselme stopped from his consecration.

Anselme consecrated.

Anselme doth homage to king William.

About this time there were two striuing in Rome for the popedome, as is afore touched, Urbanus and Guibertus. Diuers realmes diuerslie consenting, some to the one, some to the other. England taking part with their king, was rather inclined to Guibertus, called Clement the third: but Anselme did fully goe with Urbanus, making to his reception with the king, entring to his bishoppicke. After the king was returned againe from Normandy, the archbishop commeth to him, and asketh leaue to goe to Rome, to set his pall of pope Urban: which when he could not at first obtaine, he maketh his appeale from the king to the pope. Whereat the king being luckily displeased, chargeth the archbishop with breach of his fealty, contrary to his promise made: that is, if hee without his licence, would appeale either to Urban or to any other pope. Anselme answereth againe, that it was to be referred vnto some greater councell, where it is to be disputed, whether this be to breake a mans allegiance to a terrene prince, if he appeal to the vicar of saint Peter. And here much arguing and contending was on both sides. The kings reason procedeth thus: The custome (saith he) from my fathers time hath been in England, that no person should appeale to the pope without the kings licence. Hee that breaketh the customes of the realme, violateth the power & crowne of the kingdom. He that violateth and taketh away my crowne, is a traitor & enemy against me, &c. To this Anselme replieth againe; The Lord (saith he) easily discussith this question, hytelly teaching what fidelity and allegiance we ought to giue vnto the vicar of S. Peter, where he saith; Thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke will I build my church, &c. And to thee I will giue the keies of the kingdome of heauen, and whatsoeuer thou shalt bind in earth, it shall be bound in heauen; and whatsoeuer thou lossest in earth, shall be loosed in heauen, &c. Againe, to them all in generall he saith; He that heareth you heareth me, and who despiseth you despiseth me. And in another place; He that toucheth you, toucheth the apple of mine eye. On the other side, what duty we owe to the king, he himself also; Giue (saith he) to the emperor, what belongeth to the emperor, and to God, giue that to God belongeth. Wherefore in such things as belong to God, I will yeeld, and must yeeld by godright and duty, my obedience to the vicar of saint Peter; and in such things as belong againe to terrene dignities of my prince, in those I will not denie to him my faithfull helpe and counsell, so far as they can extend.

Anselme here ignorantly called by the king, the vicar of S. Peter, where the canon law calleth him but the successor of Peter, and vicar of Christ.

Anselme requireth to go to Rome without the kings leuing.

Thus haue ye the grounded arguments of this prelat, to stand to stiffe against his prince, thereunto peraduenture was ioined also some peece of a stubborne heart. But in this conclusion, none of his fellow bishops durst take his part, but were all against him: namely, William bishop of Duresme, to whom Anselme thus protesteth, saying: Wholoeuer he were that would presume to proue it any breach of allegiance of fealty to his soueraigne, if he appealed to the vicar of saint Peter, he was ready to answere at all times to the contrary. The bishop of Duresme answering againe, that hee which would not be ruled by reason, must with force be constrained, &c. The king hauing on his part the agreement of the bishops, thought to depriue the archbishop both of his pall, and see, and to expell him out of the realme. But he could not performe his purpose; for Anselme as he was ready to depart the realme, he said, whensoeuer he went, he would take his office and authority with him, though he tooke nothing else. Whereupon that matter was deferred till a longer time. In the meane season the king had sent priuily two messengers vnto pope Urban, to intreat him to send his pall to the king, for him to giue it where he would. Which messengers by this time were returned againe, bringing with them from Rome Gualter bishop of Alban the popes legat, with the pall to bee giuen vnto Anselme. This legat first landing at Douer, from thence came priuily (vnknowne to Anselme) to the king, declaring and promising, that if Urban was receiued pope of England, whatsoeuer the king required to be obtained, he by his priuilege from the apostolicall sea would ratifie and confirme the same: saue onely that when the king required of the legat that Anselme might be remoued, the legat thereunto would not agree, saying that it was vnpossible to be obtained, that such a man as he being lawfully called, should be expelled without manifest cause. In conclusion, so it followed, that although he could not obtaine his request of the legat, yet the legat brought to with the king, that Urban was proclaimed lawfull pope throughout all the realme.

All the bishops of the Realme stood of the kings side against Anselme, William bishop of Duresme.

Gualterus the popes legat commeth to England.

Anselme could not be remoued by the king.

The pope priuely ratifieth some fault, for a subiect to repugne against his king.

Then were sent to Anselme certaine bishops to moue and proue his mind, declaring what charges and paines the king had been at in his behalfe, to procure the pall for him from Rome, which otherwise would haue stood him in great expences, & that all this the king had done for his sake. Wherefore if it were good reason and conuenient, that he (to gratifie the king) should something condescend to his request againe. But with all this Anselme the stout archbishop would not bee moued. Wherefore the king seeing none other remedy, was compelled to grant vnto him the full right of his archbishopsicke. And so the day appointed when the pall should be brought to Canterbury, being carried with all solemnity in a thing of siluer, the archbishop with a great concourse of people, came forth here vnto with his priestly vestiments, after a most goodly maner to meet the same: and so being brought in, was laid vpon the altar, whilest Anselme (spreading ouer his shoulders his popish vestiments) proceeded vnto his popish masse.

Thus

Thus agreement being made betweene the king and the bishop, so long as it would hold, it happened the peare following, the king with his armie entred into Wales, to subdue such as there rebelled against him. After the victorie gotten, the king returned home againe with triumph, to whom Anselme thought to haue come to congratulate his prosperous successe. But the king preuented him by messengers, laying to the bishops charge both the small number and euill seruice of his souldiers sent to him at his need. At the hearing hereof, all the hope of Anselme was dasht, who at the same present had thought to haue obtained and done many great matters with the king touching the state of the church. But here all turned contrarie to his expectation: insomuch that hee was charged against the next court of parliament, to make his answere. But he auoided that by appealing to Rome. Wherefore he made his sute and friends to the king for licence to goe to the pope. Vnto the which sute the king answered againe, that hee should not goe, neither was there any cause for him so to doe, for that both hee knew him to be of so sound a life, that hee had done no such offence, whereof he needed to craue absolution at Rome, neither was there any such lacke of science and knowledge, that he needed to borrow any counsell there: Insomuch (saith the king) I dare say, pope Urban rather hath to giue place to the wisedome of Anselme, then Anselme to haue need of Urban. Wherefore as he hath no cause to go, so I charge him to tarrie. And if he continue in his disobedience still, I will assuredly seize vpon his possessions, and conuert his archbishopsike into my coffers: for that hee transgressedly and breaketh his fidelitie and obeysance, promising before to obserue all the customs of my kingdome. Neither is it the fashion in this realme, that any of my nobles should goe to Rome without my sending. And therfore let him sweare vnto me, that he shall neither for any greeuance appeale hereafter to the see of Rome, or else let him void my realme.

The reasons of Anselme to proue the popes authority about other kings.

Anselme here ignorantly called by the king, the vicar of S. Peter, where the canon law calleth him but the successor of Peter, and vicar of Christ.

Anselme requireth to go to Rome without the kings leuing.

Against these words of the king, Anselme thinking not best to replie againe by any message, but by word of mouth, comming himselfe personally to the king, placeth himselfe (after his order) on the right hand of the prince, where he made his replie vnto the message sent to him by the king. Whereas you say I ought not to goe to Rome either for lacke of any trespasse, or for abundance of counsell and knowledge in me (albeit I grant to neither of them as true) yet what the truth is therein, I refer it to the iudgement of God. And whereas yee say that I promised to keepe and obserue your customs: that I grant, but with a condition: so far to keepe them, and such of them to obserue, as were consonant to the lawes of God, and ruled with right and equitie. Moreouer, whereas ye charge me with breach of my fidelitie and allegiance, so that contrarie to your customs I appeale to the see of Rome (my reuerence and dutie to your soueraigntie reserued) if another would say it, that is vntrue. For the fidelitie and obeysance that I owe to thee (O king) I haue it of the faith and fidelitie of God, whose vicar S. Peter is, to whose seate I do appeale. Further, where as ye require me to sweare, that I shall for no cause hereafter at any time appeale to Rome: I pronounce openly that a christian prince requireth such an oth of his archbishop vnlawfully. For if I should forsweare S. Peter, I should denie Christ. And when I shall at any time denie Christ, then shall I bee content and readie to stand to the satisfaction of my transgression to you, for asking licence to go to Rome. And peraduenture when I am gone, the goods of the church shall not so serue your temporall desires and commodities as ye weene for. At these words of the bishop, the king and his nobles were not a little incensed: defending againe, that in obseruing the kings customs, there was neither condition nor any clause put in, either of God or right. No was I said Anselme. If so be that in your customs was neither mention made of God nor of right, whereof was there mention then? For God forbid that any christian should be bound to any customs which goe contrarie to God and to right. Thus on both sides passed much altercation betweene them.

Note the high reasons of Anselme.

The bishops late Anselme alone.

Anselme fleeing out of England.

Anselme searched by the kings officers for letters.

At length the king, after many threatning words, told him hee should carrie nothing out of the realme with him. Well said the bishop, if I may neither haue my horse nor garments with me, then will I walke on foot, and so addressed him toward his iourney (all the other bishops forsaking him) whereof none would take his part: but if hee came to them for counsell, they said he was wise enough, and needed not their counsell, as who for his prudence knew best what was to be done, as also for his holines was willing and able to persecute the same that he did know. As for them, they neither durst nor would stand against the king their lord; whose fauor they could not lacke, for the perill that might happen both to themselues & to their kindred. But for him because hee was both a stranger, and void of such worldly corruption in him: they willed him to go forward as he had begun. their secret consent he should haue, but their open voice they would not giue him. Thus Anselme remaining at Douer sixteene daies tarrying for wind, at last sped him toward his passage. But his packing being secretly knowne in the court, the kings officer, William Warriwast, preuented his purpose, searching by the kings commandement al his trusses, coffers, fatchels, sleeues, purse, napkin, and bosome for letters, and for money, and so let him passe. Who sailing into France, first rested a while at Lions, from thence came to Rome to Pope Urban, according to the tenor and forme of acertaine epistle of his, wherein among many other things in the same epistle contained: these words he writeth to pope Paschalis, the third yere after his banishment, after the death of Urban, and a little before the death of the king.

To the lord and reuerend father Paschalis,

high bishop, Anselme seruant of the church of Canturburie offreth due subiection from his heart, and prayers, if they can stand in any stead.

Ex epist 36. paulo post initium.

I See in England many euils, whose correction belongeth to me, and such I could neither amend, nor suffer without mine owne fault. The king desireth of me, that vnder the name of right I should consent to his pleasures, which were against the law and will of God. For he would not haue the pope receiued nor appealed vnto in England, without his commandement; neither that I should send a letter vnto him, or receiue any from him, or that I should obey his decrees. He suffered not a councell to be kept in his realme now these thirteene yeares, since he was king. In all these things and such like, if I asked any counsell, all my suffragan bishops of his realme, denied to giue me any counsell, but according to the kings pleasure. After that I saw these and such other things that are done against the will and law of God: I asked licence of him to goe to Rome, vnto the see apostolicall, that I might there take counsell for my soule, and the office committed vnto me. The king said that I offended against him for the onely asking of licence; and propounded to me, that either I should make him amends for the same as a trespasse (asserting him neuer to aske his licence any more to appeale to the pope at any time hereafter) or else that I should quickly depart out of his land. Wherefore chusing rather to goe out of the land then to agree to so wicked a thing, I came to Rome as you know, and declared the whole matter to the holy pope. The king by and by as same as I went out of England, inuaded the whole archbishoprike, and turned it to his owne vse, hauing the monks only with bare meate, drinke and cloth. The king being warned and desired of the holy pope to amend this, contemned the same, and yet continueth in his purpose still. And now is the third peare since I came thus out of England, and more. Some men not vnderstanding, demand why I did not excommunicate the king. But the wiser sort, and such as haue vnderstanding, counsell me that I do not this thing: because it belongeth not vnto me both to complaine and to punish. To conclude, I was forewarned by my friends that are vnder the king, that mine excommunication (if it should bee done) would bee laughed to scorne and despised, &c.

A fragment as portion of a letter of Anselme to pope Paschalis.

Ex legenda Anf. aut Edmero, ex epist. Anselm. 36.

The king would not haue the pope receiued nor appealed vnto in England.

Anselme complaineth of the king and of his suffragan bishops.

The king contemneth the popes warning.

By these here aboue prefixed, appeareth how Anselme the archbishop comming vnto Rome, made his complaint to pope Urban of the king: and how the pope writing vnto the king in the behalfe of Anselme, his letters and commandements were despised. And now to our storie. In the meane time, while the popes letters were sent to the king, Anselme was bid to waite about the pope to take his answere backe. Who perceiuing at length, how little the king reputed the popes letters, began to be wearie of his office, desiring the pope that he might be discharged thereof: but the pope in no case would thereto consent, charging him vpon his obedience, that wheresoeuer hee went, he should beare with him the name and honor of the archbishop of Canturburie. Whereunto Anselme againe said, his obedience he neither durst nor would refuse, as who for Gods cause was readie to suffer whatsoeuer should happen (yea though it were death it selfe) as hee thought not lesse would follow thereof. But what should we thinke (saith he) is there to be done, where not onely iustice taketh no place, but is vtterly oppressed? And whereas my suffragans not onely doe not helpe (for dread) the righteous cause, but also for fauor doe impugne the same? What (saith the pope) as touching these matters, wee shall sufficiently prouide for at the next councell to be holden at Vaion, whereas I will you the same time and place to bee present.

Concilium Baionense.

When the time of the councell was come, Anselme amongst others was called for, who first sitting in an vtter side of the bishops, afterwards was placed at the right foot of the pope, with these words: Includamus hunc in orbe nostro tanquam alterius orbis papam. Whereupon the same place after him was appointed to the successors of the see of Canturburie, in euery generall councell by the decree of pope Urban, to sit at the right foot of the pope. In this said councell great strife and much reasoning there was against the Grecians, concerning the matter and order of proceeding of the holy Ghost. Where is to be noted, that the Greeke church hath of long time differed from the Latine church in many and sundrie points, to the number of twentie, or almost 29 articles, as I haue them collected out of the register of the church of Hereford: whereof like as occasion hereafter may serue (God willing) for a further ther and more ample tractation to be made: to here by the way partly I meane to touch some. The first is,

Anselme and his successors of Canturburie placed at the right foot of the pope in his generall councels.

The difference betweene the Greeke church and the Latine.

Wherein the Greeke church differeth from the Latine.

Extreme rites of christianitie.

THe first article wherein the Greeke church altereth from the Latine or Romish church is this: Quod sicut extra obedientiam Romani ecclesiæ pro eo quod ecclesia Constantinopolitana non est subiecta, sed æqualis. 1. Dicunt dominum apostolicum non habere maiorem potestatem, quam quilibet patriarcha. Et quicquid sit prater scientiam eorum per papam, vel pro eorum approbatione conditum est vitiosis, &c. In English.

First they are not vnder the obedience of the church of Rome, because that the church of Constantinople is not subiect, but equall to the same.

The articles of difference betweene the Greeke church and the Latine church of Rome.

2 They hold that the bishop of the apostolike see of Rome, hath not greater power then the foure patriarchs. And what soeuer the pope doth beside their knowledge, or without their approbation, it is of no valor.

3 Item, they say whatsoeuer hath been done or concluded since the second generall councell, is of no full authoritie, because from that time they recount the Latins to bee in error, and to be excluded out of the holy church.

4 Item, Dicunt eucharistiam confectam per Romanam ecclesiam non esse verum corpus Christi. That is: They hold the eucharist consecrated by the church of Rome, not to bee the very body of Christ. Also where the Romish church doth consecrate in vnleauened bread, they consecrate in bread leauened.

5 Item, they say that the Romish church doth erre in the words of baptisme, for saying, I baptize thee: when they should say, Let this creature of God be baptized, &c.

6 They hold moreouer, to bee no purgatorie, nor that the suffrages of y church do auaile the dead, either to lessen the paine of them that be detained to hell, or to increase the glory of them that be ordained to saluation.

7 Item, they hold that the soules out of the bodies departed whether they haue done good or euil) haue not their perfect paine, or glorie: but are reserued in a certaine place, till the day of iudgement.

8 Item, they condemne the church of Rome, for mixing cold water in their sacrifice.

9 Item, they condemne the church of Rome, for that as well women as priests annoint children (when they baptise them) on both shoulders.

10 Item, Dicunt panem nostrum panagiam. That is, They call our bread Panagia.

11 Item, they blame the church of Rome for celebrating their masse on other daies besides sundaies, and certaine other festiuals appointed.

12 Also in this the Greeke church varieth from the Latine, for they haue neither creame, nor oyle, nor sacrament of confirmation.

13 Neither do they vse extreme vnction, or anoiling after the manner of the Roman church, expounding the place of S. Iames of the spirituall infirmitie, and not corporall.

14 Item, they vnnome no satisfaction for penance, but only that they shew themselues to the priests annointing them with simple oyle in token of remission of sinnes.

15 Item, only on maundie thursday they consecrate for the sicke, keeping it for the whole yeare after, thinking it to be more holy on that day consecrated, then vpon any other. Neither do they fast any saturday through the whole yeare, but only on Easter euen.

16 Item, they giue but onely fiue orders, as of clerks, subdeacons, deacons, priests, and bishops; when as the Romane church giueth nine orders, after the nine orders of angels.

People here found to want somewhat.

17 Moreouer, the Grecians in their orders make no vow of chastitie, alleging for them the testimonie of S. ℣ Ego presbyter vel diaconus, vxorem habens castè nos regimen, &c. That is: I N. priest or deacon will not forsake my wife for honestie sake.

18 Item, euery yere the Grecians vse vpon certaine daies to excommunicate the church of Rome, and all the Latines as heretikes.

19 Item, among the laid Grecians they are excommunicate, that beat or strike a priest. Neither do their religious men liue in such priestly chastitie as the Roman priests do.

20 Item, their emperor amongst them doth ordaine patriarchs, bishops, and other of the clergie, and deposeth the same at his pleasure, also giueth benefices to whom he listeth, and retaineth the fruits of the same benefices, as pleaseth him.

This article is worthie not to be rightly collected out of the Grecians.

21 Item, they blame the Latin church because they eat not flesh, egs and cheese on fridaies, and doe eate flesh on saturdaies.

22 Item, they hold against the Latine men, for celebrating without the consecrated church, either in the house or in the field: and fasting on the sabbath day: and for permitting menstruous women to enter into the church before their purifying: also for suffering dogs and other beasts to enter into the church.

23 The Grecians vse not to kneele in all their deuotions, yea not to the body of Christ (as the register termeth it) but one day in the whole peare: saying and affirming, that the Latins be gotes and beasts, for they are alwaies prostrating themselues vpon the ground in their prayers.

24 The Grecians moreouer permit not the Latins to celebrate vpon their altars. And if it chance any Latin priest to celebrate vpon their altar, by and by they wash their altar in token of abomination and false sacrifice. And diligently they obserue, that whensoeuer they do celebrate, they do but one liturgie or masse vpon one altar or table that day.

25 Item, they dissent from the church of Rome touching the order and maner of the proceedings of the holy Ghost.

These articles, wherin is declared the difference betweene the east and west church, of the Grecians and Romans, as I found them articulated and collected in an ancient and authenticall register of the church of Hereford: so I thought here to insert them, y leaue them to the consideration of the reader. Other foure articles more in the same register be there expressed concerning simonie, vsurie, not with them forbidden and touching also their emperor; and how they teach their children to hurt or damnifie by any maner of way the Latine priests, &c. Which articles, for that either they seeme not truely collected out of their teachings, or else not greatly pertinent to the doctrine of religion, I ourpasse them. To the purpose now of our storie ensuing.

When certaine of these aboue prefixed were moued in the foresaid councell to be discussed; namely concerning the assertion of proceeding of the holy Ghost, and concerning leauened bread in the ministration of the Lords supper; Anselme, as is aboue said, was called for, who in the tractation of the same articles so bestirred him in that councell, that he well liked the pope and them about him, as mine author recordeth. Wherevpon, touching the matter of vnleauened bread, how indifferently he seemed there to reason, and what he writeth to Valeran bishop of Nurenburgh, thereof ye shall heare by a piece of his letter sent to the said bishop, the copie hereof insueth.

Anselme a stout champion against the Grecians.

Anselme seruant to the church of Canturburie, to Waltram bishop of Nurenburgh. Epist. 325. post initium.

A letter of Anselme sent to Waltram bishop of Nurenburgh. Ex epist. Anselmi. 325.

AS concerning the sacrifice, in which the Grecians thinke not as we doe: seemeth to many reasonable catholike me, that which they do, not to be against the christian faith: for both hee that sacrificeth vnleauened and leauened, sacrificeth bread. And where it is read of our Lord (when hee made his bodie of bread) that he tooke bread and blessed: it is not added vnleauened, or leauened. Yet it is certaine that he blessed vnleauened bread (peraduenture) not because the thing that was done required that, but because the supper in which this was done, did giue that. And whereas in an other place he called himselfe and his flesh bread, because that as many as liue temporally with this bread, so with that bread he liueth for euer. Hee saith not vnleauened or leauened, because both alike are bread: for vnleauened and leauened differ not in substance as some thinke, like as a new man afore sin, and an old rooted man in the leauen of sinne, differ not in substance. For this cause therefore only he might be thought to call himselfe and his flesh, bread, & made his body of bread, because that this bread vnleauened or leauened) giueth a transitorie life; and his body giueth euerlasting life, not for that it is either leauened or vnleauened. Although it be a commandement in the law to eate vnleauened bread in the passeouer, where all things are done in a figure, that it might be declared that Christ whom they looked for was pure and cleane: and we that should eate his body were admonished to be likewise pure from all leauen of malice and wickednesse. But now, after we are come from the old figure to the new truth, and eate the vnleauened flesh of Christ, that old figure in bread (of which we make that flesh) is not necessarie for vs. But manifest it is, to bee better sacrificed of vnleauened, then of leauened, &c.

Bread in the communion to be vnleauened is not necessarie.

To this letter I haue also adioyned an other epistle of his to the said Waltram, appertaining to matters not much vnlike to the same effect: wherin is intreated touching the varietie and diuers vsages of the sacraments in the church, whereby such as call and crie so much for vniformitie in the church, may note peraduenture in the same something for their better vnderstanding.

A peece of an other letter of Anselme to the said Waltram bishop of Nur.

To the reuerend father and his friend, Waltram by the grace of God the worshipfull bishop of Nurenburgh, Anselme the seruant of the church of Canturburie, greeting, &c. Ex epist. Anselmi. fol. 317.

YOur worship complaineth of the sacraments of the church, that they are not made euery where after one fort, but are handled in diuers places after diuers sorts. And truely, if they were ministred after one fort and agreeing through the whole church church, it were good and laudable. Yet notwithstanding, because there be many diuersities which differ not in the sum of the sacrament, in the strength of it, or in the faith, or else can be gathered into one custome: I thinke that they are rather to bee borne with in agreement of peace, then to be condemned with offence. For we haue this from the holy fathers, that if the vnitie of charitie be kept in the catholike faith, the diuersitie of customes hurt nothing. But if it be demanded whereof this diuersitie of customes do spring; I perceiue no other cause thereof, but the diuersitie of mens wits, which although they differ not in strength and truth of the thing: yet they agree not in the fitnesse and comelinesse of the ministring. For that which one iudgeth to be meeter, oftentimes an other thinketh lesse meet: wherefore not to agree in such diuersities, I thinke it not to swarue from the truth of the thing, &c.

Diuersitie of vsages in the church to be borne with, and not to be condemned with offence.

Diuersitie of customes in the church hurt nothing.

Excommunication denounced against the Grecians.

Excommunication sent against king William.

First breake his head, and then giue him a plaister.

Message betweene the king and the pope.

Then in the storie it followeth, after long debating and discussing of these matters in the councell, when they had giuen forth their determination vpon the same; and the pope had blasted out his thundring excommunications against the Grecians, and all that take their part: at length was brought in, touching the complaints and accusation against the king of England. Vpon the hearing whereof, pope Vrban with his adherents was readie to proceed in excommunication against the king. But Anselme kneeling before the pope, after hee had first accused his king, then after obtained of him longer time to be giuen vpon further triall.

Thus the councell breaking vp, the pope returning againe to Rome, directly downe his letters to the king, commanding him that Anselme with all his partakers (in speedie wise) should be reuested againe into his archbishoprike, and all other possessions thereunto appertaining. To this the king seemeth nowhere againe by messengers, who comming to the pope, declared in the kings behalfe on this wise; That the king their master did not a little maruell, what cause in his mind to command Anselme to be reuested and reseized againe into his former archbishoprike, seeing he told him before plainely, that if hee went out of England without his leaue, hee would so vse the matter against Anselme (saith the pope) haue ye no other matter against Anselme but onely this? No (quoth they.) And haue ye taken all this trauell (saith the pope) to come hither so far to tell me this, that the primate of your countrie is therfore ill vsed and dispossessed, because he hath appealed to the see and iudgement apostolicall? Therefore if thou touch thy lord, shed thee bone and bloud of him he will not bee excommunicated, that he quickly reuest Anselme againe to all that he had before. And lest I make thee to be hard & for thy labour, take to thy tearme, and see that thou bring me answere againe from him into this citie, against the next councell the third weeke after Easter. The messenger of Israeter being somewhat astonied at the hearing of this so tragicall answere, thinking yet to worke some thing for his king and maister, came secretly to the pope, saying that hee would confer a certaine mysterie from his king priuatlie with his holinesse betweene them two. What mysterie that was, or what there passed from the king to the pope and the court of Rome, mine author doth not shew: but so cunningly that mysterie was handled, that with a full consent both of the pope and all the court of Rome, a longer day was giuen, from Easter to Michelmas, and the popes holinesse beate to aduantage, that when the councell came (which then was holden at S. Peters church in Rome) albeit great complaints were then denounced against the king: yet such fauor was found, that hee take no harme. Onely the sentence of excommunication was there pronounced against such lay persons as gaue inuesture of churches, & them that were so inuested. Also against them that doo confer-rate such, or which giue themselues in subiection to laymen for ecclesiasticall liuings, as is before touched, &c.

Acts of the councell of Rome.

This councell being finished, the archbishop seeing the vnstedfastnesse of the pope, which pleased him but a little, take his iourney into Lions, where he continued his abode a long time, till the death first of pope Vrban, then after of the king.

Of this king William many things be diuerslie recorded, some to his commendation, and some to his discommendation: whereof this is one, which some will ascribe to hardinesse, but I rather to rashnes in him. As this king vpon a time was in his dispost of hunting, suddenly word came to him, that duke Robert his brother was in Normandie (was he sieged. The king without longer tarrying or aduisement take the straight way toward the sea side, sending to his lords that they should follow after. They being come to his presence, aduised him to stay till the time his people were assembled, but he would not bee staied: saying, that such as him loued (hee knew) would soone follow him, and so went to take ship. The shipmaster seeing the weather so darke and cloudie, was afraid, and counselled the king to tarie till the wind did turne about, for the weather more fauourable. But the king persisting in his iourney, commanded him to make all the speed he might for his life: saying, that he neuer heard that any king yet was euer drowned. And so passed the sea in safetie, and came to Normandie.

The hardines or rather rashnesse of king William.

The saying of king William, how he neuer knew any king drowned.

The thirteenth yeare of his reigne the said king William hauing the same time in his hand three bishoprikes, Canturburie, Winchester, and Sarum; also twelue abbeyes in farme: as he was in his dispost of hunting in the new forest, by glancing of an arrow (shot of a knight named Walter Tirell) was wounded to death, and so hæcheelie was carried to Westminster, and there was buried. Where also is to be noted, that Richard the eldest germane of king William, and sonne to duke Robert his brother, was likewise slaine in the forsaid forrest. See the iust hand of God vpon kings sharping wrongfully vpon other mens grounds, as did William Conqueror their father, in making this new forrest, plucking downe diuers churches and townships the compasse of thirtie miles about. Here therefore appeareth, that although men cannot reuenge, yet God reuengeth either in them, or in their posteritie, &c. This king as he allwaies vsed concubines, so left he no issue legitimate behind him. His life was such, that it is hard for a storie that should tel the truth, to say whether he was more to be commended or reproued. Among other vices in him, especially is to be rebuked in him vnmeasurable and vnreasonable crueltie: insomuch that he coueted if he might, to be euery mans heire. This one example of a liberall and princely nature I find in him: that vpon a time, when a certaine abbat of a place was dead, there came to his court two monks of the same house, who before had gathered much money, and made their friends to the king, and offered large offers, either of them to be promoted to that dignitie. There was also the third monke of the same place, which of meeknesse and humilitie followed the other two; to the intent that vpon him whom the king had admitted for abbat, he should giue attendance, and as his chapleine to haue with him returned. The king called before him the two monks seuerally, of whom the either out proffered the other. As the king cast his eye aside, he espied the third monke standing by, supposing that his comming had been also for the like cause. Then the king calling him, asked what he would do, whether he would giue more then his brethren had offered to be abbat. He answered to the king, and said: that hee neither had nor would (if he might) offer any pennie for it, by any such vnlawfull meane.

Example of the iust hand of God reuenging the faults of kings in their posteritie.

Conuersation of the monke with king William.

A famous example of holines rewarded.

Two holie monks both preferred.

When the king had well pondered this third monks answere, he said that he was best worthie to be abbat, and to haue the rule of so holy a charge; and so gaue vnto him that benefice without taking any pennie.

Vrban reconciliated vnto the church emperor.

Vrban bishop of Rome, who (as is said) succeeded after Victor, ruled the church of Rome, about the space of twelue yeres: and among his other acts, hee excommunicated the emperour and among his other acts, hee excommunicated the emperour Henrie the fourth of that name, as a man not much deuote to that see of Rome. But yet a worthie and victorious prince hee was; in whom albeit some vice perchance might be noted: yet in one thing, wherefore any prelate or minister of Christ ought to excite his subiects to rebell against publike iustice of God appointed. This emperor Henry the fourth was by foure popes seuerally excommunicat: first by Hildebrand, by Victor, Vrban, and Paschal. Which excommunication wrought so in the ignorant and blind hearts of the people, that many (as well of the nobles as of the multitude, contrarie to their sworne allegiance) rebellious die conspired against their king and emperor. Amunder of whom, amongst the rest, was one certaine earle named Ludouicus, to whom Waltramus bishop of the church of Mergburgh, a godly and faithfull man, as appeareth, doth write letters of fatherly admonition, exhorting and instructing him in the office of obedience. Vnto the which letters hee likewise doth answere againe, by cauilling sophisticall, and by meere affection, rather bis posed to discord, then seeking sincerite of truth. And for so much as in these two letters, the argument of christian obedience on both sides is to debated by proues and reasons, as may be profitable for the reader to perus and vnderstand: I thought therefore not to defraud the English reader of the same, wherof peraduenture some vtilitie might be taken. The tenor of the bishops letter to the earle here followeth.

Foure popes excommunicate the emperor.

The epistle of Waltramus bishop of Mergburgh to the earle Ludouicus, exhorting to concord and obedience.

§ Anno § 1090 §

In English.

Waltram by the grace of God being that he is, to Ludouike the noble prince, with instance of prayers offereth himselfe seruiceable to all things. To euery realme concord is a thing profitable, and iustice much to be desired. For this vertue is the mother of godlinesse, and the confeseration of all honestie. Whosoeuer seeking after ciuill dissension, & incensech others to effusion of blood, he is a murtherer, and partaker with him, whose gaping & thirsting for anothers blood, goeth about seeking whom he may deuoure. You therefore, confidering with your selfe (most noble prince) how God is the God of peace and not of dissension (so much as in you doth lie) haue peace with all men. God is charity, the diuell is hatred. The whole law & prophets consist in loue & charitie. He that hateth & maligneth his brother is a murtherer, & hath no part with Christ in the kingdome of God. This we read testified and protested both by him which which is the truth himselfe, & by him which was the scholar of the truth: who vpon the breast of the Lord (drinking a more ful draught of the gospell) reioyceth the citie of God with abundance of plentifull floods. In like maner that worthie vessell of election, who being rapt vp to the third heauen (not by man but by reuelation of Iesus Christ) protesteth also, saying: Let euery soule submit himselfe to higher powers: There is no power, saith he, but of God. He that resisteth power, resisteth the ordinance of God. If that be true therfore, which certaine of our friends do iangle among women, and the vulgar sort, that we ought not to bee subdued to kingly power: then is it false which the apostle teacheth, that euery soule must submit himselfe vnder power & superiority. But can the verity lie? Or doe we seeke for experimēt of him, who spake in the apostle, Christ the Lord? Or do we prouoke the Lord? Be we stronger then hee? For what doth he but thinketh himselfe stronger then the Lord, that resisteth the ordinance of God? For there is no power but of God. But what saith the prophet? Confounded be all they that striue against thee O Lord, and the men which rupugne against thee shall perish. Rodolph, Hildebrand, Egbert, with many other princes, resisted the ordinace of God in Henrie the emperor. And lo, euen as they had neuer been, so are they now perished; and as their end was euil, so their beginning could not be good.

Disobedience punished of God.

Now therfore, forsomuch as they which be contrarie to vs do earnestly striue against vs euen with their owne arguments, whereas of right (I dare referme to your iudgement) we ought to vse the authority of Christ & ancient fathers, before that which our aduersaries take out of their own treasurie: And because I will not refuse the order of law in this behalfe; let it bee the end of the strife, that either I may be openly shamed before the people, either else (the victorie falling on our side) we may win you to the obedience of our soueraigne lord the emperor. Also take you heed to this saying; If any man doe preach otherwise then that which is preached, let him be of you accursed. This curse, I say, doth not proceed from any new prophane authoritie, but is thundred downe from the high heauen. And therefore which know not the righteousnes of God, but goe about to stablish their own righteousnesse, and therefore bee not subiect to the righteousnes of God, I may boldly say: let such be accursed. So may you well say, Confounded bee all they that proudly rise vp against the Lord: but thy seruant (O Lord) shall reioyce. For as thou hast well said, Without me you can doe nothing, so in iudging of the wicked thou dost not condemne the iust. Who art thou that iudgest another mans seruant, to his owne lord whether he doth stand or fall?

A scoffing answere of the learned fetcher of bishop Waltram.

THe earle Lewis to the lord Waltram, how soeuer vnworthie or vnmeet he be for the name. Like as a good man from the good treasure of the heart bringeth forth good fruit, so doth the euill man from the euill treasure of the heart bring forth euill fruit. What arrogancie hath so possest you, to prouoke my displeasure with such iniurious contumelies? For indeed those my good lords and spirituall fathers, which strengthen me in the way of righteousnes: you (railingly) call them bloodie men like vnto Satan, and the wholesome lessons which they teach, you say they are but dreams of the common people amongst foolish women. Hath God any need of your iudgement that you should speake leasings for him? Iniquitie hath taught your mouth to follow blasphemous tongues: so that well may the prophet say of you, He would not vnderstand to doe well, hee hath deuised wickednes vpon his bed. Although therefore you being altogether froward, haue only spoken froward things: yet we haue determined to set a watch before your mouth, like as if a shameless person should stand vp before vs: & the word of God doth prouoke vs, saying: Answera foole according to his owne foolishnesse, lest he should seeme wise in his owne opinion. Shall foolish speake & wise some hold his peace? Shall lies be freely vttered, & truth compelled to keepe silence? Shall darkenes couer the earth, & shal not the Lord arise & shine? yea rather the light hath lightened the darkenes, & darkenes hath not comprehended it. In consideration hereof our hearts haue melted, and our zealous meditation haue set vs on fire. We therfore speake and crie, and the little foxes which vndermine the Lords vineyards (as much as in vs is) we driue away, fearing the threatning prophecie: You haue not withstood our aduersaries, neither haue you made a bul worke for the defence of the house of Israel, that you might be able to stand in battell in the day of the Lord. Let them heare: I speake not to you which haue eares and heare not, eyes and see not, which haue made darke the light that is in you: but let them heare: I say, that bee well disposed, and haue eares to heare withall: as for you, you haue no vnderstanding, and if you haue you cloke it. Neither haue you any thing to say or to proue, by what reason wee should be subiect to the lord Henrie whom you call emperor. And yet (as it is giuen vs to vnderstand) you goe about to perswade, that of necessitie we ought to be subiect to him, and that by the argument of S. Paul; Let euery soule be subdued to the higher powers, for there is no power but of God; he therefore that doth withstand power, doth resist Gods ordinance. The which sentence of the apostle, we say that you doe euill conceiue, and therfore euill interpret: for if euery power be of God (as you vnderstand) what is ment by that, that the Lord doth speake of some by the prophet? They did reigne and were nor made princes by me, and I knew them not. If euery power be of God as you take it, what is to be thought of that, that the Lord doth say: If thine eye offend thee, plucke it out, and cast it from thee? For what is power, but the eye? Certainely, Aug. in the exposition of this sentence of the apostle (Let euery soule, &c) doth say, that if the powers do command any thing against God, then haue them in contempt: but yet neuertheless feare them. Is there any iniquitie with God? Is Christ the minister of sin? God forbid. What shall we therefore say? Doth the apostle preach contrarie to truth? Aug. saith, No. One wind filleth many pipes of diuers tunes. Therefore let vs heare the apostle agreeing and expounding himselfe, and destroying his enemie and auenger: There is (saith he) no power but of God. What followeth? He therefore (saith he) that doth resist the power, &c: God forbid, doth nothing follow? But what doth follow? Those powers which bee ordained of God truely, that is it we looke for. O crafty tongue, O hart imagining mischief, O consuming breath that shal not returne, why hast thou lied to the Holy ghost? Thine owne conscience shall accuse thee. Behold the wicked fleeth and no man doth pursue him. Why would you suppresse the truth to the intent to deceiue? Why stole ye away the pith & effect of this sentence? For if these words should be taken away from the midst of the sentence, it should lie (contrarie to it selfe) inconuenient and halfe dead. The word of the Lord is herein fulfilled, He that diggeth a pit for his neighbour shall fall therin himselfe. Verily you can neither excuse you of theft, neither auoid the punishment due for the same. O vnhappie man! what shall you answere to the iudge, when he shall require an account of his seruants of whom he putteth you in trust, seeing you shall be set before him in the midst, & proued a picker of your masters treasure? Wherefore did you not feare the iudgement & execution, when as the guiltines of offence doth require condigne punishment? The apostle through the Holy ghost did foresee, that you and such heretikes as you should spring in the church, which should cal good euill, & euill good, & that should put darkenes in place of light, & light in place of darkenes, which also should take occasion by the sentences of truth to bring in error: when as he did set this before, There is no power but of God: to the intent he might take away the coniecture of false vnderstanding. For (saith he) those powers that be, are ordained of God. Giue therfore an ordinarie power, and we doe not resist, yea we will forthwith doe our homage. But I doe maruell (if at the least there remaine in you any one drop of blood) that you are not ashamed, to call the lord Henrie a king, or to allow him any ordinarie place.

Whether euery power is to be obeyed or no. Ose. 8.

If euery power which ouerbeth his subiects is to be cast out, then hath this earle made a faire argument.

How liuely these papists describe themselues in their owne colour.

But Paul taught the emperor to be an ordinarie power, when he appointed to him.

Is this a seemely order (thinke you) to giue place to wickednesse, and to make a generall confusion in mixing good and euill, Gods and mans deuices togither? Either do you thinke this good order for man to sin against his owne body, as (oh shamefull wickednesse) to make his owne wife a common harlot, a mischiefe not heard of at any time since the beginning of the world before now? Or do you allow this for good order, when as the Lord saith, Defend the widows, especially such as require equitie of iustice, and then them to send away most filthily defiled? Mad Orestes doth protest him to be our of his wit: he will say these things to be orderly or well done. Vntill this most miserable time, nature hath euer loued secrecie; but your king giuen vp to a reprobate sense, hath vncouered the priuities of nature, who hath not let to lay abrode all shamefastnesse. We will not speake of other things which cannot be numbred, that is to say, burning of churches, robberies, firing of houses, manslaughters, murders, and such like, the number whereof he knoweth, and not we: for let vs speake chiefie of those things which most grieue the church of God. Harken therfore to true & not fained things: Harken, I say, to matters of earnest, & to no trifles. Euery one that doth sell spirituall dignities, is an heretike. But the lord Henrie, whom they call a king, doth sell both bishopriks and abbacies: for truly he sold for money the bishoprike of Constance, Babemberge, Mentz, and many others. The bishoprikes of Ratisbone, Augusta, and Strausbrough he sold for a sword, & the abbey of Fulda for adulterie: and for filthie fodomitrie hee sold the bishopricke of Mons. A wickednesse it is to speake or heare of such a fact. The which things if without shame ye wil denie, he is to be condemned by the witnesse of heauen & earth: yea & of the silly poore idiots that come from the smiths forge. Wherfore the lord Henry is an heretik, for the which most wicked euils he is excommunicate from the see apostolike, so that he may not exercise either kingdom or power ouer vs which be catholike. And whereas you burthen vs with hatred of our brethren, know you that we purpose not to hate any of affection, but of a godly zeale. God forbid that we should thinke Henry worthy to be accounted amongst our christian brethren, who indeed is reputed for an ethnike and publican, in that he refused to heare the church which so oft hath reproued him. The hatred of whom we offer vnto God for a great sacrifice, saying with the Psalmist: Lord shall not I hate them that hate thee? and shall not I triumph ouer thine enemies? I hate them with an inward hatred that be enemies to me for thy sake. The truth it selfe commending the worthinesse of this hatred, doth say: If any doe not hate father and mother, brethren and sisters for my sake, he cannot be my disciple. We are not therefore iustly to be reproued of hatred, which do giue ouer our owne soule to bee in the way of God: who indeed are commanded to hate father and mother, and euery affection which doth withstand vs for walking in the path of God. Hereof it commeth, that we labor with al our studie and indeuour to beware of the enimies of the church, and them to hate; not for that they bee our enimies, but Gods. Further, where you persuade peace to bee had with all men, you must remember what the apostle doth put before, If it may be. But if it cannot be that we can haue peace with them, who can be contrarie to God? Who doth not know the Lord our sauiour, to commend not onely peace, when as hee saith, My peace I giue vnto you, my peace I leaue vnto you: but that he is the peace (as saith the apostle) he is the peace which made of both one: for hee calleth him our peace, speaking in commendation of the peace: Thinke not (saith he) that I came to send peace, for I came not to send peace, but the sword. What is meant by this? Why is peace called a sword? Or doth peace bid battell? Yea truely, to destroy the peace of the diuell. For the diuell hath his peace, wherof the Lord speaketh: When as the strong man keepeth his house, he doth possesse all his substance in peace. Oh how mightilie doth the diuell keepe his souldiers and his house in this time! who with the shield of falshood, and the helmet of vntruth, so doth defend him, that he will not suffer either arrow or dart of truth to pierce him. Neuerthelesse, our Lord being more strongly armed, and fiercelyer comming vpon your giant, is able to ouercome him and to take away his weapons, wherein hee putteth his trust. We are not therfore to be blamed, if we do detest that peace, more cruell then any war, the which the truth it selfe did reprooue, weeping ouer Ierusalem, and saying: Truely, it grieueth me this day to see sinners in peace; being like vnto that peace, whereat the Psalmist was offended. Whereas you condemne pope Gregorie, king Rodulphus, and marques Eggebertus, as men that haue died of an vnhappie death, and do magnifie your lord, because he doth ouerliue them: it doth plainely (for sooth) appeare, that you remaine voide of all spirituall consideration. Is it not better to die well, then to liue ill? They be truely happie, who suffer persecution for righteousnesse sake. By the same reason may you esteeme Nero, Herod, and Pilat happie, in that they ouerliued Peter, Paul, Iames apostles, and Iesus Christ. What can be said more foolish and wicked then this opinion? Wherefore refraine your babling tongue from this blasphemie, left that you place your selfe in the number of them, which seeing the end of the iust to be glorious (themselues doing late and vntruitfull penance, bewailing in the anguish of the spirit) shal say: These be they whom sometime we had in derision & laughed to scorne, we being out of our wits, thought their liues madnesse, & their end to bee without honor. Behold how they be allowed to bee amongst the children of God, and their portion is amongst the saints. Wherefore we haue erred from the way of truth, and the brightnesse of righteousnesse did not shine vpon vs. What did our pride auaile vs? And what profit did the boasting of our riches bring vs? They are all vanished away like a shadow. The which words we haue registred vp into perpetuall memory, and we do despise euery attempt that shall stir vp it selfe against the truth of God; and reioycing in troubles, we may be reproued, put to shame and rebuked, yea and finally be slaine and killed, but we will neither yeeld, nor bee ouercome. And with great triumph will we reioyce in our fathers doings, of whom you (as a beardlesse boy, and of small knowledge haue not rightly conceiued: who indeed despising princes commandements, haue deserued euerlasting reward.

Oh how craftilie doth Satan here shape himselfe to an angell of light.

This to likely, that the emperor would make his owne wife a common harlot.

Well said when you are not able to withstand him, yet you cannot hold your tongue, but runne a foole, prattling the same thing that hath lightened the darkenes, & darkenes hath not comprehended it.

He hath yeerned more reason then some, but little to the purpose.

Ex vetusto chronico.

There is a certaine chronicle in old English meter, which among other matters speaking of William Rufus, declareth him to be so sumptuous and excessiue in pompous apparel, that hee being not contented with a paire of hose of a low price, which was three shillings, caused a paire to bee bought of a marke; whereupon his chamberleine procuring a paire much worse then the other before, said:

That they costened a marke, and vnneth he them so bought:
Yea belamie (quoth the king) they are well bought.

Whereby is to be noted what difference is to be seene betweene the hose of princes then, & the hose of ferningmen now.

King Henrie the first.

{Anno 1100}

Henrie Beauclerke the first, king of England.

What learning doth in a palace.

HEnry the first of that name, the third son of William Conqueror, succeeding his brother Rufus, began his reigne in England, the yeere of our Lord 1100, who for his knowledge and science in the seuen liberall arts was surnamed Clerke or Beuclerke. In whom may well appeare, how knowledge and learning doth greatly conduce to the gouernment and administration of any realme or countrie. At the beginning he reformed the state and condition of the clergie, released the grieuous payments, reduced againe king Edwards lawes, with emendation thereof; hee reformed the old and vntrue measures, and made a measure after the length of his arme, he greatly abhorred excesse of meats and drinks, many things misused before his time hee reformed, and liued so quietly more by counsell then by sword. Such persons as were nice and wanton, he secluded from his court. This man (as appeareth) little fauoured the vsurped power of the bishop of Rome. Some after he was king, he married Matilde, Maud, daughter of Malcolme king of Scots, and of Margaret his wife, daugh. of Edward the outlaw, as is before specified, being a professed nun in Winchester, whom notwithstanding (without the popes dispensation he married by the counsell of Anselme, by the which Maud he receiued two sons, William and Richard, and two daughters, Maud and Marie. Which Maud afterward was married to Henry the fift emperor, &c.

Example what fruit to learne of the Lords burnings.

In the second yeare of his reigne, Robert his elder brother duke of Normandie, who being occupied in the christian wars against the Turks, and being elect (as you heard) king of Ierusalem, hearing of the death of Rufus, refused the kingdome thereof: for the which (as is thought) he neuer sped well after. Thus the said Robert leauing off the Lords busines, and returning into Normandie made there his preparation, and came ouer into England with a great host to challenge the crowne: but by mediation of the lords it was agreed vpon, that Robert should haue yearely during his life three thousand marks, as was likewise promised him before by king Rufus his brother: and whether of them ouerliued the other, to be the others heire. And thus Robert departed againe into Normandie, to the great discontentation of his lords there. But in few yeares after, the forenamed tribute of three thousand marks through the meanes of queene Maud was released to the king his brother. In processe of time, variance falling betweene king Henrie and the said Robert his brother: at length Robert in his war was taken prisoner and brought ouer into England, and was put into the castle of Cardife in Wales, where hee continued as prisoner while he liued.

Duke Robert taken prisoner.

In this time, as about the third yeare of this king, the hospitall of S. Bartholomew in Smithfield was founded (by meanes of a minstrell belonging vnto the king, named Raier) and after it was finished by Richard Whittington alderman and maior of London. This place of Smithfield was at y day a lay stal of all odure or filth, and the place where the felons and other transgressors of the kings lawes were put to execution.

The hospitall of Bartholomew founded.

Diuers strict lawes were by this king prouided, especially against theues and felons: that whosoeuer were taken in that fault, no money should saue him from hanging.

Item, that whose did counterfeit false money, should haue both his eyes and nether parts of his body cut off.

Item, in the same councell was decreed an order for priests to be sequestred from their wiues, which before were not forbidden according as the words of mine author do purport, whose words be these: Anselmus prohibet vxores sacerdotibus Angelorum, auris non prohibitas. Quod quibusdam murdissimum videtur esse, quibusdam periculosissimo dum mundicias viribus maiores apprehendi, in mundicias horribiles ad christiani nominis summum dedecus incidere, &c. Henr. Hunt.

Ex Henr lib. 7. Anselme.

Item, it was then decreed that monks and priests should beare no rule ouer lay persons.

Item, it was then decreed concerning byedering of haire, and wearing of garments.

Item, that the secret contract betweene a pong lad and a pong maid should not stand: with other things more concerning the excommunication of Sodomits, &c.

In the stole of William Rufus before was declared how Anselme the archbishop of Canturbure departing out of the realme, went vnto the pope; who after the death of king William was sent for againe by the foresaid king Henrie, and so returned againe, and was at the councell of the king at Westminster; where the king in the presence of the lords as well temporall as spirituall, ordained and inuested two bishops, Roger of Salisburie, and Roger bishop of Hereford. During which parliament or councell of the king, Anselme in his consecration deposed and displaced diuers abbats and other prelats from their romes and dignities: either for that they lawfully came not by them, or vprightly did not administer the same.

Th' king ordaineth two bishops without the pope.

After his councell, and the other before set forth by Anselme, Herbert bishop of Norwich, had much adoe with the priests of his diocesse: for they would neither leaue their wiues nor yet giue ouer their benefices. Whereupon he wrote to Anselme the archbishop for counsell, what was to be done therein. Which Anselme required him (as he did others more the same time by writing) to perswade the people of Norwhollie and Suffolke: that as they professed christianitie, they should subdue them as rebels against the church, and vtterly to driue both them and their wiues out of the countrie, placing monkish their romes, as by the epistles of the said Anselme doth appeare. Wherof certaine parcels shall hereafter (by the grace of Christ) insue for the better euidence of this and the other his aduertisements aboue recited.

The like businesse also had Gerard the archbishop of Yorke, in depriuing the priests of his prouince from their wiues:

which thing with all his excommunications and thunderings he could hardly bring about. Upon this rumbling of Anselme with married priests, were running bookes made to helpe the matter withall, when reason could not serue. Which bookes for the folie thereof I thought here to anner.

About the end of the third yeare of this king, which was the computation of our Lord 1103, a variance fell betweene king Henrie and Anselme, the occasion whereof was this. He heard a little before how Henrie the first king had of his owne authoritie inuested two bishops, one Roger which was chancellor, bishop of Salisburie: and another bishop of Hereford. Besides them 9 more also he inuested, and diuers other like things tooke he vpon him in the ecclesiasticall state, which hee might lawfully do, Gods word allowing well the same: but because it was restrained by the bishop of Rome for him so to doe, this Anselme swelled, fretted and inueied so mad, that he would neither consent to it, neither yet confirme them, nor communicate nor talke friendly with them, whom the king had inuested and inuested: but opprobriously called them abortiues, or children of destruction, pubanelesly rebuking the gentle king as a despiser of religion and pollutor of their holy ceremonies: as witnesseth Polydorus. With this vncomely outrage the king was much displeased as he might full well, and required Gerard the archbishop of Yorke (as he ought him allegiance) to consecrate them: who without delay did so, well performing the same, saying that one William Giffard, to whom the king had giuen the bishoprike of Winchester, refused to take his consecration by the hands of the archbishop of Yorke. For the which cause the king (worthilie with him offended) deprived him both of bishoprike and goods, and banished him the realme.

Gerard bishop of Winchester refuseth to be consecrated by the archbishop of Yorke.

Moreouer, the king required of Anselme the archbishop of Canturburie, to doe vnto him homage after the manner of his ancestors, as witnesseth Guliel. de gestis pontif. Angle. Also it was asked of the said Anselme, whether that he would be with the king in giuing inuestures, as Lanefrancus his predecessor was with his father. To whom Anselme said, that he promised not at any time, that hee would enter into this order, to keepe the law or custom of his father, as Lanefrancus did. Moreouer, as concerning homage to be done to the king, that he refused, alleging the censures of the popes excommunication, who in his councell of Rome a little before had giuen forth open sentence of excommunication, vpon all such late persons (whatsoeuer they were that should from henceforth confer or giue any spirituall promotions: also vpon them that receiued them at their hands, either yet should consecrate any such receiuers. Moreouer, he accursed all them that for benefices or other ecclesiasticall promotions should subiect themselues vnder the homage or seruice of any great man, king, prince, duke, or earle of the lande. For it was vnseemely (said the pope) and a thing very execrable, that the hands which were consecrated vnto so high a working, as was granted to no angel (that is, to create him with their crosses which created all, and to offer vp the same before the sight of the father for the saluation of the whole world) should be brought to such a slauerie, as to bee subiect to those filthie hands, which both day and night are polluted with shamefull touchings, robberies and bloodshed, &c. This decree of pope Urban, Anselme alleging for himselfe, denied to subiect himselfe to the kings homage, fearing (as he said) the popes excommunication. Vpon this, messengers were sent to Rome on both parts vnto the pope, then Paschalis, who stoutly standing to the keys and determinations of Urban his predecessor, would in no case yeeld to the kings inuesting.

Anselme refuseth to do homage to the king.

Ex Matthæo Paris. Ex Guliel. lib. 1. de gestis pontif. Angl.

In the meane time, while there was long disputation on both sides for inuesting: the nobles of the realme contended, that inuestings did belong to the kings dignitie: wherefore the king calling for Anselme againe, required him either to doe homage to him, or else to voide his kingdome. To whom Anselme replying againe, required the popes letters: For I will not forgo the liberties of my kingdom for any pope. Thus the contention continued betweene them. Anselme saith, hee would not out of the realme, but depart home to his church: and there see who would offer him any violence, and so did. Not long after, message came from the king to Anselme, requesting him after a gentle sort, to repaire to the kings presence againe, to set an end of the controuersie begun: whereunto Anselme granted and came. Then were new ambassadors sent againe to the pope, that he would something qualifie and moderate (or rather abolish) the straitnesse of the Romish decree before mentioned. On the part of Anselme went two monks, Waldwinus and Alexander. On the kings behalfe were sent two bishops, Robert, bishop of Lichfield, and Herbert bishop of Norwich, with the kings letters written vnto the pope, containing in forme as followeth.

Patri venerabili Paschali summo pontifici, Henricus Dei gratia rex Anglorum, salutem. Promotionis vestræ in sedem sanctæ Romanæ ecclesiæ plurimum congaudeo, petens vt amicitia quæ patrimeo cum antecessoribus vestris fuit, inter nos quoque illibata permaneat. Unde, vt dilectio & benignitas a me videatur sumere vitium, beneficiis quod ab antecessoribus meis beatus Petrus habuit, vobis mitto: absque honore & eam obedientiam quam tempore patris mei antecessores vestri in regno Angliæ habuerunt, tempore meo vt habeatis volo, eo videlicet tenore, vt dignitatis vestæ & consuetudines, quas pater meus tempore antecessorum vestrorum in regno Angliæ habuit, ego tempore vestro in eodem regno meo integrè obtineam. Et si ego (quod absit) in tantam me deiectione ponerem: optimates mei (imo totius Anglie populus) id nullo modo paterentur. Habita igitur (charissime pater) vtilitori deliberatione, ita fergere nos moderetur benignitas vestra, ne quid iniuste faciam, & a vestra me cogatis recedere obedientia.

The letter of king Henrie the first vnto the pope.

In English.

To the reuerend father Paschall the chiefe bishop, Henrie by the grace of God, king of England, greeting. For this your promotion vnto the see of the holy church of Rome, as I am heartily glad: so my request is to you, that the friendship and amity, which hath beene tofore betweene my father and your predecessors in times past, may now also betweene vs in like maner continue vndiminished. And that loue and gentlenesse may first begin on my part; here I send to you that gift that S. Peter had in former time of my predecessors. And likewise the same honors and obedience, which your predecessors haue had in the realme of England before in the time of my father, I will you to haue the same in my time also: after this forme I meane and tenor, that the vsage and maner of dignitie and customs which my father hath had in this realme of England in the time of your ancestors; I in like ample maner also now in your time may fully inioy the same in this the said realme of England. Therefore be it knowne to your holinesse, that during this life of mine (God almightie stabling me to the same) these aboue manned dignities, vsages, and customes of this realme of England, shall in no part be lettened. Yea, and if that (as God forbid I should) would so much deiect my selfe vnto such cowardnesse: yet my nobles, yea the whole people of England in no case would suffer it. Wherefore (deare father) vsing with your selfe a better deliberation in the matter, let your gentlenesse so moderat it selfe towards vs, lest ye compell me (which I shal do against my will) to recede and depart vtterly from your obedience.

Spoken like a king.

The king sent a point to feast the popes obstinacie.

At the same terme also hee sent another letter or epistle to the said pope, crauing of him the pall for Gerardus archbishop of Yorke, the forme whereof here also followeth.

Another letter of king Henrie the first, sent to the pope

Reuerendo & diligendo patri vniuersali papæ Paschali, Henricus Dei gratia rex Anglorum salutem. Amor quem plurimum erga vos habeo, & benignitas qua multum vestros alios exornat, &c.

In English.

To the reuerend and welbeloued father, vniuersall pope Paschalis, Henrie by the grace of God, king of England, greeting. The great loue which I beare to you, and the no lesse gentlenesse in you, which not a little beautifieth your doings, diminisheth to me boldnesse to write. And whereas I thought to haue retained still this Gerardus with me, and to haue craued your pall for him by letters: yet notwithstanding, when his desire could not otherwise be satisfied, but would needs present himselfe before your prefence, by his owne heart to craue of you the same, I haue sent him vp vnto you, desiring your beningne fatherhood in his behalfe, that he obtaining the pall at your hands, may be sent home againe to me. And thus requiring the affistance of your praiers, I pray the Lord long to continue your apostleship.

This second letter of the king in sending for the pall, was well taken of all the court of Rome, which (as mine author saith) procured such fauor to Gerardus archbishop of Yorke, and bringer therof: that no complaint of his aduersaries afterwards could hurt him with the pope. Notwithstanding he was accused grieuously for diuers things, and specially for not standing to the consecration of Anselme archbishop of Canturburie.

Polydorus in his eleuenth booke of his English historie affirmeth, that Anselmus also went vp to Rome with Gerardus about the same cause. But both the premises and sequell of the storie argue that to be untrue, for what needed the two monks to be sent vp on Anselms side, if hee had gone vp himselfe? Againe, how could the pope write downe by the said messengers to Anselme, if hee had there been himselfe present? For so proceedeth the storie by the narration of Malmesburie and others.

After

The pope seeth against the king.

After the ambassadors (thus on both sides sent vp to Rome) had laboured their cause with instant suite, one against the other: the pope glad to gratifie the king (yet loth to grant his request, being against his owne profit, and therefore more inclining to Anselmus side) sendeth downe his letters to the said Anselme, signifying that he would not repeale the statutes of his holy fathers for one mans pleasure: charging him moreouer, not only not to presse in the cause of inuesting, but constantly to adhere to the foresaid decrement of pope Urban his predecessor, &c. Besides this letter to Anselme, he directed also another to the king himselfe: which letter, mine author saith, the king suppressed and did not shew, onely declaring by word of mouth, that the ambassadors had said vnto him from the pope. Which was, that he permitted vnto him the licence of inuesting, vpon condition that in other things hee would execute the office of a good prince, &c. To this also the testimony of the two bishops aboue minded, did accord, which made the matter more probable. But the two monks on the other side replied againe, bringing forth the letter of Anselme to the contrary, &c. To them was answered againe, that more credit was to be giuen to the degree and testimony of the bishops, then to theirs. And as for monks, they had no sufferage nor testimony (said they) in secular matters, and therefore they might hold their peace. But this is no secular matter, said Walwaine abbat of Ramsie. Whereunto the nobles against the kings part answered, saying, that he was a good man, and of such demeanor, as they had nothing to say against him, neither so would if they might: but yet both humane and diuine reason taught them so, to preferre more credit and confidence to the testimony of three bishops, then of two monks. Whereby may well appeare, that Anselme at that time went not with them. Then Anselme seeing the king and his peeres how they were set, and hearing also the testimony of the three bishops, against whom he saw he could not preuaile, and also hauing the popes scale, which hee saw to be to prudent on the contrary side, made his answere againe; that he would send to Rome for a more certainty of truth. Adding moreouer, that he neither would, nor durst giue ouer his cause, though it should cost him his life, to do or proceed against the determination of the church of Rome, vnlesse he had a perfect warrant of abolution from thence, for his discharge. Then was it agreed by the king and his nobles, that hee should not send, but go himselfe to Rome. And much intercourse was made, that he would take that iourny in hand himselfe, in his owne person, to put somthing to the pope for the peace of the church and of his country. And so at the length, by perswasion, was content, went to Rome, and spake with the pope. In short time after followeth also the kings ambassador (William Warlwast) newly elect bishop of Exceter, who there pleading on the kings side, for the ancient customes of the realme, and for the kings right of inuesting, &c. first declared, how England of a long continuance had euer bin a prouince peculiar to the church of Rome, and how it paied duly his yearely tribute vnto the same. Inferring moreouer how the king, as he was of nature verie liberal, so also of courage a prince stout and valiant. Then what a shame would he thinke it should be to him (as it were indeed) if he, who in might and dignity far exceeded all his progenitors, should not defend and maintaine the liberties and customes by them procured? Wherefore he desired the pope to see to the matter, so as might stand both with the kings honor, and also with his owne profit and aduantage; who otherwise no doubt should lose a great peece of mony out of the realme, vnlesse he did remit some thing of the seuerity of his canons and lawes decreetall.

Anselme refuseth to do homage to the king.

The effect of the oration of Gul. Warlwast at the popes court.

With these and such other perswasions like to the same effect, the court of Rome was well contented, agreeing that the kings requeft ought with all fauor to be granted. But the pope and Anselme sat still marking their doings. The ambassador supposing their silence to be a halfe a yeelding vnto him, added moreouer and said; that the king, no not for the crowne of his realme, would lose the authority of inuesting or admitting his prelats within his dominion. Whereunto the proud pope answering againe, burst out in these words: Nor I (said he) for the price of this head (as thou seest) will lose the giuing of spiritual promotions in England, and confirming it with an oth: Before God saith he I speake it, know it for a certaine, &c. Then it followeth in the story of Malmesbury: With this word of the pope, the mindes of the rest were changed, saying: Benedicta sit cordis tui constantia, benedicta oris tui loquela. The kings attorny also was thereuith dashed, who notwithstanding yet brought to passe, that certaine of the kings customes vsed before of his father, were released vnto him. At the which time in the same court was decreed, that (the king only which had inuested them, being excepted) the other which were inuested by the king, to be excommunicated: the absolution and satisfaction of whom, was left to Anselme the archbishop.

Excommunication abused.

Thus Anselme being dismissed from Rome, took his iourney toward England. But the ambassador pretending to goe to S. Nicolas remained behinde, to see whether he could win the popes mind to the kings purpose. Which when he saw it would not be, he ouertaketh Anselme by the way, at Placentia, and opened to him the kings pleasure. The king (saith he) giueth to you in charge and commandement, that if you will come to England, and there behaue your selfe to him, as your predecessors did to his father, you should be receiued and retained in the realme accordingly: if not, you are wise enough (saith he) ye know what I meane, and what will follow, &c. And so with these words parting from him, returned againe to the king. Anselme remained at Lions a yere and a halfe, writing diuers letters to the king, after this effect, and words as followeth.

Anselme remaineth three yeares in banishment.

Ex Guliel. Londinensi.

To his reuerend lord, Henry, king of England,
Anselme, archbishop of Canturbury, faithfull seruice with praiers. Epist. 224.

A letter of Anselme to the king.

Although you vnderstand by William Warlwast, what we haue done at Rome; yet I shall shortly shew you that belongeth to mee. When I came to Rome, I declared the cause wherefore I came to the lord pope. He answered that he would not swarue from the statutes of his predecessors. Furthermore, he commanded me that I should haue no fellowship with them that receiued inuestings of churches at your hands, after the knowledge of this prohibition, except they will doe penance, and forsake that they had receiued, without hope of recouery, neither that they should communicate with the other bishops that had confecrated such men, except they would present themselues to the iudgement of the apostolike sea. The foresaid William can be a witnesse of all these things if he will. This William when we departed asunder (reckoning vp in your behalfe the loue and liberalitie which you haue had alwaies towards me) warned me as your archbishop, that I should shew my selfe such a one, that if I would come into England, that I might be with you as my predecessour was with your father: and yee might intreat me with the same honour and liberality that you father intreated my predecessor. By which words I vnderstand, that except I should shew my selfe such a one, you would not haue mee come into England. For your loue and liberalitie I thanke you: but that I should bee with you as my predecessor was with your father, I cannot doe it. For I dare not do homage to you, nor dare communicate with them that take inuestings of churches at your hands: because of the foresaid inhibition made, I my selfe hearing it. Wherefore I desire you to send me your pleasure heerein (if it pleafe you) whether I may returne into England (as I said) with your peace, and power of mine office.

The proud stoutnesse of a prelate in a strong cause.

In the meane while, great businesse there was, and much posting went to and fro betweene the king, the archbishop, and the pope, but nothing was done: for neither would the pope agree to the king, neither would the king condescend to the archbishop. At last, the archbishop seeing by no meanes he could prouaile against the king, thought to reuenge himselfe by excommunication, and so went about the same. The king, hauing word thereof by the countesse Adela his sister, besought her to come to him into Normandy, and bring Anselme with her: whereupon (through the means of the countesse) reconcilement was made, and the archbishop was restored to his former possessions againe. Only his returne into England was deferred, because he would not communicat with those whom the king had inuested. So the king take his passage ouer into England, and Anselme made his abode at the abbay of Beeke.

Anselme whom to excommunicate the king.

Reconcilement made betweene the king and Anselme.

Then were ambassadors againe directed vnto Rome. William Warlwast, and Waldwin aboue named, abbat of Ramesey, who at length concluded the long controuersie betweene the king and the pope, vpon this agreement, that the king should take homage of the bishops elect, but should not deale with inuesting them by staffe and ring, &c. While the ambassadors were thus in their suite at Rome, diuers complaints were dailie brought from England to Anselme, against the priests and canons, who in his absence, contrary to the late councell holden at London, recliued their wiues into their houses againe, and so were permitted by the king, paying him certaine money for the same. Anselme (the foe enemy against all marriage) aggrieued therewith, addresseth his letters vnto the king, requiring him to refraine from any more taking of such creations; declaring moreouer and affirming, that the offences of all such ecclesiastical maisters, must be corrected by the instance of bishops, and not of lay men. To this the king answereth gently againe by letters, tempering himselfe, how he purposed shortly to come ouer into Normandy, and if he had done any thing amisse, either in these or other things, he would reforme it by his obedience.

Ambassage to Rome.

Popish priests and their wiues against the decree of the councell.

The faults of ecclesiasticall ministers belong to your but to bishops to correct, saieth Anselme.

It was not long after, the messengers being now returned from Rome) but the king as he had promised, sped him into Normandy, where hee warring against his brother Robert, brought both him and the country of Normandy at last vnder his subiection. But first meeting with Anselme at the abby of Becke, he consented and agreed with him in all such points as the archbishop required. As first, that all his churches, which before were made tributary vnto king William his brother, now should remaine free from all tribute. Item, that he should require nothing of the said churches or pramices in the time of the seat being vacant. Moreouer, concerning such priests and ministers, as had giuen mony to the king for their company with their wiues, it was agreed that they should surceasse from all all ecclesiasticall function, the space of three yeres, and that the king should take no more after such maner. Item, that all such goods, fruits, and possessions, as had ben taken away before from the archbishoprike, should be restored at his comming again vnto England, &c.

Vniforme return into England.

This Anselme, the stout champion of popery and superstition, after this victory gotten vpon the king, for the which he so long fought; with ioy and triumph sailed into England, hauing all his popish requests obtained. Where first he sticketh like a lion vpon the married priests, contrary to the word of God, diuorcing and punishing that by mans authority, which the eternall and almighty God had coupled. Fort, he watcheth them, which did hold any church by fauor vnder the king. Against simony likewise, and against them that married within the seuenth degree, he proceedeth with his full pontificall authority.

Priests driuen out of their liuings.

Shortly after, as king Henry had finished his warre in Normandy, and with victory returned againe into England, about the thirtieth yere of his raigne, Anselme archbishop of Canturbury, by the permission of the king) assembled a great councell at Westminster in London, of the clergy and prelats of England.

In the which by the bishop of Romes authority he so wrought with the king, that at length, albeit (as the story saith) not without great difficulty, it was newly confirmed and enacted, that no temporall man after that day, should make inuesture with crosse or with ring, or with pastorall staue. In this councell sunday and diuers iniunctions were giuen forth to priests and deacons: as diuers other synodall acts also by the same Anselme had ben concluded in other councels before. And because here falleth in mention of the acts synodall concluded in the time of this Anselme, I thought here good to packe them all in one generall heape together, as we find them in Malmesburie, and in other sundry authors scatteringly recited.

The first thing decreed by this Anselme in his synodal councels, was touching the fault of simonie, whereby diuers both bishops and abbats (as is aforesaid) were at the same time deposed. And lay men forbidden to conferre any ecclesiasticall promotion.

Also it was decreed, that no bishop should beare any office in secular matters, business or meetings. And that such should not goe apparelled as the lay men did, but should haue their vestures decent and meet for religious persons. And that in all places they should neuer go without some to beare witnesse of their conuersation.

Priests apparell.

Item, that no archdeaconries should be let out to farme.

Archdeaconries not to be farmed.

Item, that no archdeacon should be vnder the degree of a deacon.

Item, that no archdeacon, priest, deacon, subdeacon, colligener, nor canon, should from thenceforth marry a wife, nor yet keep her if he had ben married to one before.

Marriage of priests forbidden.

Item, that euery subdeacon, being vnder the degree of a canon (after the profession of chastity, marrying a wife) should be subiect to the same rule.

Vow of chastitie brought in.

They ordained also, that a priest keeping company with his wife, should be reputed vnlawfull, and that he should say no masse; and of the said masse he should not be heard.

Benefices not to goe by hereditage.

They charged that none were admitted to orders from that time forward, from the degree of a subdeacon, vnlesse he did profesle chastitie.

That priests sonnes should not claime by heritage the benefices of their fathers, as the custome had alwaies bene before.

Item, that no spirituall person should sit in any secular office, as to be procurators or iudges of bloud.

How they were set out in Scotland for lost chancellor in queene Maries time.

Item, that priests should not resort to tauernes, or bankets, nor sit drinking by the fire side.

That the garments of priests should be of one colour, and that their shoes should be decent.

Priests crowns Tithes. Diuers of parishes. Building of chapels. Who to church or not. Baptisme priuie. Abbats to minister no warre.

Item, that the men of the clergy should weare broad crownes.

Item, that no tithes should be giuen but to the church.

Item, that no churches or prebends should be bought.

That no new chapels should bee made without consent of the bishop.

That no church should be hallowed, before the necessary provision were made for the priest, and for the church to be maintained.

That abbats should set forth no men to warre, and that they must both sleep and eat in the same house with their monks, vnlesse some great necessity do let.

Monks limited to giuing penance.

Item, that monks doe inioine no penance to any man without the knowledge of his abbat. And that their abbats may giue no licence therein, but onely for such persons whose charge they haue of soule.

Monks no godfathers, nor nuns godmothers.

That no monks should bee godfathers, nor nuns godmothers.

Abby lands.

Item, that monks should haue no lordships to farme.

Item, that monks should take no churches but by the bishop, neither should so spoile and oppresse the churches giuen to them, with their rents, that sufficient were not left for the ministers of the same.

Impropriation restrained.

That priuie contract betweene man and woman without witnesse should not stand, but be frustrat if each party doe goe from the contract.

Diuy contracts.

Rounding.

Item, that such as weare long haire of the clergy, be so rounded, that part of their care appeare, and that their eies be not couered.

Item, that there be no matrimoniall copulation, within the seuenth degree of kindred, nor so to continue if they bee married: but the marriage to be broken. And if any being priuie to that incest, do not detect the same, he to be guilty of the same crime.

Marriage within the seuenth degree restrained.

Item, that no funerall or burpings be without their owne parish church, so that the priest thereof doe lose that which to him is due.

Burpings.

Item, that no man vpon any new fangled rashnesse, do attribute any reuerence or opinion of holinesse to dead mens bodies, to foure tapers, or to any other thing (as the vse hath been in times past) without authority of the bishop.

No holinesse to be giuen to tapers and places.

Item, that no buying and selling be vsed hereafter in England of men, as of other cattell.

Selling and buying of men.

Item, after the restraint of priests marriage, when filthy sodomitry began to come in the place thereof, then were they forced also to make an act for that, which was this.

Sodomitry.

With a grieuous curse we condemne both them that occupie the abhominations vice of sodomitry, and them also that willingly assist them, as be wicked doers with them in the same, till such time as they may deserue absolution by penance and confession.

A law with a fat tail for sodomitry.

So that whatsoeuer he be that is noised or proued to be of this wickednes (if he be a religious person) he shal from thence forth be promoted to no degree of honor, and that which he hath shall be taken from hir

If he be a lay person, he shall bee deprined of all his freedome within the land, and be no better then a forreiner.

And because it shal be knowne, the absolution of such as be secular, belong only to bishops: it was therfore enacted, that on euery sunday in euery parish church of England, the said excommunication should be published, &c.

Exempl. Anselmi.

Romes the prepostrous vnreasoning of Anselme in creating the vice of sodomitry.

But marke in this great matter what followed. For as Ranulphus Cestrensis witnesseth: this grieuous generall curse was soone called backe against by the sute of certaine, which perswaded Anselme, that the publication or opening of that vice gaue kindling to the same in the hearts of lewd persons, ministring occasion of more boldnesse to them to doe the like. And so to stop the occasion of filthy sodomitry, the publication thereof was taken away: but the forbidding and restreinement of priests vnlawfull marriage (which chiefly was the cause thereof) remained still. And thus euer since horrible sodomitry remained in the clergy both for lacke of marriage more vsed, and for lacke of publication lesse punished.

Ranulph. Cestrensis, lib. 7.

Besides all these synodall acts aboue comprehended, and giuen out by Anselme in his councels before, here also in this present councell at Westminster, in the yeere of this king aforesaid, he also directed other new iniunctions to the priests.

First, that they and their wiues should neuer more meet in one house, neither yet haue dwelling in their territories.

Penalties and forfeits against priests that keepe their wiues.

Item, that the priests, deacons, and subdeacons, should keepe no woman in their house, vnlesse they were of their next kin.

Item, for such as had dissenered themselues from the society of their wiues, yet for some honest cause they had to common with them, they might, so it were without daunger, and with two or three lawfull witnesses.

In the latter ende shal come false teachers, forbidding mariage, and eating of meats, &c.

Item, if any of them should be accused by two or three witnesses, and could not purge himselfe against by strable men of his owne order (if he be a priest, or if he be a deacon by foure, or by he a subdeacon by two) then he should be iudged a transgressor of the statutes, depriued of his benefice, and be made infamous, or be put to open reproch of all men.

Item, he that rebelled, as in contempt of this new statute, held still his wife, and presumed to say masse, vpon the eight day after (if he made not due satisfaction) should be seuerely excommunicated.

Item, all archdeacons and deacons to be straitly sworne, not to winke or dissemble at their meetings, nor to beare with them for mony. And if they would not be sworne to this, then to lose their offices without recouery.

Purification of priests that had been maried.

Item, such priests as for saking their wiues, were willing to serue still and remaine in their holy order, first must cease forty daies from their ministration, setting vicars for them in the meane time to serue; and taking such penance vpon them, as by their bishop should be intoined them.

Thus haue ye heard the tedious treatise of the life and doings of Anselme, how superstitious in his religion, how stubborne against his prince he was, what occasion of warre and discord hee ministred by his complaints (if they had bene taken) what scale without right knowledge, what seruencie without cause he pretended, what paines without profit hee take. Who if he had bestowed that time and trauell in preaching thing Christ at home to his flocke, which he take in gladding to Rome, to complaine of his country, in my minde he had ben better occupied. Moreouer, what violent and tyrannicall iniunctions he set forth of inuesting and other things, yee haue heard; but specially against the lawfull and godly mariage of priests. Wherein, what a vehement aduersary he was, here may appeare by these minutes or peces extracted out of his letters, which we haue here annexed; in forme and effect as followeth.

A letter of Anselme.

Anselme archbishop, to his brethren and dearest sonnes the Lord prior and others at Canturbury.

King Henry permitted priests to haue both churches and wiues. Exempl. Anselmi. 77. & 171. Pope Paschal hath so decreed it at Rome. Ergo priests must haue no wiues.

AS concerning priests, of whom the king commanded that they should haue both their churches and their women as they had in the time of his father, & of Lanfrancus archbishop: both because the king hath reuested and reseized of the whole archbishopricke, & because so cursed a mariage was forbidden in a councell in the time of his father and of the said archbishop: boldly I command by the authority which I haue by my archbishopricke, not onely within my archbishopricke, but also throughout England: that all priests which keepe women, shall be depriued of their churches and ecclesiasticall benefices.

A letter of pope Paschalis to Anselme.

Paschal bishop, seruant of Gods seruants, to his reuerend brother Anselme, archbishop of Canturbury, greeting and apostolicall blessing.

Exempl. Anselmi. Pope Paschal writeth that he would haue the church now come by Iesus children, which burt the were it to the church for priests to haue wiues.

WE beleeue your brotherhood is not ignorant what is decreed in the Romish church concerning priests children. But because there is so great multitude of such within the realm of England, that almost the greater and better part of the clerks are reckoned to be on this side: therefore we commit this dispentation to your cure. For we grant these to be promoted to holy offices by reason of the need at this time, and for the profit of the church (such as learning and life shall commend among you) that yet notwithstanding the preiudice of the ecclesiasticall decree be taken heed to hereafter, &c.

Another letter of Anselme for inuesting.

To the reuerend lord and louing father Paschal high bishop, Enselme seruant of Canturbury church, due subiection and continuall praiers.

King Henry and his nobles ready to forsake the Romish church.

AFter that I returned to my bishoprick in England, I shewed the apostolicall decree: which I being present, heard in the Romish councell. 1. That no man should receiue inuesting of churches at the kings hand, or any lay person, or should become his man for it, and that no man should presume to consecrat him that did offend herein. When the king and his nobles, and the bishops themselues, and others of the lower degree heard these things, they took them so grieuously, that they said they would in no case agree to the thing, and that they would driue me out of the kingdome, and forsake the Romish church, rather then keep this thing. Wherefore reuerend father, I desire your counsell by your letter, &c.

Another letter of Anselme.

Anselme archbishop, to the reuerend Gudulphus bishop, and to Arnulphus prior, and to William archdeacon of Canturbury, and to all in his diocesse, greeting.

A letter of Anselme against priests receiuing again their wiues. Exempl. 17. Priests excommunicated for receiuing again their wiues.

WIlliam our archdeacon hath written vnto me, that some priests that be vnder his custody (taking againe their women that were forbidden) haue fallen vnto the vnclennes from the which they were drawne by wholesome counsell and commandement. When the archdeacon would amend this thing, they vtterly despised with wicked pride, his warning and worthy commandement to be receiued. Then he calling together many religious men and obedient priests, excommunicated worthily the proud and disobedient, that beastly despised the curse, and were not afraid to defile the holy ministery, as much as lay in them, &c.

Exempl. 155. Whether to more mercy for a monke to cause himselfe in the chapter to be whipped, or to suffer obediently the whipping of his abbat.

Vnto these letters aboue prefixed, I haue also adioined an other of the said Anselme, touching a great cale of conscience, of a monks whipping of himselfe. Wherein may appeare both the blind and lamentable superstition of those religious men, and the iudgement of this Anselme in the same matter.

Another letter of Anselme.

Anselme archbishop, to Bernard manke of the abby of S. Warburg, greeting and praier.

A terrible example for corrupt iudges to beware.

A letter of Anselme.

I Heard it said of your lord abbat, that thou iudgest it to be of greater merit, when a monke either beateth himselfe, or defireth himselfe to be beaten of another; then when he is beaten (not of his owne will) in the chapter, by the commandement of the prelacie. But is not so as you think. For that iudgement that any man commandeth to himselfe, is kingly. But that which he suffereth by obedience in the chapter is monkish. The one is of his owne will, the other is of obedience, and not of his owne will. That which I call kingly, kings and rich proud men command to be done to themselues. But that which I call monkish, they take, not commanding, but obaying. The kingly is so much easier, by how much it agreeth to the will of the sufferer. But the monkish is so much the grieuouser, by how much it differeth from the will of the sufferer. In the kingly iudgement, the sufferer is iudged to be his owne: in the monkish he is proued not to be his owne. For although the king or rich man, when he is beaten, willingly sheweth himselfe humbly to be a sinner; yet he would not submit himselfe to this humblenesse at any others commandement, but would withstand the commander with all his strength. But when a monke submitteth himselfe to the whip humbly in the chapter at the will of the prelat; the truth iudgeth him to be of so much greater merit, by how much he humbleth himselfe more, and more truly then the other. For hee humbleth himselfe to God only, because he knoweth his sinnes. But this man humbleth himselfe to man for obedience. But he is lowlier that humbleth himselfe both to God and man for Gods cause, then he which humbleth himselfe to God only, and not to Gods commandement. Therefore if he that humbleth himselfe, shall be extolled, Ergo he that more humbleth himselfe, shall be more exalted. And where I said, that when a monk is whipped, that it differeth from his will; you must not so vnderstād it, as though he would not patiently beare it with an obedient will; but because by a naturall appetite he would not suffer the sorrow. But if ye say, I doe not so much flie the open beating for the paines (which I feele also secretly) as for the shame: know then that hee is stronger that reioiceth to beare this for obedience sake. Therefore be thou sure, that one whipping of a monke by obedience, is of more merit then innumerable whippings taken by his owne mind. But whereas hee is such, that alwaies he ought to haue his heart ready without murmuring obediently to be whipped, we ought to iudge him then to be of a great merit, whether hee be whipped priuily or openly, &c.

The iudgement or conclusion of Anselme vpon the case. False opinion of merit.

And thus much concerning Anselme archbishop of Canturbury, whose stout example gaue no little courage to Thurstinus and Becket his successors, and others that followed after, to do the like against their kings and princes, as in processe hereafter by the grace of Christ shall appeare.

About this time 1105. two famous archbishops of Mentz being right vertuous and well disposed prelats, were cruelly and tyrannously beat withall, and intreated by the bishop of Rome: their names were Henry and Christian. This Henry hauing intelligence that hee was complained of to the pope, sent a learned man (a special friend of his) to excuse him, named Arnold, one for whom he had much bone, and promoted to great liuings and promottons. But this honest man Arnold, in stead of an excuser, become an accuser, driuing the two elect cardinals with gods gold, by which meanes he obtained of them these three cardinals to be sent as inquisitors and ouerlookers in that present case. The which (comming to Germany) summoned the said Henry, and deposed him of his archbishopricke (for all he could doe) either by law or iustice: substituting in his place the foresaid Arnold, vpon hope (truly) of the ecclesiasticall gold. Whereupon that vertuous and honorable Henry (as the story telleth) spake vnto those his peruerse iudges on this wise: If I should appeale vnto the apostolike sea for this your vniust proceise had against mee, perhaps the pope would attempt nothing any more therein then yee haue, neither should I winne any thing by it, but only taste of body, losse of goods, affliction of mind, care of heart, and mifling of his sauor.

Wherefore I doe appeale vnto the Lord Iesus Christ, as to the most high and iust iudge, and cite you before his iudgement, there to answer me before the high iudge. For neither iustly nor godly (but by corruption as it pleaseth you) you haue iudged. Whereunto they scoffingly answered (Go your first, and we will follow, for long after (as the story is) the said Henry died. Whereof the said two cardinals hauing intelligence, sent one to the other iestingly, Behold, he is gone before, and we must follow according to our promise. And verily they said truer then they were aware of: for within a while they died in one day. For the one sitting vpon a iakes to ease himselfe, voided out all his intrailes into the draught, and miserably ended his life. The other gnawing off the fingers of his hands, and spitting them out of his mouth (all deformed in deuouring himselfe) died. And in likewise, not long after the end of these men, the foresaid Arnold (most horrible) in a sedition was slaine; and certaine daies (lying stinking aboue the ground vnburied) was open to the scoffe of euery rascall and harlot. The historiographer in declaring hereof crieth vpon the cardinals in this manner: O ye cardinals, yee are the beginning and authors hereof. Come ye hither therefore, come yet hither, and heape and carry into your countries the diuell, and offer your selues to him with that mony, wherof ye haue been most gluttonous and insatiable.

About the same time and yeere when king Henry began his raigne, pope Paschalis entred his papacy, succeeding after Urbanus, about the yeere of the Lord 1100, nothing swarning from the steps of Hildebrand his superior. This Paschalis being elected by the cardinals, after that the people had cried thrice, Saint Peter hath chosen god Rainerius, hee then putting on a purple vesture, and a tire vpon his head, was brought vpon a white palfray into Lateran, where a sceptor was giuen him, and a guilde put about him, hauing seuen keies, with seuen seales hanging thereupon for a remembrance or token of his seuen-fold power, according to the seuen-fold grace of the holy Ghost: of binding, losing, shutting, opening, sealing, resigning, and vnbinding. After this Paschalis was elected pope, Henry the fourth, the forsaid emperor (of courage most valiant, if the time had serued thereto) thought to come vp to Italy to salute the new pope. But vnderstanding the popes mind bent against him, he changed his purpose. In the meane time, Paschalis to shew himselfe vnkinde to Hildebrand in no point, began first to depose all such abbats and bishops whom the emperor had set vp. Also banished Albertus, Theodoricus, and Magiualphus striuing at the same time for the papacie. I spake before of Guibert, whom Henry the emperour had made pope against Hildebrand. Against this Guibert, Paschalis made out an army, who being put to flight, not long after departed.

Rainucci at Treuis.

About the same time, Anno 1101, the bishop of Florence began to teach and to preach of antichrist then to be borne and to be manifest, as Sabellicus testifieth: whereupon Paschalis assembling a councel, put to silence the said bishop, and condemned his bookes. In this councell at Treuis, priests that were married were condemned for Nicolaitans. Item, according to the decree of Hildebrand, all such of what degree or estate soeuer they were, being laymen, that gaue any ecclesiasticall dignities, were condemned of simonie. Furthermore, the statute of priests tithes there he renewed, counting the selling away thereof as a sinne against the holy Ghost. Concerning the excommunication and other troubles, that Hildebrand wrought against Henricus the fourth emperor, it is declared sufficiently before. This excommunication Paschalis the pope renewed afresh against the said Henry. And not onely that, but also conuenting the princes of Germany vnto a generall assembly set vp his owne sonne against him, causing the bishop of Mentz, of Cullen, and of Wormes, to depriue him of his imperiall crowne, and to place his sonne Henricus the fifth in his fathers kingdome, and so they did. Comming to the place at Bilgedeim, first they required his diadem, his purple, his ring, and other ornaments pertaining to the crowne, from him. The emperor denyeth the cause, being then excommunicat and void of friends. They pretending against (I cannot tell what) for selling of bishoprickes, abbacies, and other ecclesiasticall dignities for mony also alleaging the popes pleasure and of other princes. Then required he first of the bishop of Mentz (and likewise of the other two, whom he had preferred to their bishoprickes before) asking them in order, if he had receiued of them any penie for his promoting them to their dignities. This when they could not deny to be so: Well saith he, and doe you requite me against with this? With diuers other words of exhortation, admonishing them to remember their oth and allegiance to their prince. But the periured prelats, neither reuerencing his maiestie, nor moued with his benefits, nor regarding their fidelity, ceased not for all this, but first plucked from him (sitting in his throne) his crowne imperiall, then disaulturned him, taking from him his purple and his scepter. The cheefe emperor being left desolat and in confusion, saith to them: Videat Deus & iudicet: that is, let God see and iudge. Thus leauing him, they went to his sonne to confirme him in his kingdome, and caused him to driue his father out. Who then being chased of his owne sonne, hauing but nine persons about him, did flie by the duke dome of Lunbugh, where the duke being then in hunting, perceiuing and hearing of him, made after to follow him. The emperor fearing no other but present death (for he had displaced the same duke before out of his dukedome) submitted himselfe, crauing of him pardon, and not reuengement. The duke full of compassion, and pitying his estate, not only remitted all his displeasure, but also receiued him to his castell. Soone ouer, collecting his souldiors and men of war, brought him to Cullen, and there was well receiued. His sonne hearing this, besieged the citie of Cullen. But the father by night escaping, came to Leodium, where resorted to him all such as were men of compassion and of constant heart. In so much, that his power being strong enough, hee was now able to pitch a field against his enemies, and so did; desiring his friends that if he had the victory, they would spare his sonne. In fine, (the battell ioined) the father had the victory, the sonne was put to flight: many being slain on both sides. But shortly after, the battell renewed againe, the sonne preuailed, the father was ouercome and taken. Who then being vtterly dispossessed of his kingdome, was brought to that exigent, that comming to Spire, was faine to craue of the bishop there, whom he had done much for before) to haue a prebend in the church; and for that he had some skill of his booke, he desired to serue in our ladies quire. Yet could he not obtaine so much at his hand, who swore by our lady, he should haue none there. Thus the wofull emperor, most vnkindly handled, and repulsed on euery side) came to Leodium, and there for sorow died, after he had raigned fifty yeers, whose body Paschalis after his funerall caused to be taken vp againe, and to be brought to Shires, where it remained fiue yeeres vnburied. Ex Helmoldo, & Gotfrido Viterbiensi.

After the decease of this emperor Henry the fourth, his sonne Henricus the fifth raigned the space of twenty yeeres. Who comming to Rome to be crowned of the pope, could not obtaine it, before hee would fully assent to haue this ratified, that no emperor should haue any thing to do with the election of the Romain bishop, or with other bishoprickes. Besides that, (about the same time) such a stir was made in Rome by the said bishop, that if the emperor had not defended himselfe with his owne hands, he had been slaine. But as it happened, the emperor hauing the victory, amongst many other Romans (which were partly slaine, partly taken in the same skirmish) he taketh also the pope, and leadeth him out of the citie: where he indenteth with him vpon diuers conditions, both of his coronation, and of recouering againe his right and title in the election of the pope, and of other bishops: whereunto the pope assenting, agreed to all. So the emperor (being crowned of Paschalis) returned againe with the pope to Rome.

The pope taken prisoner.

All the conditions betweene the emperor and the pope (so long as the emperor remained at Rome) stood firme and ratified. But as soone as the emperor was returned againe to Germany, forthwith the pope calling a synod, not only reuoked all that he had agreed to before: but also excommunicated Henricus the emperor, as hee had done his father before, repeuing the former Priuilegium for prauilegium. The emperor returning from Rome to France, there married Mathild daughter to king Henry. Who then hearing what the pope had done, (grieued not a little) with all expedition marcheth to Rome, and putteth the pope to flight, and finally placeth another in his stead. In the meane time the bishops of Germany (the popes good friends) slept not their businesse, inceasing the Saxons all that they might against their Cesar: in so much that a great commotion was stirred vp, and grew at length to a pitcht field: which was fought in the month of February, by the word called Sylua Caruiaira, in the yeere of our Lord one thousand one hundred and fiftéene.

War raised by the pope and his papists.

The emperor seeing no end of these conflicts (vnlesse hee would yeeld to the pope) was faine to giue ouer, and forgoe his praueledge, falling to a composition, not to meddle with matters pertaining to the popes electio, nor with inuesting nor such other things belonging to the church and churchmen. And thus was the peace betweene them concluded, and proclaimed to no smal reioicing of both the armies, then lying by Wormes, neere the riuer of Rhene.

Peace concluded betweene the emperor and the pope.

All this while Henricus the emperor had no issue (hauing to wife Mathildis, the daughter of Henry the first, king of England, and that by the iust iudgement of God, as it may appeare. For as he hauing a father, persecuted him by the popes setting on, contrary to the part of a naturall son: so Gods prouidence did not suffer him to be the father of any child, naturally to loue him, or to succeed him.

Example of the lobs iust retribution and iudgement.

After the death of Paschalis, An. 1118, succeeded pope Gelasius, chosen by the cardinals, but without the consent of the emperor, whereupon rose no little variance in Rome. And at length another pope was set vp by the emperour called Gregorius the eighth, and Gelasius driuen away into France, and there died. After whom came Calixtus the second, (chosen likewise by a few cardinals, without the voice of the emperour) who comming vp to Rome to inioy his seat, first sent his legat into Germany to excommunicat the emperor: Henricus, who then hauing diuers conflicts with his fellow pope Gregorius, at length drawe him out of Rome. At this time by this occasion, great disputation and controuersie was betweene the emperor and the popes court, whether of them in dignitie should excell the other: wherof reasons and arguments on both sides were alleaged, as in the verses here following are comprehended.

In conclusion, the emperor being ouercome so much with the vaine reasons of the popes side, and fearing the dangerous thunderbolt of his curse (talking with princes and perswaded by his friends) was faine to condescend to the vnreasonable conditions of the pope. First to ratifie his election, notwithstanding the other pope (whom the said emperor had set vp) yet was aliue. Secondly, that he should resigne vp his right and title in matters pertaining to the election of the pope, and inuesture of bishops.

This being done and granted, and the writings thereof set vp in the church of Lateran for a triumph of the emperor: thus subdued, the pope maketh out after Gregorius his fellow pope, being then in a towne called Sutrium, being besieged and taken. Gregorius also was taken. Whom Calixtus the pope, sitting vpon a camell (his face to the camels taile) brought him so through the stretes of Rome, holding the taile in his hand in stead of a bridle, and afterward being vnone, was thrust into a monastery.

Gregorius brought into Rome by the pope, his face to the hoyse taile. Ex Platina. Vincentio. Sicilo &c.

Amongst many other acts done by this glorious pope, first he established the decrees of the papall sea against this emperor. He brought in the fours quarter fasts, called ember daies. Dist. 70. cap. Ieiunium.

The ember daies by whom they were brought in, and when.

By the same Calixtus, the order of monks called Præmonstratenses were brought in.

Præmonstratenses.

Further, by him it was decreed to be iudged for aduiterie, if any person (by his life time) had put from him either bishopricke or benefice, grounding vpon this scripture of S. Paul to the Romans: Alligata est vxor legi viri, quam diu vir eius viuit: eo defuncto, soluta est a lege viri, &c. That is, The wife is bound to the law of her husband, so long as the husband liueth: after he is dead, she is loose from the law of her husband, &c.

Scripture cleerly applied of the pope.

Item, the same Calixtus holding a generall councell at Rhemis, decreed that priests, deacons, and subdeacons should put away their concubines and wiues: or else, whosoeuer was found to keepe his wife, to be depriued of benefice, and all other ecclesiasticall liuings: whereupon a certaine English writer made these verses following:

Priests and ministers compelled to leaue their wiues.

O bone Calixte, nunc omnis clerus odit te.
Quondam presbyteri poterant vxoribus vti,
Hoc destruxisti, postquam tu papa fuisti, &c.

That is, in good fo wood.

The hatred of the clergy, hast thou good Calixte,
For sometimes priests might vse their wiues right,
But that thou hast reiected, since pope thou wast elected.

And thus much of the Romain matters. Now to our country story againe. After the death of Anselme before mentioned (who deceased the yeere of Christ 1109. after he had been in the sea sixteene yeeres) the church of Canturbury stood void fiue yeers: and the goods of the church were spent to the kings vse. And when he was prayed to helpe the church that was so long without a pastor, his answer was: pretending that where his father and brother had accustomed there to set the best tried and approued men that might be found, to the intent therefore that he might do the same (in chusing such, which either should equall the former examples of them before, or at least follow their footsteps as neere as they could) he take therein the more time and leasure. And so with shift of answer delaied out the time, while he had filled his coffers with the commodities of that benefice.

The same yeere (after the death of Anselme) the king conuerted the abby of Ely to a bishopricke, which before was vnder the bishopricke of Lincolne, placing there Henry bishop of Winegor, the first bishop of that sea. And as of late yeeres before this, diuers wonders were seene, as starres falling from heauen, so thicke that they could not be numbred, at the setting forth of the christians to the holy land: Iornalens. {Anno 1115} Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ libertas.

The next yeere following, Rodulphus bishop of Rochester (an Englishman) was promoted to bee archbishop of Canturbury, and Thurstinus the kings chaplen was elect archbishop of Yorke. Who being content to receiue his benediction of consecration of the sea of Canturbury; yet because he refused to make his profession of obedience to the same sea, he was by the king depriued of his dignity.

Then Thurstin (by the instigation of certaine of his clerks at Yorke) take his iourny to Rome, who there making his complaint to pope Paschalis, brought with him a letter from the pope to the king, where among other words was contained as followeth: Audiuimus electum Eboracensis ecclesiæ, virum sapientem & strenuum, sine iudicio ab Eboracensi sequestratum ecclesia, quod nimirū diuinæ iustitiæ, & S. patrū institutionibus aduersatur. Nos quidem neque Cant. ecclesiam nouis, neque Eboracensem volumus præiudicium pati, sed eam cōstitutionem quæ a B. Gregorio Anglicæ gentis apostolo, inter eas dem ecclesias constituta est, firmam censemus, illibatamque seruari. Idem ergo electus vt iustitia exigit, ad suam ecclesiam omnibus modis reuocetur. Si quid autem quæstionis inter eas dem ecclesias nascitur, præsentibus virisque partibus in vestra præsentia pertractetur, &c.

In English thus:

We heare and vnderstand, that the archbishop elect of the church of Yorke (a discreet and industrious man) is sequestred from the church of Yorke, which standeth against both diuine iustice, and the institution of holy fathers. Our purpose is, that neither the church of Canturbury should be impaired, nor a grame that the church of Yorke should suffer any preiudice, but that the same constitution which was by blessed Gregory (the apostle of the English nation) set and decred betweene those two churches, should remaine still in force and effect inuiolat. Wherefore, as touching the forsaid cleare, let him be receiued again by any meanes, as right and meete it is, vnto his church. And if there be any question betweene the forsaid churches, let it be handled and decided in your presence, both the two parties being there present, &c.

Vpon the occasion of this letter a solemne assembly there was appointed at Saltelbury, about the hearing of this controuerse. The barunce betweene these two prelats it increased more and more. Rodulph archbishop of Canturbury in no case would yeeld nor condescend to giue imposition of hands vnto him, vnlesse he would make his profession of obedience. Thurstin again said he would willingly receiue and imbrace his benediction; but as touching the profession of his subiection, that he would not agree vnto. Then the king declaring his mind therein, signified vnto Thurstin, that without his subiection and obedience professed to the archbishop of Canturbury, hee should not inioy his consecration to bee archbishop of Yorke. Whereunto Thurstin nothing replying againe, renounced his archbishoppricke, promising moreouer to make no more claime vnto it, nor molest them that should inioy it.

{Anno 1116} Assembly of the nobles at Salisbury. Thurstin refuseth to profess subiection to the archbishop of Canturbury. Thurstin promiseth to renounce his archbishoppricke.

Shortly after this, it happened that pope Paschalis died: after whom, as is aboue rehearsed, succeeded pope Gelasius, who liued not past a yeere, and died in France. Whereupon the cardinals (which then followed the said pope Gelasius into Cumiake) created another pope of their chusing, whom they called Calixtus the second. The other cardinals which were at Rome did chuse another pope called Gregory, as mention before is made: about which two popes much stir there was in christian realmes. As this Calixtus was remaining in France, and there calling a generall councell at Rhemis, as he heard before; Thurstinus the archbishop of Yorke desired licence of the king to go to the councell, purposing there to open the cause of his church, which eftsones he obtained: first promising to the king that he should there attempt nothing that should be preiudicial to the church of Canturbury. In the meane time, the king had sent secret word vnto the pope, by Rodulph and other procurators, that in no case he would consecrat Thurstinus. Yet, notwithstanding the faithfull promise of the pope made to the king, to it fell out, that the said pope through the sute of his king, to it fell out, that the said pope through the sute of his king, so it fell out, that the said pope through the sute of his king, to it fell out, that the said pope through the sute of his king, so fore discontented with Thurstin, and warned him the entry of his land.

In this councell at Rhemis (aboue mentioned) where were gathered 434. prelats, these fiue principall acts were concluded.

1. That

Acts of the councell of Nycene.

1 That no man should either buy or sell any bishoprike, abbathip, deanry, archdeaconship, priesthood, prebendship, altar, or any ecclesiastical promotion, or benefice, orders, consecration, church halowing, seat or stall within the quier, or any office ecclesiastical, under danger of excommunication, if he did presse.

2 That no lay person should give investure of any ecclesiastical possession; or that any spirituall man should receive any such at any lay mans hand, under paine of deposiation.

3 That no man should inuade, take away, or detaine the goods or possessions of the church; but that they should remain firme and perpetuall, under paine of perpetuall curse.

4 That no bishop or priest should leave any ecclesiasticall dignitie or benefice to any, by way of inheritance. Adding moreover, that for baptisme, chrisme, anoiling, or burial, no mony should be exacted.

5 Item that all priests, deacons, and subdeacons, should be vtterly debarred and sequestred from company of their wives and concubines, vnder paine of excluding from all christian communion.

Decrees sent to the emperor.

The acts thus determined, were sent ex Nicene to Henricus the emperor, to see and try, before the breaking vp of the councell, whether he would agree to the canonicall elections, free consecration, and inuesting of spirituall persons, and to other acts of the said councell. The emperor misliked and refused, that he would take nothing that ancient custome of his progenitors had given him. Notwithstanding, because of the authority of the generall councell, he was content to consent to the residue, saue only the inuesting of ecclesiasticall function to bee taken from him, to that he would neuer agree. Vpon this, at the next returne of the pope to the councell, the emperor was appointed to be excommunicated. Which thing, when diuers of the councell did not well like, and therefore did separat themselues from the rest, the pope applying against them the multitude of the seuenty disciples which were offended at the Lord, when he taught them of eating of his flesh and blood, and therfore diuided themselues from him; declaring moreouer to them, how they which gathered not with him, scattered; and they that were not with him, were against him. By these and such like perswasions, he inducing them against to his side, and so by that councell Henricus the emperor was excommunicated.

The emperor agreeth not to the popes inuesting.

The councell diuided. Ex Reg. Houed. Heere the emperor excommunicated. Agreed that England should haue no other legat from Rome, but only the archbishop of Canturbury.

It was not long after but the pope came to Gisortium, where Henry king of England resorted to him, desiring and also obtaining of him, that he would send hereafterward no legat, nor permit any to be sent from Rome to England, vnlesse the king himselfe should so require, by reason of some occasion of strife, which else could not otherwise be decided by his olone bishops at home. The cause why the king required this of the pope was, for that certaine Roman legats had been in England a little before (to wit) one Guido, and another Roman named Ardelmus, and another also called Petrus, who had spoiled the realme of great treasure, as the accustomed manner of the popes prond legats is want to be, Guliel. de pont. lib. 1. Also he required of the pope, that he might vse and retaine all the customes vsed before of his forefathers in England and in Normandy.

England sheareth by the popes legats.

All the customs of the realme restored to the king.

To these petitions the pope did easily consent, requiring against of the king, that he would licence Thurstinus the archbishop aboue minded, to returne with fauor into his realme. But that the king vtterly denied, vnlesse he would professe fidelitie on to the church of Canturbury, as his predecessors had done before, and required himselfe by his oth, which hee before had made. To this the pope answered against, that he by his authority apostolicall, both might, and would also easily dispence with him for his promise or oth. Then the king said, that hee would talke with his councell thereof, and so bad him an answer of his mind. Which answere was this, that for the loue and request of the pope, he was cotent that Thurstinus should reenter his realme, and quietly inioy his prelatship, vpon this condition, that he would (as his predecessors did) professe his fidelitie to the church of Canturbury. Otherwise (said he) so long as he was king, hee should neuer fit archbishop of the church of Yorke. And thus ended that meeting betweene the king of England and the pope for that time.

The pope forbiddeth the king to be crowned.

William archbishop of Canturbury.

The yere following after that, which was An. 1120, the foresaid pope Calixtus directeth his letters to Thurstinus to the king, and to Radulph archbishop of Canturbury. In which epistle, by his full power apostolicall, he doth interdict both the church of Canturbury, and the church of Yorke, with all the parish churches within the same cities, from all diuine seruice, from the burtiall also of the dead, except onely baptising of children, and absolution of them that lie on dying; vnlesse within a month after the receit of the same, Thurstinus without any exaction of fulsication made) were receiued and admitted to the sea of Yorke, and that the king likewise should doubtlesse be excommunicated, except he would consent vnto the same. Whereupon Thurstinus for feare of the popes curse, was immediatly sent for and reconciled to the king, and was placed quietly in his archiepiscopall sea of Yorke.

It followed not long after (within two yeres) Radulph archbishop of Canturbury departed, in whose sea succeeded after him Guillelmus de Turbine. About which time (in the seuen and twentith yeare of the kings raigne) the gray friers by procuring of the king came first into England, and had their house first at Canturbury. About the same season or a little before, the king called a councell at London, where the spirituality of England (not knowing to what purpose it was required) condescended to the king to haue the punishment of married priests: by reason of which grant (whereof the spirituality afterwards much repented) the priests paying a certain to the king, were suffered to retaine their wiues still, whereby the king gathered no small sum of mony. It was about touched, how Matild or Maud daughter to king Henry, was married to Henry the fifth emperor; who after the decease of the said emperor her husband, returned about this present time with the imperiall crowne to her father in Normandy, bringing with her the hand of S. James. For the top thereof the king builded the abby of Reading, where the said hand was reposed. This Matild was received by the said councell to be next heire to the king her father, in possession of the English crowne, for lacke of issue male. And some after vpon the same, was sent ouer to Normandy, to marry with Geffrey Plantagenet earle of Anion, of whom came Henry the second, who (after Stephan) was king of England. And about this time also was founded the priory of Norton in the prouince of Chester, by one William the sonne of Nichelle. In the story of Polychronicon, Iornal, and Polydorus is declared, how the king was troubled greatly with those euyll spirits appearing vnto him by night. The first was of a great multitude of husbandmen of the country, which appeared to site vpon him with their mattocks and instruments, requiring of him his debt which he did owe vnto them. In the second, hee saw a great number of faulkiers and harnessed men to come fiercely vpon him. In the third, he saw a company of prelats & churchmen, threatning him with their bishops staues, and fiercely approching vpon him. Whereupon (being dismaied) in all haste ran and toke his sword to defend himselfe, fmding there none to strike: who afterward asking counsell concerning these visions, was monished by one of his physitians (named Grimbald) by repentance, almes, and amendment of life, to make some friends to God, and to his country vpon he offended. Which three bolnes thus being made, the next yere after he went to England; where he being vpon the seas in a great tempest with his daughter Matild, remembred there his three bolnes. And so comming to the land (for performance of the same) first released vnto the commons the Dane gilt which his father and his brother before had reuelued. Secondly, he went to S. Edmundsbury, where he shewed great benefits to the churchmen. Thirdly, he procured iustice to be administred more rightly throughout his realme, &c. Also he ordained and erected a new bishoprike at Carlil.

Honorius the second.

After Calixtus (those stoop and time is before discoursed) succeeded pope Honorius the second, notwithstanding that the cardinals had elected another, yet he by the meanes of certaine citizens, obtained the papacie. An. 1125. About the second yere of his elnation (as is to be read in Mat. Parisiens.) there was a certaine legat of his called Iohannes Cremensis, sent downe to England from the pope for the redresse I cannot well tell whereof. But in deed the chiefest purpose of his comming, as of all others after him in those dates, was to fill their pouches with English mony, as may further appeare by their proceedings. This legat comming then with the popes letters directed both into England and into Scotland, after he had well refreshed himselfe in bishops houses, and amongst the abbats, at length resorted to London, where he assembled the whole clergie together, inquired of priests concubines, otherwise called their wiues, and making thereupon a statute in the said synod of London, after this tenor: Presbyteris, diaconibus, subdiaconibus, & canonicis, uxorum, concubinarum, & omnium omnino fœminarum cuiuscunq; conditionis, autoritate apostolica inhibemus, præter matrem aut sororem, uel amitam, aut cuiusmodi alie omnino careant suspicione. Et qui decreti huius violator extiterit (confessus uel conuictus) priuiledgio ordinis priuetur. Inter consanguineos seu affinitate propinquos, usque ad septimam generationem, matrimonia contrahi prohibemus. That is, to priests, deacons, subdeacons, and canons, we doe vtterly inhibit by authority apostolicall, all manner company and conuersation with all kind of women, except only their mother, sister, or aunt, or such of whom there is no suspicion. And whosoeuer shall be found to violat this decree, being conuict thereof, shall sustaine thereby the losse of all that he hath by his order. Moreouer, amongst kinred or such as be ioined in affinitie, we forbid matrimony vnto the seuenth generation, &c. But see how God worketh against such vngodly proceedings. The next night after it happned the same cardinall (trusting and reuelling with his concubines) to be apprehended in the same vice, whereof he had so friendly giuen out precepts the next day before, to the no little slander and shame, as Mat. Paris. doth write of the whole clergy.

Arnulphus martyred at Rome. The history of Arnulphus.

Certaine histories make mention of one Arnulphus, in the time of this pope Honorius the second. Some say he was archbishop of Lugdune, as Hugo Platina, Sabellicus. Trithemius saith he was a priest, whole historie, as it is set forth in Trithemius, I will briefely in English expresse. About this time, saith he, in the dates of Honorius the second, one Arnulphus Priest, a man zealous and of great deuotion, and a worthy preacher, came to Rome, which Arnulphus in his preaching rebuked the dissolute and lasciuious solemne, incontinencie, auarice, and immoderat pride of the clergie, prouoking all to follow Christ and his apostles in their pouertie rather, and in purenesse of life. By reason whereof, this man was well accepted with the people, but not sufficient to counsell: What then to, and highly liked of the nobilitie of Rome for a true disciple of Christ, but of the cardinals and the clergie, no lesse hated then fauoured of the other. In so much that vpuithe in the night season they tooke him and destroyed him. Howbeit, Theodoricus, saith he, was reuealed to him before, from God by an angell, he being in the desert when he was sent forth to preach, wherunto he said vnto them publikely with these words: I know (saith he) ye seeke my life, and know you will make me away priuilie: but why? Because I preach to you the truth, and blame your pride, flountnesse, auarice, incontinencie, with your vnmeasurable greedinesse in getting and heaping vp of riches, therefore he you displeased with me. I take heere heauen and earth to witnesse, that I haue preached vnto you, that which I was commanded of the Lord. But you contemne me and your Creator, who by his only sonne hath redeemed you. And no marueil if you seeke my death, being a sinfull person, preaching vnto you the truth, when as if Saint Peter were here this day and rebuked your vices, which do so multiplie abone all measure, you would not spare him neither. And as he was expelling this, with a loud voice he said moreouer: For my part I am not afraid to suffer death for the truths sake: but this I say vnto you, that God will take vpon your iniquities, and will be reuenged. You being full of all vnpuritie, play the blind guides to the people committed vnto you, leading them the way to hell; a God be is of reuengeance. Thus the hatred of the clergie being incensed against him for preaching truth, conspired against him, and so laying priuie wait for him, toke him and drowned him. Sabellicus and Platina say they hanged him.

Arnulphus martyr.

Ex Tritemio. A booke called Tripartitum, written 400 yeares ago.

Number of holie dates.

Curious singing in cathedrall churches.

The world ouercharged with begging religions.

Promotion of euill prelats.

Superfluitie of apparell in bishops families.

Billoyns scales abused to get money.

Non residents in benefices.

Rash bestowing of benefices.

Blasphemie of the church goods.

Old bookes of councels lost by the negligence of the clerkes.

The vnchast life of priests condemned by the nature of the bodies.

In the second toome of the generall councels impainted at Cullen, is mentioned a certaine booke called Opus tripartitum, written as the author supposeth, aboue foure hundred yeares ago, either of this Arnulphus, or else about the same time. In this booke the writer complaineth of many enormities and abuses in the church. First of the number of holy dates, declaring what occasions of vice grow thereby, according vnto the common saying of whores and naughtie women, which say they bantage more in one holy day then in fiftie other dates besides.

Item, complaineth of the curious singing in cathedrall churches, whereby many be occasioned to bestow much good time, yea many yeares about the same, which otherwise they might giue to the learning of better sciences.

Likewise complaineth of the rabble and the multitude of begging friers and religious men, and prosecuted women, shewing what great occasion of idle and vncomely life commeth thereby.

Also of the inconsiderat promotion of euill prelats, and of their great negligence in correcting and reforming the euill demeanor of the people.

Item of the great wantonnesse and lasciuiousnesse in their seruants and families, concerning their excesse in wearing of apparell.

Item, complaineth also of the outragious and excesse gaines that prelats and other vnder them take for their seale, especially of officials, scribes, and such like; which giue out the seale they care not how nor wherfore, so they may gaine money.

He complaineth in like maner that prelats be so slacke and negligent in looking to the residents in their benefices.

Further, complaineth of the rash giuing of benefices to parsons, vicars, and curats, not for any godlinesse or learning in them, but for fauour or friendship, or intercession, either else for hope of some gaine, whereof springeth this great ignorance in the church.

After this he toteth in prelats, how they waste and expend the goods of the church in superfluities, or vpon their kinsfolkes, or other vnable wates, which should rather be spent on the poore.

Thirdly, in the tenth chapter he complaineth, for that through the negligence of men of the church (especially of the church of Rome) the bulls and monuments of the old councels, and also of the new, are not to be found: which should be reserued and kept in all cathedrall churches.

Item, that many prelats be so cold in doing their duties. Also reprocheth the vnchast and bolupteous demeanour of ecclesiasticall persons, by the example of bothes, whole nature is (saith he) that if any of their company leauing his olone mate, lopneth with any other, all the rest fleeth vpon him, whether it be of the beateth him, and plucketh his fethers off: what then, saith he, ought good prelats to do to such a person of their company, whole filthines and corrupt life both difficth so many, and hindereth in the whole church?

Marriage forbidden the french clergie.

The popes seruice granting priests of Christ, was found with an harlot.

Agayne, for so much as we reade in the booke of Esdras, lib. 2. cap. 9. that he purging Israel of strange women, began first with the priests; so now likewise in the purging and correcting of al sorts of men, first the purgation ought to begin with these, according as it is written by the prophet Ezechiel; Begin first with my sanctuarie, &c.

Amendment of life ought first to begin with the priests.

Moreouer, how that in the time of Philip king of France, the whole realme was interdicted, for that the king had but one woman in stead of his wife, which was not his wife by law. And againe, seeing in these our dates the king of Portugale hath been sequestred from his dominion, by the authoritie of the church, being thought not sufficient to gouerne: What then ought to be said to that prelat who abuseth other mens wiues, virgins and nuns, which also is found vnable and insufficient to take vpon him the charge of soules?

The realme of France interdicted.

King of Portugale deposed.

About the peere of our Lord 1128, the orders of the knights of the Rhodes called Iohannits, also the order of Templars rose vp.

The knights of the Rhodes and Templars.

After Honorius next in the same diuruption succeded pope Innocentius the second. An. 1130. But as it was with his predecessors before him, that at euerie mutation of new popes came new perturbations, and commonly neuer a pope was elected, but some other was set vp against him (sometimes two, sometimes three popes together) so likewise it happened with this Innocentius; for after he was chosen, the Romans elected another pope named Anacletus. Betwixt these two popes was much adoe, and great conflict though the partaking of Rogerius duke of Sicile, taking Anacletus part against Innocentius, vntill Lotharius the emperor came, who rescuing Innocentius, droue Rogerius out of Italy. Mue stories record, that king Henrie was one of the great helpes in setting vp and maintaining this pope Innocentius against Anacletus; Cisburnensis.

Pope Innocentius the second.

Hurliburlie betweene popes.

Amongst many other things, this pope decreed that whosoeuer did strike a priest or clerke being shauen, he should be excommunicated, and not to be absolued, but only of the pope himselfe.

The popes curse proclaimed against such as strike any priest.

About the time of doing these things, being the yeare of our Lord 1135, king Henrie being in Normandie, as some say, by taking there a fall from his horse, as others say, by taking a surfet in eating lampreies, fell sicke and died, after he had raigned ouer the realme of England fiue and thirtie yeares and odde monthes, leauing for his heires vnto the empresse his daughter, with her yong sonne Henrie to succed after him, to whom all the prelats and nobilitie of the realme were sworne. But contrarie to their oath made to Maud in the presence of her father before, Willliam the archbishop of Canturburie and the nobles of the realme crowned Stephen earle of Bologne, and suffers sonne to king Henrie, vpon Saint Stephens day in Christmas weeke, which archbishop the next yeare after died, being, as it was thought, iustly punished for his periurie. And many other lords which did accordingly, went not quit without punishment. In the like iustice of punishment is mentioned how the bishop of Salisburie, who contrarie vnto his oath, being a great doer in the coronation of Stephen, was apprehended of the same king, and miserablie, but iustly, exterminied.

The death of king Henrie. Anno 1135.

Periurie iustly punished.

A certaine written English storie I haue, which addeth more, and saith, that king Stephen hauing many fees in diuers quarters keeping their holds and castles against him, went then to Oxford and take the bishop of Salisburie, and put a rope about his necke, and so led to him to the castle of Ties, that was his. and commanded them to render vp the castle, or he would slay and hang their bishop. Which castle being giuen vp, the king take the spoile thereof. The like also he did vnto the bishop of Lincolne named Alexander, whom in like maner he led in a rope to the castle of the bishops that was vpon Trent, and also there deliuer vp the castle, or else he would hang their lord before the gate. Long it was before the castle was giuen vp, yet at length the king obtaining it, there entred and toke all the treasure of the bishop, &c. Roger Houeden and Fabian allegding a certaine old authour, whom I cannot find, referreth a great cause of this periurie vnto one Hugh Bigot, steward sometime vnto king Henrie. Who immediatly after the death of the said Henrie, came into England, and before the said archbishop and other lords of the land, toke iuilly an oath and swore, that he was present a little before the kings death, when king Henrie admitted for his heire (to be king after him) Stephen his nephew, for so much as Maud his daughter had discontented him. Whereunto the archbishop with the other lords gaue to battle credence. But this Hugh, saith he, escaped not vnpunished, for he died miserable in a short time after. Ex Fabian. Albeit all this may be supposed rather to be wrought not without the practise of Henrie bishop of Wincheiter, and other prelats by his setting on, which Henrie was brother vnto king Stephen, &c.

King Stephan.

Anno 1136 King Stephan.

THus when king Stephan contrarie vnto his oath made before to Dauid the empresse, had taken vpon him the crowne (as is aboue said) he knowe before the lords at Oxford, that he would not hold the benefices that were voided, and that he would remit the Danegilt, with many other things, which after he little performed. Moreouer, because he dreaded the coming of the empresse, he gaue licence to his lords, euery one to build vpon their owne ground strong castles or fortresses, as them liked. All the time of his raigne he was vexed with warres, but especially with Dauid king of the Scots, with whom he was at length accorded: but yet the Scotish king did him no homage, because he was sworne to Dauid the empresse. Notwithstanding, yet Henrie the eldest sonne to king Dauid did homage to king Stephan. But he after repenting thereof, entred into Northumberland with a great host, and burnt and slew the people in most cruell wise, neither sparing man, woman or child. Such as were with child they ript, the children they toss vpon their speares points, and laying the priests vpo the altars, they mangled and cut them all to pieces, after a most terrible manner. But by the manhod of the English lords and soldiers, and through the prayers of Thurstin archbishop of Yorke, they were not withall, and slaine a great number of them, and Dauid their king constrained to giue Henrie his sonne hostage for suretie of peace. In the meane time king Stephan was occupied in the south countries, besieging diuers castles of diuers bishops and other lords, and tooke them by force, and fortified them with his knights and seruants, to the intent to withstand the empresse, whose comming he euer feared.

The cruelties of the Scots against the English.

Anno 1140 Dauid the empresse came into England against Stephan.

About the first peare of his raigne, Dauid the empresse came into England out of Normandie, and by the aid of Robert earle of Glocester, and Ranulph of Chester, made strong warre vpon king Stephan. In the end wherof the kings partie was chased, and himselfe taken prisoner, and sent to Bristow there to be kept in sure hold. The same day when king Stephan should ioyne his battell, it is said in a certaine old chronicle before minded, that he being at the masse (which then the bishop of Lincolne said before the king) as he went to offer vp his taper, it brake in two pieces. And when the masse was done, (at what time the king should haue beene housled) the rope where by the pix did hang, did breake, and the pix fell downe vpon the altar.

King Stephan taken prisoner.

After this field, the quéene, king Stephans wife (lying then in Kent) made great labour to the empresse and her counsell, to haue the king deliuered and put into some house of religion, but could not obtaine. Also the Londoners made great suite to the said empresse, to haue and to vse against S. Edwards lawes, and not the lawes of her father, which were more strict and straunge vnto them then the other. Which when they could not obtaine of her and her counsell, the citizens of London, being therewith discontented, would haue taken the empresse: but the hauing knowledge thereof, fled priuilie from London vnto Oxford. But then the Kentishmen and Londoners taking the kings part, ioyned battell against the empresse, there the foresaid Robert earle of Glocester, and base brother to the empresse was taken, and so by exchange, both the king and earle Robert were deliuered out of prison. Then Stephan without delay gathering to him a strong army, straitly pursued the foresaid Matild or Maud with her friends, besieging them in the castle of Oxford. In the siege whereof fell a great snow and frost so hard, that a man well laden might passe ouer the water: vpon the occasion whereof, the empresse bethinking her selfe, appointed with her friends and retinue, clothed in white shéets, and so issuing out by a posterne gate, went vpon the ice ouer Thames, and so escaped to Walingford. After this, the king (the castle being gotten) when he found not the empresse, was much displeased, and molested the countrie about diuers maies. In conclusion, he pursued the empresse and her companie so hard, that he caused them to flie the realme, which was the first peare of his raigne.

What it is for princes to be hard and strict to their subiects.

King Stephan and Robert earle of Glocester deliuered by exchange.

The second peare after this, which was the eight peare of his raigne, there was a parliament kept at London, vnto the which all the bishops of the realme resorted, and there denounced the king accursed, and all them with him that did any hurt to the church, or to any minister therof. Whereupon the king began somewhat to amend his conditions: for a certaine space: but afterward (as my storie saith) was as ill as he was before; but what the causes were, my author maketh no relation therof, &c. Mor returne againe to the storie, the empresse compelled, as is said, to flie the realme, returned againe into Normandie to Geffrey Plantagenet her husband. Who, after he had patiently borne and defended the duchie of Normandie, against the puissance of king Stephan a long time, ended his life, leauing Henrie his sonne to succeed him in that dukedome. In the meane while, Robert earle of Glocester, and the earle of Chester, who were strong of people, had diuers conflicts with the king, in so much that at a battell at Wilton betweene them the K. was well nere taken, but yet escaped with much paine.

The decease of Geffery Plantagenet.

It was not long after, but Eustace sonne to king Stephan, who had married the French kings sister, made war on duke Henrie of Normandie, but preuailed not. Some after, the said Henrie duke of Normandie (in the quarrell of his mother Maud) with a great puissance entred into England, and at the first wan the castle of Malmesburie, then the tower of London, and afterward the towne of Nottingham, with other holds and castles, as of Walingford and other more. Thus betweene him and the king were fought many battels, to the great auoyance of the realme. During which time, Eustace the kings sonne departed. Vpon the occasion whereof, the king caused Theobald (which succeeded next after William aboue mentioned) archbishop of Canterburie, to make meanes to the duke for peace, which vpon this condition betweene them was concluded, that Stephan during his life time should hold the kingdome, and Henrie in the meane time to be proclamed heire apparent in the chiefe cities throughout the realme. These things thus concluded, duke Henrie taketh his iourney into Normandie (king Stephan and his sonne William bringing him on his way) where William the kings sonne taking vp his horse before his father, had a fall and brake his leg, and so was had to Canturburie. The same peare king Stephan, about October (as some say for sorrow) ended his life, after he had raigned nineteene yeares perfectly.

In the time of this king, which was the fiftenth peare of his raigne, Theobald archbishop of Canturburie, and legat to the pope, did hold a councell at London. In the which councell first began newe found appellations from councels to the pope, found out by Henrie bishop of Winchester. For as the words of mine author do record: In Anglia namque appellationes inusitatum erant, donec eas Henricus Wintoniensis episcopus dum legatus esset, malo suo crudeliter intrusit. In eodem namque concilio ad Romani pontificis audientiam ter appellatum est, &c. That is: For appellations before were not in vse in England, til Henrie bishop of Winchester being then the popes legat, brought them cruelly in, to his owne hurt. For in that councell thrice appeale was made to the bishop of Rome.

Spirituall excommunication abused in temporall causes.

In the time of king Stephan died Gratianus a monke of Bononie, who compiled the booke called the popes decrees. Also his brother Petrus Lombardus bishop of Paris, which is called the maister of sentences, compiled his foure bookes of the sentences. These two brethren were the greatest doctors in finding out and establishing this blind opinion of the sacrament, that the only similitude of bread and wine remained, but not the substance of them: and this they call the spirituall vnderstanding of the mysterie. And therefore no marueil if the supper in those daies were seene blacke and dimme.

Mention hath been made before of certaine English councels holden in the time of this king, where it was (as one of them vnder Theobald the archbishop of Canturburie) decreed, that bishops should liue more discreetly, should teach their flocke more diligently: that reading of scriptures should be frequented more vsually in abbeyes: that priests should not be rulers of worldly matters; and that they should learne and teach the Lords prayer and creed in English. Cursing with booke, bell, and candle.

Where came into the church the manner of cursing with booke, bell, and candle, deuised in the councell of London, holden by William bishop of Winchester vnder pope Celestinus, which succeeded after Innocentius, An. 1144.

Also Lotharius succeeded in the imperiall crowne Conradus, the nephew of Henricus the fift afore mentioned, An. 1138. which why amongst many emperours is not found to receiue the crowne at the popes hand.

Anno 1038

In the daies of this emperor, who raigned fiftéene peares, were diuers popes, as Celestinus the second, Lucius the second, Eugenius the third, at which time the Romans went about to recouer their former old manner of chusing their consuls and senators. But the popes then being in their ruffe, in no case would abide it, whereupon arose many commotions, with much ciuill war amongst them. In so much that pope Lucius (sending for aid to the emperour, and he otherwise letted at that time could not come) armed his souldiers, thinking to inuade them, or else to destroy them in their owne house. Whereupon arose many commotions, this comming to their knowledge before, the people was all in arap, and so much adoe was amongst them. Pope Lucius being also amongst them in the fight (well pelted with stones and blowes) lined not long after. Likewise pope Eugenius after him, An. 1145, put the Romans for the same matter, first did curse them with excommunication: after, when he saw that would not serue, he came with his host, and so compelled them at length to take his peace, and to take his conditions which were these: That they should abolish their consuls, and take such senators as he by his papall authoritie should assigne them.

Adrianus a pope, an Englishman.

Then followed Anastasius the fourth, and after him Adrian the fourth an English man, by his name called Breakespeare, belonging once to S. Albons. This Adrianus kept great stirre in like sort with the citizens of Rome for abolishing their consuls and senat, curbing, excommunicating, and warring against them with all power he could make, to the time he remoued the consuls out of their office, and brought them all vnder his subiection. The like businesse and rage he also stirred vp against Apulia, and especially against the empire, blustring and thundering against Fredericus the emperor, as (the Lord graunting) you shall heare anon, after we haue prosecuted such matter, as necessarily appertaineth first to the continuation of our English storie.

King Henrie the second.

Anno 1154 King Henrie the second.

HEnrie the second of that name, the sonne of Gefferey Plantagenet, and of Maud the empresse, and daughter of king Henrie the first, began his raigne after king Stephen, and continued fiue and thirtie yeares. The first peare of his raigne he subdued Ireland, and not long after, Thomas Becket was made by him lord chancellour of England. This king cast downe diuers castles which were erected in the time of king Stephen. He went into the north parts, where he subdued William king of Scotland, who at that time held a great part of Northumberland, vnto Newcastle vpon Tine, and ioyned Scotland to his owne kingdome from the south ocean, to the north iles of Orchades. Also he put vnder his dominion the kingdome of Wales, and there set to fall downe many great woods, and made waies plaine. So that by his great manhood and policie, the seignorie of England was much augmented with the addition of Scotland, Ireland, the iles Orchades, Britaine, Poictou, and Guien. Also he had in his rule, Normandie, Galcoine, Angeou, and Chinon: also Aluernie and the citie of Tholous he wan, and were to him subiect. Duer and be titles (by the right his wife claimed) daughter to the earle of Poictou, he obtained the mounts Pyzane in Sxaine: so that we reade of none of his progenitors, which had so many countries vnder his dominion.

Thomas Becket chanc. lour of England.

What was done in the first peare of his raigne.

Anno 1157

In England were seene in the firmament two sunnes, or (as it is in Chronica chronicorum) in Italie appeared three sunnes by the space of three houres in the west, and the peare following appeared three moones, whereof the middle moone had a red castle ouerthwart the face, whereby was betokened (by the iudgement of some) the great schisme that after fell among the cardinals, for the election of the bishop of Rome: or else rather the businesse betweene Fredericus the emperour and the popes, whereof partly mo is incidently occasion giuen vs to discourse: after that I haue first written of Gerhardus and Dulcinus Nauarrensis, who in their time according to their gift, did carnestly labour and preach against the church of Rome, defending and maintaining, that prayer was not more holy in one place then in another, that the pope was antichrist, that the clergie and prelats of Rome were reiect, and the whole throne of Babylon prefigured in the Apocalypse, &c. Peraduenture those had receiued some light of knowledge of the Waldenses, who at length with a great number of their followers were oppressed and slaine by the pope. And although some inconuncient points of doctrine and dishonestie in their assemblies be against them alledged of some, yet these times of ours do teach vs sufficiently, what credit is to be giuen to such popish flanders, forged rather vpon hatred of true religion, then vpon any iudgement of truth. Illiricus in his booke De testibus, referreth the time of these two to the peare of our Lord 1180: but as I find in the storie of Robert Gulsburne, these two about the peare of our Lord 1158, brought thirtie with them into England, who by the king and the prelats were all burnt in the forehead, and so driuen out of the realme, and after (as Illiricus writeth) were slaine by the pope.

And now (according to my promise premised) the time requiretth to proceed to the historie of Fredericus the first (called Barbarossa) successor vnto Conradus in the empire, who marched vp to Italie, to subdue there certaine rebels. The pope hearing that, came with his clergie to meet him by the way, in a towne called Sutrium, thinking by him to find aid against his enemies. The Emperour seeing the bishop, lighteth from his hosse to receiue him, holding the stirrup to the prelat on the left side, when he should haue held it on the right, wherewith the pope shewed himselfe somewhat grieued. The emperour smiling, excused himselfe that he was neuer accustomed to hold stirrups. And seeing it was done only of good will, and of no duty, the lesse matter was what side of the hosse he held. The next day to make amends against to the bishop, the emperor sending for him, receiued him, holding the right stirrup vnto the prelat, and to all the matter was made whole, and he the popes white sonne againe.

Frederike Barbarossa emperour.

The pope displeased that the emperour did not hold his right stirrup.

The emperour holdeth the popes stirrup.

After this, as they were come in and sat together, Adrianus the pope begunneth to declare vnto him, how his ancestors before him, such as sought vnto the see of Rome for the crowne were wont alwaies to leaue behind them some speciall token or monument of their benuolence, for the obtaining thereof, as Carolus Magnus in subduing Lombards, Otho the Berengarians, Lotharius the Normans, &c. Wherefore he required some benefit to proceed likewise from him vnto the church of Rome, in restoring againe the countrie of Apulia to the church of Rome. Which thing if he would doe, he for his part againe would do that which appertained vnto him to do: meaning in giuing him the crowne, for at that time the popes had brought the emperours to fetch their crowne at their hands.

The pope's old practise in setting princes together by the eares.

Frederike with his princes, perceiuing that vnlesse he would of his owne proper costs and charges fetch in againe Apulia out of Duke Williams hands, he could not speed of the crowne, was faine to promise to all that the pope required, and to the next day after was crowned.

This done, the emperour returneth into Germanie, to refresh his armie and his other furnitures, for the subduing of Apulia. In the meane while Adrianus not thinking to be idle, first giueth forth censures of excommunication against William duke of Apulia. Besides, not content with this, sendeth also to Emmanuel emperor of Constantinople, inueighing him to warre against the foresaid William. The duke perceiuing this, sendeth both to the pope for peace, promising to restore to him whatsoeuer he would.

Warre stirred vp by the pope.

But the pope though the malignant counsell of his cardinals would graunt to no peace, thinking to get more by warre. The duke seeing nothing but war, prepareth himselfe with all expedition to the same. To be briefe, making all his power out of Sicilie, he arriueth at Apulia, and there putteth Emmanuel the emperour to flight. This done, he proceedeth to the citie of Bonauenture, where the pope with his cardinals were looking for victorie. He planting there his siege, so straitly vexed the citie, that the pope with his cardinals were glad to intreate for peace, which they refused before. The duke granted vnto them peace vpon certaine conditions: that is, that neither he should inuade their possessions as belonged to Rome, and that the pope should make him king of both Sicilies. So the matter was concluded and they departed. The bishop comming to Rome, was no lesse troubled there about their consuls and senators, in so much that when his curses and excommunications could not preuaile no; ferue, he was faine to leaue Rome, and remoued to Aretinum.

What more gainefull to the pope then peace.

The pope disseuered from the emperour.

The pope vexed by the duke of Apulia.

The pope compelled to intreate for peace.

The emperour at home, began to consider with himselfe, how the pope had ertoted from the emperours, his predecessours, the inuesting and induing of prelats, how he had pilled and polled all nations by his legats, and also had been the sower of seditions through all his empire: he began therefore to require of all the bishops of Germanie: he began therefore to require of all the bishops of Germanie: he began therefore to require of all the bishops of Germanie

A letter of pope Adrian to the emperour Frederike.

Adrian bishop, seruant of the seruants of God, to Frederike emperour, health and apostolical benediction. The law of God, as it promiseth to them that honor father and mother long life, so it threatneth the sentence of death to them that curse father and mother. Wee are taught by the word of truth, that euerie one, the which exalteth himselfe, shall be brought low. Wherefore (my well beloued sonne in the Lord) we marueil not a little at your wisdome, in that ye seeme not to shew that reuerence to blessed S. Peter, and to the holy church of Rome, which you ought to shew. For why? In your letters sent to vs, you prefer your owne name before ours, wherein you incur the note of insolencie, yea rather (to speake it) of arrogancie. What should I here recite vnto you, the oath of your fidelitie, which you sware to blessed S. Peter and to vs, and how you obserue and keepe the same? Seeing you so require homage and allegeance of them that be gods, and all the sonnes of the high God, and presume to ioyne their holy hands with yours, working contrarie to vs: seeing also you exclude, not only out of your churches, but also out of your cities, our cardinals, whom we direct as legats from our side: what shall I say then vnto you? Amend therefore I aduise you, amend; for while you go about to obtaine of vs your confecration and crowne, and to get those things you haue not, I feare much your honour will lose the things you haue. Thus fare ye well.

The emperours name before the popes.

The answere of Frederike the emperour to the pope.

FRederike by the grace of God, Romane emperour, euer Augustus, vnto Adrian bishop of the Romane church, and vnto all such that be willing to cleaue vnto those things which Iesus began to worke and teach, greeting. The law of iustice giueth to euery person accordingly that which is his. Neither do we derogate from our parents: of whom, according as we haue receiued this our dignity of the imperial crowne and gouernance: so in the same kingdome of ours, we doe render their due and true honor to them againe. And for so much as duties in all sorts of cases is to be fought out, let vs see first in the time of Constantine (Siluester then being bishop of Rome) what patrimonie or regalitie he had of his owne, due to him that he might claime. Did not Constantine of his liberal benignity giue libertie, and restored peace vnto the church? And whatsoeuer regalitie or patrimonie the see of our papacie hath, was it not by the donation of princes giuen vnto them? Reuolue and turne ouer the ancient chronicles (if either you haue not read, or neglected that we do affirme) there it is to be found. Of them which be Gods by adoption, and hold our lordships of vs; why may we not iustly require their homage, and their sworne allegeance, when as he which is both your master and ours (taking nothing of any king or any man, but giuing all goodnesse to all men) paid toll and tribute for him and Peter, vnto Cæsar? giuing you example to do the like. And therefore faith to you and all men, Learne of me, for I am meeke and humble of heart, &c. Wherefore either render againe your lordships and patrimonies which yee hold of vs: or else if ye find them so sweet vnto you, then giue that which is due to God, vnto God: and that which is due to Cæsar, vnto Cæsar. As for your cardinals, we shut them out both of churches and cities, for that we see them not preachers, but prollers; not repairers of peace, but rakers for money; not pillars and vpholders of the church, but pollers infatiable of the world, and moilers of money and gold. What time we shall see them to be other men (such as the church requireth them to be) members and makers of peace, shining forth like lights to the people, assisting poore and weake mens causes in the way of equitie, &c: then shall they find vs prest and readie to relieue them with stipends, and all things necessarie. And whereas you inferre such questions as these vnto secular men little conducing to religion) you incur thereby no little note and blemish of your humilitie (which is keeper of all vertues) and of your mansuetude. Therefore let your fatherhood beware and take heed, lest in mouing such matters as seeme to vs vnsemely for you, yee giue thereby offence to such as depend of your word (giuing eare to your mouth, as it were to an euening shower:) for wee cannot but tell you of that we heare, seeing now the detestable beast of pride doth creepe into the seat of Peter, prouiding alwaies (as much as we may by Gods grace) for the peace of the church. Fare ye well.

Upon this Adrian the pope directeth out a bull against Frederike, excommunicating him with publike and solemne ceremonies. Moreouer, conspiring with William duke of Apulia fought all manner of waies to infest the emperour, and to set all men against him, especially the clergie. Amongst manie other writing to Hallitus bishop of Triuers, to Arnulphus bishop of Mentz, and to Frederike bishop of Collen, secretly first to make them of his side. His epistle to them foloweth to this effect.

THe empire of Rome was transferred from the Greekes to the Almans, so that the king of Almans could not be called emperour, before he were crowned of the bishop apostolicall. Before his consecration hee is a king, afterwards emperour. Whence hath he his empire then, but of vs? By the election of his princes he hath the name of a king, by our confecration he hath the name of the emperour of August, or of Cæsar. Ergo by vs he raigneth as emperour. Search ancient antiquities. Zacharias P. promoted Carolus, and made him a great name, that he was made and called emperour: and after that, euer the king of Almans was named emperour and aduoct to the see apostolicall, so that Apulia (conquered by him) was subdued to the bishop of Rome: which Apulia with the citie of Rome is ours, and not the emperours. Our seat is at Rome, the seat of the emperour is at Aquis in Arduenna, which is a wood in France. The emperor whatsoeuer he hath, he hath it of vs. As Zacharias did translate the empire from the Greeks to the Almans, so we may translate it againe from the Almans to the Greekes. Behold it lieth in our power to giue it to whom we will, being therefore set vp of God aboue gentiles and nations, to destroy and plucke vp, to build and to plant, &c.

And yet further to vnderstand the ambitious presumption of the proud see of Rome, it so chanced this emperour Frederike at his first comming vp to Rome, did behold there in the palace of Lateran, a certaine picture brought forth vnto him, how Lotharius the second emperor was crowned of the pope, with the inscription of certaine verses in Latine, declaring how the foresaid emperour comming to Rome, first did sweare to the citie, after was made the popes man, and so of him received the crowne. Frederike offended with this picture, desired the pope it might be abolished, that it should be no cause of any dissension hereafter. The pope vnderstanding the intent of the emperour, how loth he was to come vnder subiection to his see, deuised by all craftie waies to bring it to passe. And first taking his occasion by the bishop of Laodicea (being then detained in custodie, I cannot tell by whom) sent diuers and many letters vnto him; and yet not so there, as proud and disdainfull. Wherein the first salutation by his legats, was this in Latine: Salutat vos beatissimus pater noster papa, & omnes fratres cardinalium, ille vt pater, hi vt fratres. That is, Our most blessed father the pope greeteth you, and the vniuersall compante of the cardinals, he as your father, they as your brethren. Meaning thereby that he should vnderstand himselfe to be subiect and vnderling to the pope, no lesse then the cardinals were. Moreouer in his letters obiecting diuers things against him, reciteth how many and great benefits he had receiued of the church of Rome, by the which church he had obtained the fulnesse of his honour and dignitie, &c. The emperour with his princes perceiuing whereunto the pope by his legats did tend (being a prince of courage) could not abide such intolerable presumption of a proud message: wherevpon much contention fell betweene the legats and the princes. And of whom then, say the legats, receiueth Cæsar the empire, if he take it not of the pope? with the which word the Germain princes were so much offended, that had not the emperour staied them (with much adoe) they should haue vsed violence against the legats. But the emperour not permitting that, commanded the legats away, straitly charging them to make no tarrie by the way to any person or persons, but straight to depart home. And he, to certifie the whole state of the empire of the truth of the matter, directeth forth these letters that follow.

The tenor of the emperours letter sent through all his empire.

FOr so much as the prouidence of God (whereof dependeth all power both in heauen and earth) hath committed to vs his ancoined, this our regiment and empire to be gouerned, and the peace of his churches by our imperiall armes to be protected; we cannot but lament and complaine to you with great sorrow of heart, seeing such causes of dissension (the root and fountaine of euils, and the infection of pestiferous corruption) thus to rise from the holy church, imprinted with the seale of peace, and loue of Christ.

By reason whereof (except God turne it away) we feare the whole bodie of the church is like to bee polluted, the vnitie thereof to be broken, and a schisme and diuision to be betwixt the spirituall and temporal regiment. For we being of late at Bisunze, and there intreating busily of matters pertaining as wel to the honor of our empire, as to the wealth of the churches, there came ambassadors of the see apostolicall, declaring that they brought a legacie to our maiestie of great importance, redounding to the no small commoditie of our honor and empire.

Who then, the first day of their comming, being brought to our presence, and receiued of vs (as the manner is) with honour accordingly, audience was giuen them to heare what they had to say. They forthwith bursting out of the mamon of iniquitie, haute pride, stoutnesse and arrogancie, our of the execrable presumption of their swelling heart, did their message with letters apostolicall, whereof the tenour was this: That we should alwaies haue before our eyes, how that our soueraigne lord the pope gaue vs the imperiall crowne, and that it doth not repent him, if so beit we haue receiued greater benefits at his hand.

And

And this was the effect of that so sweet and fatherly legation, which should nourish peace both of the church and of the empire. To vnite them fast together in the band of loue.

At the hearing of this so false, vntrue, and most vaineglorious presumption of the proud a message, not only the emperors maiestie conceiued indignation, but also all the princes (there present) were moued with such anger and rage thereat, that if our presence and request had not staied them, they could not haue held their hands from these wicked priests, or else to haue proceeded with sentence of death against them.

Furthermore, because a great number of other letters (partly written alreadie, partly with seales readie signed, for letters to be written according as they should thinke good to the churches of Germanie) were found about them, whereby to worke their conceiued intent of iniquitie here in our churches, to spoile the altars, to carie away the iewels of the church, and to fley off the lims & plates of golden crosses, &c. To the intent their mariticous meaning should haue no further power to raigne, we gaue them commandement to depart the same way they came. And now, seeing our raigne and empire standeth vpon the election of princes, from God alone, who in the passion of his sonne subdued the world to be gouerned with two swords necessarie, and againe, seeing Peter the apostle hath so informed the world with this doctrine, Deum timete, regem honorificate: that is; Feare God, honor your king: therefore, whose faith that we haue and possesse our emperiall kingdome by the benefit of the lord pope, is contrarie both to the ordinance of God, and to the doctrine of Peter, and also shall be reproued for a lier.

Therefore as our endeuour hath been heretofore, to helpe and to deliuer the seruile captiuitie of churches out of the hand, and from the yoke of the Egyptians, and to maintaine the right of their liberties and dignities, we desire you all with your company to lament with vs, this slanderous ignominie inferred to vs and our kingdome, trusting that your faithfull good will, which hath been euer trustie to the honor of this empire, (neuer yet blemished from the first beginning of this citie, and of religion) will prouide, that it shall haue no hurt through the strange nouelties and presumptuous pride of such. Which thing rather then it should come to passe, know you this for certaine, I had rather incur the danger of death, then to suffer such confusion to happen in our daies.

This letter of Cæsar fretted the pope not a little, who wrote againe to the bishops of Germanie, accusing the emperor, and willing them to worke against him what they could. They answere againe with all obedience to the pope, submitting themselues, and yet accusing the emperour, and blaming him rather; and reboted him hereby to tempt his letters and legacies with more gentlenes and modestie; which counsell he also followed accordingly.

The pope treading on the emperours necke.

Much trouble had good Frederike with this pope, but much more with the other followed. For this pope continued not vpon long, but a space only of 4. yeares and 6. moneths. About whose time rose vp the order of the hermits by one William once duke of Aquitania, afterward a frier. This Abianus walking with his cardinals abroad, to a place called Anagnia or Arignanum, (as Volateran calleth it) chanced to be choised with a stie getting into his throat, and so was strangled, who in the latter time of his papacie was wont to say, that there is no more miserable bird of life in the earth, then to be a pope, and to come to the papacie by blood, that is (said he) not to succeed Peter, but rather Romulus, who to raigne alone did slay his brother.

The saying and iudgement of pope Adrianus of the papal see.

The popes rather succeeding to Romulus then to Peter. Pope Alexander terrified.

Although this Adrian was bad enough, yet came there vp next much worse, one Alexander the third of that name; who yet was not elect alone; for he set him the emperor with nine cardinals (albeit Sabellicus saith but with three) did set vp another pope, named Victor the fourth. Betweene these two popes rose a foule schisme and great discord, and long continued. In so much that the emperour being required to take vp the matter, sent for them both to appeare before him, that in hearing them both, he might iudge their cause the better. Victor came, but Alexander (disdaining that his matter should come in controuersie) refused to appeare. Whereupon the emperour with a full consent of his bishops and clergie about him, assented and ratified the election of Victor to stand, and so brought him into the citie, there to be receiued and placed. Alexander, flying vnto France, accused them both, sending his letters to all christendome against them, as men to be auoided and cast out of all christian companie. Also to get him friends at Rome by gifts and money, got on his side the greatest part of the citie, both to the fauouring of him, and to the setting vp of such consuls as were for his purpose. After this, Alexander comming from France to Sicill, and from thence to Rome, was there receiued with much fauour, through the helpe of Philip the French king.

Alexander excommunicateth the emperour.

The emperour, hearing this rebellion and conspiracie in Rome, remouued with great power into Italie, where he had destroyed diuers great cities. Comming at length to Rome, he required the citizens that the cause betwixt the two popes might be decided, and that he which had the best right might be taken. If they would so do, he would restore againe that which he tooke from them before. Alexander mistrusting his part, and doubting the wils of the citizens (hauing ships readie prepared for him, from William duke of Apulia) fetcht a course about to Venice.

To declare here the difference in histories, betweene Blondus, Sabellicus, and the Venetian chronicers, with other writers, concerning the order of this matter, I will omit as this most doe agree, that the pope being at Venice, and required to be sent of the Venetians to the emperour, they would not send him. Whereupon Frederike the emperour sent thither his sonne Otho, with men and ships well appointed, charging him not to attempt any thing before his comming. The young man more hardie then circumspect (coming with the Venetians) was ouercome, and so taken, was brought into the citie. Hereby the pope take no small occasion to worke his feats.

The father to helpe the captiuitie and miserie of his sonne, was compelled to submit himselfe to the pope, and to intreat for peace. So the emperour comming to Venice (at S. Marks church) at the bishop was, there to take his absolution, was bid to kneele downe at the popes feet.

The proud pope setting his foot vpon the emperors necke, said the verse of the Psal. Super aspidem & basiliscum ambulabis, et conculcabis leonem & draconem; That is: Thou shalt walke vpon the adder & on the basilisk, and shalt treade downe the lion and the dragon. To whom the emperor answering again, said Non tibi sed Petro: That is not to thee but to Peter. The pope again: Et mihi et Petro. Both to me and to Peter. The emperor fearing to giue any occasion of further quarrelling, held his peace, so was absolued, & peace made betweene them. The conditions whereof were these. First, that he should receiue Alexander for the true pope. Secondly, that he should restore againe to the church of Rome all that he had taken away before. And thus the emperour obtaining againe his sonne, departed.

Here, as I note in diuers writers, a great diuersitie and varietie touching the order of this matter (of whom some say that the emperour came in Palestina before he came to Venice, some say after) so I marueil to see in Volateran (so great a fauourer of the pope) such a contradiction, who in his two and twentith booke saith, that Otho the emperors sonne was taken in this conflict, which was the cause of the peace betweene his father and the pope. And in his three and twentith booke against faith, that the emperour himselfe was taken prisoner in the same battell: and so afterwards (peace concluded) tooke his iourney to Asia and Palestina. This pope in the time of his papacie (which continued one and twentie yeares) kept sundrie councels both at Turo and at Lateran, where he confirmed the wicked proceedings of Hildebrand, and others his predecessors; as to bind all orders of the clergie to the vow of chastitie; which were not greatly to be reprehended, if they would define chastitie aright. For who so liueth not a chast life saith he, is not fit to be a minister. But herein lieth an error: full of much blindnesse, and also perill, to thinke that matrimonie immaculat (as S. Paul calleth it) is not chastitie, but only a single life, that they esteeme to be a chast life.

Concilium Lateranense. The clergie bound to the vow of chastitie. Papists care not to much in permitting chastitie, as in detaining chastitie.

Now for so much as our English pope holy martyr, called Thomas Becket, hapned also in the same time of this pope Alexander, let vs somewhat also speake of him, so far as the matter shall seeme worthie of knowledge, and to stand with truth: to the end that the truth thereof being sifted from all flatterie and lies of such popish writers as paint out his storie, men may the better iudge both of him what he was, and also of his cause.

The life and historie of Thomas Becket

Thomas Becket archbishop of Canturburie.

IF the cause make a martyr, as is said, I see not why we should esteeme Thomas Becket to deserue martyr, more then any other whom the princes sword doth here temporally punish for their temporall defects. To die for the church, I grant is a glorious matter. But the church (as it is a spirituall and not a temporall church) is to stand vpon causes spirituall, and vpon an heauenly foundation, as vpon faith, religion, true doctrine, sincere discipline, obedience to Gods commandements; and not vpon things pertaining to this world, as possessions, liberties, exemptions, priuiledges, dignities, patrimonies, and superiorities. If these bee giuen to the church, I pray God churchmen may vse them well; but if they be not giuen, the church cannot claime them; or if they be taken away, that standeth in the princes power. To contend with princes for the same, it is no matter, (in my mind) materiall, to make a martyr, but rather a rebellion against them, to whom we owe subiection. Therefore, as I suppose Thomas Becket to be farre from the cause and title of a martyr (neither can he be excused from a plaine rebell against his prince) so yet would I haue wished against the law rather publikely to haue found out his fault, then the swords of men (not bidden nor sent) to haue smitten him, hauing no speciall commandement, neither of the prince, nor of the law so to do. For though the indignation of the prince (as the wise prince saith) is death, yet it is not for euery priuat person straightwaies to reuenge the secret indignation of his prince, except he be publikely authorized thereunto. And this had been (as I suppose) the better way, the lawes first to haue executed their office vpon him. Certes, it had been the safest way for the king, as it proued after; which had inst matter enough, if he had prosecuted his cause against him. And also thereby his death had been without all suspicion of martyrdome, neither had there followed that shrinking and fainting of him as there did. Albeit the secret prouidence of God (which gouerneth all things) did see this way percase to be best, and most necessarie for those daies. And doubtlesse (to say here what I thinke, and yet to speake nothing against charitie) if the emperours had done the like to the popes, contending against them, what time they had taken them prisoners, that is, if they had vsed the law of the sword against them, and chopped off the heads of one or two, according to their traiterous rebellion, they had broken the neckes of much disturbance, which long time after did trouble the church. But for lacke of that, because emperours hauing the sword, and the truth on their side, would not vse their sword; but standing in awe of the popes vaine curse, and reuerencing his seate for Saint Peters sake, durst not lay hand vpon him, though he were neuer so abominable and traiterous a malefactour: the popes perceiuing that, take so much vpon them (not as the Scripture would giue) but as much as the superstitious feare of emperours and kings would suffer them to take; which was so much, that it past all order, rule, and measure: and all because the superiour powers either would not, or durst not practise the authoritie giuen vnto them of the Lord, vpon those inferiours, but suffered them to be their masters.

But as touching Thomas Becket, whatsoeuer is to bee thought of them that did the act, the example thereof yet bringeth this profit with it, to teach all Romish prelats not to be so stubborne (in such matters not pertaining vnto them) against their prince, vnto whom God hath subiected them.

Herbertus de Bosham. Iam. Charnet. edunc abbas of Tuetchburie. Guliel. Cantuariens. Thomas Becket described.

Now to the storie, which if it be true that is set forth in Quadrilogo, by those foure, who take vpon them to expresse the life and processe of Thomas Becket, it appeareth by sundrie circumstances that he was a man of a stout nature, seuere, and inflexible. What perswasion or opinion he had once conceiued, from that he would in no wise be remoued, or very hardly. Threatnings and flatterings were to him both one; in this point singular, following no mans counsell so much as his owne. Great helps of nature there were in him (if hee could haue vsed them well) rather then of learning; albeit somewhat skilfull he was of the ciuill law, which hee studied at Bononie: in memorie excellent good, and also well broken in courtly and worldly matters. Besides this, he was of a chast and strait life, if the histories be true; although in the first part of his life (being yet archdeacon of Canturburie, and after lord chancellour) he was verie euill, courtly, pleasant, giuen much both to hunting and hawking, according to the guise of the court; and highly fauoured he was of his prince, who not only had thus promoted him, but also had committed his sonne and heire to his institution and gouernance. But in this his first beginning, he was not so well beloued, but afterward he was against as much hated (and deseruedly) both of the king, and also of the most part of his subiects, saue only of certaine monkes and priests, and such others as were perswaded by them, who magnified him not a little for vpholding the liberties of the church (that is) the licentious life and excesse of churchmen. Amongst all others, these vices he had most notable, and to be rebuked; full of deuotion, but without all true religion; zealous, but cleane without knowledge. And therefore as he was stiffe and stubborne of nature, so (a blind conscience being ioyned withall) it turned to plaine rebellion. So superstitious he was to the obedience of the pope, that he forgot his obedience to his naturall and most beneficiall king: and in maintaining (so contentiously) the vaine constitutions and decrees of men, he neglected the commandements of God. But herein most of all to be reprehended, that not only (contrarie to the kings knowledge) he sought to conuey himselfe out of the realme (being in that place and calling) but also (being out of the realme) let matter of discord betweene the pope and his king, and also betweene the French king and him, contrarie to all honestie, good order, naturall subiection, and true christianitie. Whereupon followed no little disquietnesse after, both to the king, and damage of the realme, as heere (in processe and order following, by the grace of Christ) we will declare; first beginning with the first rising vp of him, and so consequently to prosecute in order his storie as followeth.

What commeth of blind zeale destitute of right knowledge.

And first heere to omit the progenie of him and of his mother named Rose, whom Polyd. Virgilius falsely nameth to be a Saracen, when indeed this came out of the parts bordering neere to Pomponiane; to omit also the fabulous vision of his mother, mentioned in Roberto Crikeladensi, of a burning torch issuing out of her bodie, and reaching vp to heauen: his first preferment was to the church of Stanfield, which hee had by the gift of S. Albans. After that, he entred in the seruice of the archbishop of Canturburie, by whom he was then preferred to be his archdeacon; and after by the said Theobald was put (as a man meet for his purpose) to king Henrie to bridle the yong king, that he should not bee fierce against the clergie, whom in processe of time the king made lord chancellour, and then he left playing the archdeacon, and began to play the chancellour. He fashioned his conditions like to the kings both in waighttie matters and trifles; hee would hunt with him, and watch the time when the king dined and slept. Furthermore, he began to loue the merrie iestings of the court, to delight himselfe with the great laud of men, and praise of the people. And that I may passe ouer his houshold stuffe, hee had his bridle of siluer, and the bolles of his bridle were worth a great treasure. At his table and other expences he passed any earle: that on the one side men would iudge him little to consider the office of an archdeacon; and on the other side would iudge him to vse wicked doings. Hee played also the good souldier vnder the king in Saxoigne, and both wan and kept townes. When the king sent Thomas being chancellour home into England (ambassadour with other nobles after the death of the archbishop) hee willed Richard Lucie (one of the chiefest) to commend in his name this Thomas to the couent of Canturburie, that they might chuse him archbishop; which thing he did diligently. The monkes said it was not meet to chuse a courtier and a souldier to be head of so holy a company; for he would spend (said they) all that they had. Others had this surmise also, because he was in so great fauour with the prince. The kings sonne, and was so suddenly dischanged of the chancellourship which he had some fiue yeares: in the soure and fortith yeare of his age (on the saturday in Whitsun weeke) he was made priest, and the next day consecrated bishop.

The life of Thomas Becket. Polydore misliketh the mother of Becket. Ex Roberto Crikeladensi. Ex Florilego.

As touching the priesthood of this man, I find the histories to vary in themselues: for if he were beneficed, and chaplaine to Theobald, and afterwards archdeacon (as some say) it is no other like, but that he was priest before, and not (as our most English stories say) made priest in one day, and archbishop the next.

Differences in chronicles.

What holpe euer this matter passeth, heere is in the meane time to be seene, what great benefits the king had done for him, and what great loue hee had been betweene them both. Soone after that Becket was thus promoted, what variance and discord hapned betweene them, remaineth to be shewed: the causes of which variance were diuers and sundrie.

As first, when (according to the custome) the kings officers gathered of euerie one hide money through the realme, for the defence of their owne countrey; the king would haue taken it to his coffers. But the bishop said, that which euerie man gaue willingly, he should not count as his proper rent.

The causes of variance rested betweene the king and the archbishop.

Another cause was, that where a priest was accused of murder, and the kings officers and the friends of the dead accused the priest earnestlie afore the bishop of Salisburie his diocesan to whom he was sent, desiring iustice to be done on him, the priest was put to his purgation. But when he was not able to defend himselfe, the bishop sent to the archbishop to aske what he should do. The archbishop commanded he should be deprised of all ecclesiasticall benefices, and shut vp in an abbie to doe perpetuall penance. After the same sort were diuers others handled for like causes, but none put to death, nor lost toynt, nor burned in the hand, or the like paine.

The third cause was, that where a canon of Buris did vrile the kings iustices, the king was offended with the whole clergie. For these and such like, the archbishop (to pacifie the kings anger) commanded the canon to be whipped and deprised of his benefices for certaine yeeres. But the king was not content with this gentle punishment, because it rather increased their boldnesse, and therefore he called the archbishop, bishops, and all the clergie to assemble at Westminster. When they were assembled together, the king earnestlie commanded that such wicked clerks should haue no priuiledge of their clergie, but be deliuered to the gaolers, because they passed iustice of the spirituall correction; and this he said also their olde canons and lawes had decreed. The archbishop counselling with his bishops and learned men, answered probablie: and in the end he desired hartilie the kings gentlenesse (for the quietnesse of himselfe and his realme) that vnder Christ our new king, and vnder the new law of Christ hee would bring in no new kind of punishment into his realme (vpon the new chosen people of the Lord) against the old decrees of the holie fathers; and oft he said, that he neither ought nor could suffer it. The king moued therewith (and not without cause) allegeth against and reproueth the old lawes and customes of his grandfather, obserued and agreed vpon by archbishops, bishops, prelats, and other priuileged persons, inquiring likewise of him whether he would agree to the same, or else now (in his raigne) would condemne that which in the raigne of his grandfather was well allowed. To which lawes and customes the said Thomas did partlie grant, and partly not grant. The copie of the which foresaid lawes are contained in the number of eight and twentie or nine and twentie, whereof I thought here to recite certaine not vnworthie to be knowne.

The copie of the old lawes and customes where*unto Thomas Becket did grant.*

The kings custome.

1 THat no order should be giuen to husbandmens children and bondmens children, without the assent or testimonie of them, which be the lords of the countrie where they were borne and brought vp: and if their sonnes become clerks, they shall not receiue the order of priesthood without licence of their lords.

Out of an English chronicle agreeth with the processe of Henrie the second, and Thomas Becket, lord Stokes.

2 And if a man of holy church hold any law fee in his hand, he shall do therefore the king the seruice that belongeth therefo, as vpon iuries, assise of lands and iudgements, sauing onlie at exception point of death.

3 If any man were the kings traitor, and had taken the church, that it should be lawfull to the king and his officers to take him out.

4 And if any fellons goods were brought to holie church, that there should none such keepe there, for euery fellons goods bee the kings.

5 That no land should be giuen to the church, or to any house of religion, without the kings licence.

These articles following Thomas agreed not vnto.

1 IF that betweene a clerke and a lay man were any striuing for church goods, they would the plea should bee done in the kings court.

2 That there should neither bishop nor clerke goe out of the land without the kings licence, and then he should sweare vpon a booke he should procure no hurt against the king, nor none of his.

3 If any man were denounced accursed, and were come againe to amendment, the king would not that he should bee sworne, but only find suerties to stand to that that holy church should award.

4 The fourth that no man that held of the king in chiefe or in seruice, should be accursed without the kings licence.

5 That all the bishoprikes and abbies that were vacant, should be in the kings hands, vntill such time that he should chose a prelat thereto, and he should be chosen out of the kings chapels; and first before he were confirmed, he should doe his homage to the king.

6 If any plea were brought to a consistory, they shall appeale from thence to the archdeacon, and from thence to the bishops court, and from the bishops court to the archbishops, and from thence to the king, and no further. So that in conclusion, the complaints of holy church must come before the king, and not the pope.

7 That all debts that were owing through trothplight, should not be pleaded in spirituall, but in temporall courts.

8 That the Peter-pence, which to the pope were gathered, should be taken to the king.

9 If any clerke for fellonie were taken and so prooued, he should bee first degraded, and then through iudgement to bee hanged, or if he were a traitor, to be drawne.

Other lawes and constitutions made at Clarendon
in Normandie and sent to England, whereunto Becket and the pope would not agree, he being then fled out of the realme.

The lawes of Clarendon.

1 IF any person shall bee found to bring from the pope, or from the archbishop of Canturburie any writing containing any indict or cause against the realme of England, the same man to be apprehended without delay for a traitor, and execution to be done vpon the same.

2 That no monke nor any clerke shall be permitted to passe ouer into England without a passport from the king or his iustices; who for both the contrarie, that man to be tached and imprisoned.

3 No man to be so bold once to appeale to the pope, or to the archbishop of Canturburie out of England.

4 That no decree or commandement proceeding from the authoritie of the pope or the bishop of Canturburie, to be receiued in England, vnder paine of taking and imprisoning.

5 In generall, to forbid any man to carrie ouer any commandement or precept, either of clerke, or layman, to the pope or to the archbishop of Canturburie, vnder paine of imprisonment.

6 If any bishop, clerke, abbat, or layman shall doe contrarie to this inhibition, or will keepe the sentence of interdicting, the same incontinent to be thrust out of the land, with all their kinred, and to leaue all their goods behind them.

7 All the possessions, goods and chatels of such as fauour the pope or the archbishop of Canturburie, to be seized and confiscat for the king.

8 All such of the clergie as be out of the realme, hauing their rents and profits out of the land, to be summoned and warned (though euery three within three moneths to repaire home, or else their rents and goods to returne to the king.

9 That S. Peters pence should be no more paid to the apostolicall see, but to be reserued diligently in the kings coffers, and there to bee at his commandement. Atque hæc ex Quadrilogo.

10 That the bishops of Salisburie and Norwich be at the kings mercie, and be summoned by the shiriffe and bedels, that they before the kings iustices doe right to the king and his iustices, because (contrarie to the statutes of Clarendon) by commandement they interdicted the land of earle Hugh, and published the same in their diocesse without licence of the kings iustices.

¶ By these and such other lawes and decrees it may appeare, that the abolishing of the pope is no new thing in the realme of England. This only difference there is, that the pope being driuen out then, could not be kept out so long as now he is. The cause is, that the time was not yet come that antichrist should so fullie be reuealed; neither was his wickednes then so fullie ripe in those daies, as it hath been now in our time. Now these premised, let vs returne where we left, to the matter betweene the king and Thomas Becket.

The communication and controuersie betweene
the king and Thomas Becket with his clergie.

THe king (as is afore said) consenting his nobles and clerks together, required to haue the punishment of certaine misdoers of the clergie; but Thomas Becket not assenting thereunto, the king came to this point, to know whether he would consent with his clergie, that the customs then set forth in the realme (meaning the first part of those decrees aboue specified) should be obserued. To which the archbishop, consulting together with his brethren, giueth answer against; that he was contented the kings ordinances should be obserued, adding this withall, Saluo ordine suo, that is; Sauing his order. And so in like manner all the other bishops after, being demanded in order, answered with the same addition, Saluo ordine suo. Dnelie Hilarius bishop of Chichester, perceiuing the king to be exasperat with that addition, in stead of Saluo ordine, agreed to obserue them Bona fide. The king hearing them not simplie to agree vnto him, but with an exception, was mightilie offended; whereupon turning to the archbishop and the prelates, said; that he was not well contented with that clause of theirs, Saluo suo ordine, which he said was captious and deceitfull, hauing some manner of venom lurking vnder; and therefore required an absolute grant of them without any exception to agree to the kings ordinances. To this the archbishop answered againe, that they had sworne vnto him their fidelitie, both life, bodie, and earthlie honor, Saluo ordine suo; and that in the same earthlie honor also those ordinances were comprehended, and to the obseruing they would bind themselues after after no other forme, but as they had sworne before. The king with this was moued, and all his nobilitie not a little. As for the other bishops, there was no doubt but they would easilie haue relented, had not the stoutnesse of the archbishop made them more constant then otherwise they would haue been. The day being well spent, the king (when he could get no other answer of them) departed in great anger, giuing no word of salutation to the bishops, likewise the bishops euery one to his owne house departed. The bishop of Chichester (amongst the rest) was greatly rebuked of his fellowes for changing the exception contrarie to the voice of all the others. The next day following the king tooke from the archbishop all such honors and liuings, as he had giuen him before, in the time that he was archbishop, as he had giuen him before, in the time that he was chancellor, all which did openlie appeared the great displeasure of the king against him and the clergie. Not long after this, the king removing from London vnto Woodstocke to the bishops sailed ouer to Normandy, whither the bishop of London called Gilbert (not long after) returned to craue the kings fauour, and gaue him counsell withall to ioyne some of the bishops on his side, lest if all were against him, peraduenture hee might sooner bee ouerthrowne. And thus the greatest number of the bishops were by this meanes reconciled against to the king, only the archbishop with a few others remained in their stoutnes still. The king (thinking to trie all maner of waies) when he saw no feare nor threats could turne him, did assay him with gentlenesse; it would not serue. Many of the nobles laboured betwixt them both, exhorting him to relent to the king; it would not be. Likewise the archbishop of Yorke with diuers other bishops and abbats (especiallie the bishop of Chester) did the same. Neither this his owne houshold bande called vpon him, but no man could persuade him. At length vnderstanding partly by them that came to him, what danger might happen not only to himselfe, but to all the other clergie vpon the kings displeasure: partly considering the old loue and kindnesse of the king towards him in time past, was content to giue ouer to the kings request, and came to Oxford to him, reconciling himselfe about the addition, which displeased the king so much. Whereupon the king (being somewhat mitigated) receiued him with a more cheerefull countenance, but yet not all so familiar as before, saying; that hee would haue his ordinances and proceedings after the forme confirmed in the publike audience and open light of his bishops and all his nobles. After this the king (being at Clarendon, there called all his peeres and prelats before him, requiring to haue that performed, which they had promised, in consenting to the obseruing of his grandfathers ordinances and proceedings. The archbishop suspecting (I cannot tell what) in the kings promise, drew backward, and now would not that he would before, at last with much adoe he was inforced to giue assent. First, came to him the bishop of Salisburie and of Norwich, who (for old matters indangered to the king long before, came weeping and lamenting to the archbishop, desiring him to haue some compassion of them, and to remit this pertinacie to the king, lest if hee so continued (though his stoutnesse to eraspe at the kings displeasure) happily it might redound to no small danger, not onely of them which were in ieopardie already, but also of himselfe to be imprisoned, and the whole clergie to be indangered. Besides these two bishops, there went to him other two noble peeres of the realme, labouring with him to relent and condescend to the kings desire: if not, they should be inforced to vse violence, as neither would stand with the kings fame, and much lesse with his quietnesse; but yet the stout stomach of the man would not giue ouer. After this came to him two rulers of the temple called Templares, one Richard de Hall, another Ossias de Iewrie with their companie, lamenting and bewailing their great perill which they declared vnto him to hang ouer his head: yet neither with their teares nor with their kneelings would he be remoued. At length came the last message from the king, signifying vnto him with expresse words (also with teares) what he should trust to, if he would not giue ouer to the kings request.

By reason of which message, he (either terrified or else perswaded) was content to submit himselfe. Whereupon the king incontinent assembling the states together, the archbishop first before all others beginneth to promise to the king obedience, and submission vnto his customs, and that Cumbona fide, leauing out his former addition, Saluo ordine, mentioned before in stead whereof he promised in Verbo veritatis, to obserue and keep the kings customes and sweare to the same. After him the other bishops likewise gaue the like oth, whereupon the king commanded incontinent certaine instruments obligatorie to be drawne of the which the king should haue the one, the archbishop of Canterburie another, the archbishop of Yorke the third, requiring also the said archbishop to set to his hand & seale. To the which the archbishop (although not denying but that he was readie so to doe, yet desired respit in the matter, while that he (being but newlie come to his bishoprike) might better perse with himselfe the foresaid customes and ordinances of the king. This request as it seemed not reasonable, so it was lightlie granted: and so the day being well spent, they departed for that season and brake vp.

Alanus, one of the seuere writers of the life of this Thomas Becket, recordeth; that the archbishop in his voiage towards Winchester, began greatly to repent that he had done before, partly through the indignation of certaine about him, but chiefly of his crosbearer, who going before the archbishop, sharplie and earnestlie expostulated with him for giuing ouer to y^e kings request, against the priuiledge and liberties of the church, pulling not onlie his fame and conscience, but also giuing a pernicious example to them that should come after, with many like words. To make the matter short the archbishop was so touched vpon the same with such repentance, that keeping himselfe from all companie, lamenting with teares, with fasting, and with much penance macerating and afflicting himselfe, did suspend himselfe from all diuine seruice, and would not receiue comfort, before that (word being sent to his holy grandfather the pope) he should be assoiled of him, who rendering the teares of his deare chicken, directed to him letters againe by the same messenger which Thomas had sent vp to him before. In which letters not onlie he assoiled him from his trespasse, but also with words of great consolation did incourage him to be stout in the quarell he tooke in hand. The copie of which letters consolatorie sent from the pope to bishop Becket, heere followeth vnder written.

The stubborne vnfaithfulnesse of Tho. Becket.

Thomas Becket relenteth to the king.

Becket repenteth of his good deed.

A letter of pope Alexander to Thomas Becket.

ALexander bishop, &c. Your brotherhood is not ignorant that it hath been aduertised vs, how that vpon the occasion of a certaine transgression or excesse of yours, you haue determined to cease henceforth from saying of masse, & to abstaine from the consecration of the bodie & bloud of the Lord; which thing to doe, how dangerous it is (especially in such a person) and also what inconuenience may rise thereof, I will you aduisedly to consider, and discreetly also to ponder. Your wisdome ought not to forget what difference there is betweene them which aduisedly & willingly doe offend, & those which through ignorance & for necessitie fake do offend. For as you reade, so much the more greater is wilfull sinne, as the same not being voluntarie is lesser sinne. Therfore if you remember your selfe to haue done any thing that your owne conscience doth accuse you of, whatsoeuer it be, we counsell you (as a prudent and wise prelat) to acknowledge the same. Which thing done, the mercifull and pitifull God, who hath more respect to the heart of the doer then to the thing done, will remit & forgiue you the same according to his accustomed great mercie. And we trusting in the merits of the blessed apostles S. Peter and Paul doe absolue you from the offence committed, and by the authoritie apostolicall wee release you vnto your fraternitie, counselling you & commanding you, that henceforth you abstaine not (for this cause) from the celebration of the masse.

The popes letter consolatorie and absolutorie vnto him.

This letter with others more after like sort the pope then wrote to him, animating and comforting him in this quarell so nerely pertaining to the popes profit. By the occasion whereof, Becket tooke no small heart and consolation: in so much that therof seemeth to me to proceed all the occasion that made him so stout and malapert against his prince, as hereafter followeth to be seene by his doings. What the other letters were that the pope wrote vnto him, shortlie after (when we come to the appellations made to the pope shall appeare God willing. In the meane season (as he lai thus mourning at home) the king hearing of him, and how he deni d to set his seale to those sanctions, which he condescended to before, take no little displeasure against him: in so much that hee (threatning to him and his, banishment & death) began to call him to reckonings, and to burthen him with paiments, that all men might vnderstand that the kings mind was sore set against him. The archbishop hereupon (whether more for the loue of the pope, or dread of his prince) thought to make an escape out of the realme, and so went about in the night (with two or three) with him stealing out of his house, to take the sea pinnke. Now amongst others the kings ordinances and sanctions, this was one; that none of the prelate & nobilitie without the kings licence (or of his iustices) should depart out of the realme. So Becket twice attempted the sea to get to the see of Rome, but the weather not seruing, was driuen home againe, and his deuice so that time frustrated. After his departure began to be knowne and noised abrode, the kings officers came to Canturburie to seize vpon his goods in the kings behalfe. But as it chanced the night before their comming, Becket being returned & found at home, they did not proceed in their purpose.

Becket requireth of the king.

Becket entereth with against the kings lawes to flie out of the realme.

Becket returned of the king.

Upon this, the archbishop (vnderstanding the king forbent against him, and the seas not to serue him) made hast to the court lying then at Woodstocke, where the king receiued him (after a certaine manner) but nothing so familiarlie as he was wont, taunting him iestingli & merilie, as though one realme were not able to hold them both. Becket (although hee was permitted to go and come at his pleasure to the court) yet could not obtaine the fauour that hee would, perceiuing both in himselfe, and counselling no lesse to others, how the matter would fall out, so that either hee should be constrained to giue ouer with shame, or stoutly stand to that which he had so boldly taken in hand. The archbishop of Yorke in the meane time (going betwixt the king & the archbishop) laboured to make a peace and loue betwixt them; but the king in no case would be reconciled, vnlesse the other would subscribe to his lawes.

So

So the while, neither the king would otherwise agree, nor yet the archbishop in any wise would subscribe, there was a foule discord; where the fault was, let the reader here iudge betweene them both. The king for his regall authoritie thought it much that any subiect of his should stand against him. The archbishop againe (bearing himselfe bold vpon the authoritie, and especially vpon the letters of the pope lately written to him) thought him strong inough against the king & all his realme. Againe, such was his quarrell for the maintenance of liberties and glorie of the church, that hee could lacke no letters or and fauourers in that behalfe, in so sweet a cause amongst the clergie. Wherefore the archbishop (trusting to these things) would giue no place, but by vertue of his apostolike authoritie gaue censure vpon these lawes and constitutions of the king, condemning some, and other some approuing for good and catholike, as is before declared. Besides this, there came also to the king Rotrodus archbishop of Rothomage (sent from the pope) to make peace betweene the king and Canturburie: wherevnto the king was well content, so that the pope would agree to ratifie his ordinances. But when that could in no wise be obtained at the popes hands, then the king being stopped and frustrat of his purpose by reason of Beckets apostolike legacie (being Legatus a latere) thought good to send vp to the pope, and so did, to obtaine of him, that the same authoritie of the apostolike legacie might bee conferred to another after his appointment, which was the archbishop of Yorke: but the pope denied.

Ex Rogero Houeden. in Annalibus partis posteriori Bedam.

The king to be the popes legat.

Notwithstanding at the request of the kings clergie, the pope was content that the king should be legat himselfe; whereat the king tooke great indignation (as Houeden writeth) so that he sent the pope his letters againe. Heere the pope was perplexed on both sides.

If he should haue denied the king, that was too hot for him: for the pope vseth alwaies to hold in with kings howsoeuer they would speedeth. Againe, if he should haue forsaken such a churchly chaplen, the cause being so sweet and so gamefull, that should haue been against himselfe. What did he then? Heere now commeth in the old practise of popish prelacie, to play with both hands: minde he conspireth with the one, and openly buffeteth with the other. First, he granted to the kings ambassadors their request, to haue the legat reuoked, and to place in that office the archbishop of Yorke, after his olde contentation; and yet notwithstanding (to render the cause of Thomas Becket) he addeth this promise withall, that the said Becket should receiue no harme or damage therby. Thus the pope craftely couering the matter betweene them both, glad to further the archbishop for his owne aduantage, and yet loth to denie the king for displeasure, writeth to the king openly, and also secretlie directeth another letter to Becket: the contents whereof heere follow.

The craftie dissimulation of the pope.

Alexander the pope, to Thomas archbishop of Canturburie.

The popes secret letters to Becket.

ALthough wee condescending to the kings request, haue granted the gift of our legacie after his mind from you: yet let not your mind thereby be discomforted, nor brought into sighs of despaire. For before that we had granted that, or gaue our consent thereunto; the kings ambassadors firmely promised in the word of truth (readie also to bee sworne vpon the same, if I would so haue required) that their letters also which hee had obtained, should not be deliuered to the archbishop of York without our knowledge and consent therein. This is certaine, and so perswade your selfe boldly without any scruple, doubt or mistrust, that it was neuer my mind or purpose, nor euer shall be (God willing) to subdue you or your church vnder the obedience of any person, to be subiect, saue only to the bishop of Rome. And therfore we warne you & charge you, that if you shall perceiue the king to deliuer these foresaid letters, which we trust he will not attempt without our knowledge to do; forthwith by some trustie messenger or by your letters you will giue vs knowledge thereof: whereby wee may prouide vpon the same both for your person, your church, and also your city committed to you, to be clearely exempt by our authority apostolicall, from all power and iurisdiction of any legacie.

Upon these letters and such others (as is said before) Becket seemed to take all his boldnesse to be so stout and sturdy against his prince as he was. The pope (besides these sent secretlie this chaplen of his, and directed another letter also vnto the king, granting and permitting at his request, to make the archbishop of Yorke legat apostolicall.

The king (after he had receiued his letters sent from the pope) began to put more strength to his purposed proceedings against the archbishop, first beginning with the inferiors of the clergie, such as were offendors against his lawes: as fellons, robbers, quarellers, breakers of peace, & especially such as had committed homicide and murthers, whereof more then an hundred at that time were proued vpon the clergie (as witnesseth Guliel. Neuburgensis, in his booke De gestis Anglorum, lib. 2. cap. 16.) vsing and constraining them to be arraigned after the order of the law temporall, and iudged to bee minished to them according to their deserts: as first to be depriued, and so to be committed to the secular hands. This seemed to Becket to derogat from the liberties of holy church, that the secular power should passe in causes criminall, or sit in iudgement against any ecclesiasticall person. This law, the rotters (then of the clergie) had picked and forged out of Anacletus & Gratianus, by whose false alleaged and pretensed authoritie, they haue deduced this their constitution from the apostles, which giueth immunitie to all ecclesiasticall persons to be free from secular iurisdiction. Becket therefore like a valiant champion fighting for his liberties, and hauing the pope on his side, would not permit his clerks vnfamed, otherwise to be conuicted then before ecclesiasticall iudges, there to bee examined and deprined for their exercise, and no secular iudge to proceed against them: so that after their deprination, if they should incurre the like offence againe, then the temporall iudge to take hold vpon them, otherwise not. This obstinat and stubborne rebellion of the archbishop stirred vp much anger and vexation in their king, and not only in him, but also in the nobles and in all the bishops for the greater part; that almost he was alone a wanderinent to all the realme.

The kings wrath daily increased more and more against him, in so much as it was and caused him to be cited vp to appeare by a certaine day at the towne of Northhampton, there to make answer to such things as should be laid to his charge. So when the day was come, all the peeres and nobles with the prelats of the realme vpon the kings proclamation being assembled in the castell of Northhampton, great sute was found with the archbishop, for that hee (personally cited to appeare) came not himselfe, but sent another for him. The cause why he came not, Houeden alligateth to be this: for that the king had placed his horse and horsemen in the archbishops lodging (which was a house there of canons) whereunto he being offended, sent word againe that he would not appeare, vnlesse his lodging were voided of the kings horsemen, &c. Whereupon (by the publike sentence as well of all the nobles, as of the bishops) all his moueables were adiudged to be confiscat for the king, vnlesse the kings clemencie would remit the penaltie. The stubborne archbishop against (for his part) quarelling against the order and forme of the iudgement, complained: alleaging for himselfe (seeing he is their primat, and spirituall father) not onely of all other in the realme, but also of the king himselfe) not to be conuenient, the father so to be iudged of his children, nor the pastor of his flocke so to be condemned: saying moreouer, that the ages to come should know what iudgement was done, &c. But especially he complained of his fellow bishops (when they should rather haue taken his part) so to sit in iudgement against their metropolitane. And this was the first daies action.

Becket cites to Northampton.

The kings lodging voided by the kings officers.

The archbishop condemned in the councell of Northampton in the kings mouueables.

The next day following, the king laid an action against him in the behalfe of one that was his marshall (called John) for certaine iniuries done to him. And required of the said archbishop the repaying againe of certaine monie, which he (as is said) had lent vnto him being chancelor, the sum whereof came to 500. marks. This monie the archbishop denied not but hee had receiued of the king, howbeit, by the way and title of gift as he tooke it, though he could bring no probation therof. Whereupon the king required him to put in assurance for the paiment therof: where at the archbishop making delaies (not well contented at the matter) was so called vpon, that either he should be countable to the king for the monie, or else he should incurre present danger, the king being so bent against him. The archbishop being brought to such a strait, and deficiant of his owne suffragans, could heere by no means haue escaped, had not fiue persons of their owne accord stepped in being bound for him, euery man for 100. marks a peece. And this was vpon the second day concluded.

Becket required to giue an account.

The morow after (which was the third day of the councel, as the archbishop was sitting below in a certaine conclaue with his fellow bishops about him, consulting together, the doores fast locked to them, as the king had willed and commanded, it was propounded vnto him in the behalfe of the king, that he had diuers bishoprikes & abbaries in his hand which were vacant, with the fruits and reuenues therof due vnto the king for certaine yeres, whereof he had readered as yet no account to the king: wherfore it was demanded of him to bring in a full and a cleare reckoning of the same. This, with other such like, declared to all the councell, great displeasure to be in the king, and no lesse danger toward the archbishop.

The aduice of the bishops for Thomas Becket.

THus while the bishops and prelats were in counsell, aduising and deliberating what was to bee done, at length it came to voices, euery man to say his mind, and to giue sentence what were the best way for their archbishop to take. First began Henrie bishop of Winchester, who then tooke part with Becket so much as he durst for feare of the king, who said, hee remembred that the said archbishop first being archdeacon, and then lord chancellor, at what time as he was promoted to the church of Canturburie, was discharged from all bonds and reckonings of the temporall court, as all the other bishops could not but beare record to the same.

The verdict of Winchester.

Next

The counsell of the bishop of London.

Nert spake Gilbert bishop of London, exhorting and mouing the archbishop that he should call with himselfe to mind from whence the king toke him, and set him vp; what and how great things he had don: for him; also that he should consider with himselfe the dangers and perils of the time, and what time he might hang vpon the whole church (and vpon them all there present) the refused the kings mind in the things he required. And if it were to render vp his archbishoprike (although it were ten times better then it is) yet he should not sticke with the king in the matter. In so doing it might happen, the king, seeing that submission and humilitie in him, would release him peraduenture of all the rest. To this the archbishop answering, Well, well (saith he; I perceiue well inough my Lord whither you tend, and whither about you go. Then spake Winchester, inferring vpon the same; This forme of counsell (saith he) seemeth to me very pernicious to the catholike church, leading to our subuersion, and to the confusion of vs all. For if our archbishop and primat of all England doe leaue to this example, that euery bishop should giue ouer his authoritie & the charge of the flocke committed to him, at commandement and threatning of the prince; to what state shall the church bee brought then, but that all should be confounded at his pleasure and abitrement, and nothing to stand certaine by any order of law, and so as the priest is, so shall the people be?

Winchester.

Hilarie the bishop of Chichester replieth against to this, saying: If it were not that the instance and the great perturbation of time did otherwise require and force vs, I would thinke this counsell here giuen were good to be followed. But now seeing the authoritie of our canon faileth, and cannot serue vs, I iudge it not best to go to strictie to worke, but to moderat our proceedings, that dispensation with sufferance may win that which seuere execution may destroy. Therefore my counsell and reason is, to giue place to the kings purpose for a time, lest (by ouer hastie proceeding wee ercede so far) that both it may redound to our shame, and also cannot rid our selues out againe when we would.

Chichester.

Mathrat counsell.

Lincolne.

Such to the same end spake Robert the bishop of Lincolne after this maner: Seeing (saith he) it is manifest that the life and blood of this man is sought, one of these two must needs be chosen; that either he must part with his archbishoprike, or else with his life. Now what profit he shall take in this matter of his bishoprike, his life being lost, I doe not greatly see.

Lincolne.

Exeter.

Nert followed Bartholomew bishop of Exceter with his aduice, who (inclining his counsell to the state of the time, confirmed their sayings before, affirming how the daies were euill and perillous; and if they might so escape the violence of that raging tempest vnder the couer of bearing & relenting, it were not to be refused. But that, he said, could not bee, except strict seueritie should giue place to tractabilitie; and so the instance and condition of time then present required no lesse, especially seeing that perfection was not generall, but perticuall & particular; and thought it more holy and conuenient, ore head to run into some part of danger, then the whole church of England to be subiect and exposed to incorrauenience inuitable.

Exeter.

The answer of Roger bishop of Worcester was deuised in a double sapence, neither affirming the one, nor denying the other, whose saying was this: That he would giue no answer on neither part: for if I (saith he) shall say that the patroall function and cure of soules ought to be relinquished at the kings will or threatning, then my mouth shall speake against my conscience to the condemnation of mine owne head. And if I shall giue againe contrarie counsell to resist the kings sentence, here be they that will heare it, and report it to his grace, and so I shall be in danger to be thrust out of the synagogue, and for my part to bee accounted amongst the publike rebels (with them to be condemned); wherefore neither do I say this, nor counsell that.

Worcester.

And this was the consultation of the bishops in that place, assembled together by the kings commandement. Against these aduise and sentences of the bishops, Becket the archbishop replieth again, expostulating and checking them with rebukefull words. I perceiue (saith he) and vnderstand ye go about to maintaine and cherish but your owne cowardnesse, vnder the colorable shadow of sufferance: and vnder pretence of dissembling lothnesse to dyshe the libertie of Christs church. Who hath thus bewitched you, O vnstable bishops? What meane ye? Why do ye so vnder the vnprudent title of forbearing, beare a double heart, and cloke your manifest iniquitie? What call ye this bearing with time, the detriment of the church of Christ? Let termes serue the matter. Why peruert you the matter that is good with vocables and termes vnaptue? For that ye say we must beare with the malice of time, I grant with you: but yet we must not heape sinne to sinne. Is not God able to helpe the state and condition of his church, but with the sinfull dissimulation of the teachers of the church? Serues God is disposed to tempt you. And tell me (I pray you) whether should the gouernors of the church put themselues to dangers for the church in time of tranquillitie, or in time of distresse? We will be ashamed to deuise the contrarie, but in distresse. And now then (the church lying in so great distresse and decation) who should not the good pastor put himselfe into perill therefore? For neither doe I thinke it a greater act or merit for the ancient bishops of the old time, to lay the foundation of the church then (with the bloud, then now for vs to shed our bloud for the liberties of the same. And to tell you plaine, I thinke it not safe for you to learne from an example which you haue receiued of your holy elders. After these things were spoken, they sat all in silence a certaine space being locked in together. At length (to find a shift to cause the dore to be opened) I wil (saith the archbishop) speak with two earles which are about the king, and named them who they were. Who (being called) opened the doze and came in with hast, thinking to heare some thing which should appeale the kings mind. To whom the archbishop spake in this manner: As touching and concerning the matters betweene the king and vs, we haue here conferred together. And forsomuch as we haue them not present with vs now, which knew more in the matter then we doe (whose aduice we would be glad also to follow) therefore wee cease to vnsu respit as till the next day following, and then to giue our answer vnto the king. With this message two bishops were sent to the king, which was the bishop of London, and the bishop of Rochester.

A great difference in the church, because bishops may not be obnoxe kings and princes.

London (to helpe the matter, and to set quietnes, as I take it, adding something more to the message) said to the king, that the archbishop craued a little delay of time to prepare such writings and instruments, wherein he should set forth and declare his mind in accomplishing the kings desire, &c. Wherfore, two barons were sent to him from the king to grant him that spirit or stay; so that he would ratifie that which the messengers ban signified to the king. To the which the archbishop answereth, that he sent no message as was intimat in his name: but onelie, that the next day here would come and giue answer to the king in that which he had to say. And to the consecration of the bishops was disclosed and dissented home: so that the most part of them that came with the archbishop and accompanied him before (for feare of the kings displeasure) seuered themselues from him. The archbishop thus forsaken and destitute (as his owne faith sent about for the peace, the lame, and the halt, to come in and furnish his house, saying, that by them hee might soner obtaine his purpose, then by the others which had so slipt from him.

Becket destitute and forsaken.

On the next day following, because it was sunday, nothing was done. So the day after, which was the second ferie, the archbishop was cited to appeare. But the night before (being taken with a disease called Passio iliaca, the colicke) as that day he kept his bed & was not able, as he said, to rise. Euery man supposing this to be but a faine sickenesse, as it seemed no lesse, certaine of the chiefe nobles were sent to trie the matter, and to cite him to the court: namely, Robert earle of Leicester, & Reginald earle of Deuonshire. To whom the archbishop answered, that as that day he was so diseased that he could not come, yea though he were brought in an horslitter. So that day passed ouer. The morow after, certaine that were about him, fearing no lesse but that some danger would happen to him, gaue him counsell in the morning to haue a masse in the honor of the holy martyr S. Steuen, to kepe him from the hands of his enemies that day. When the morow was come (being tuesday) there came to him the bishops & prelats, counselling and perswading him couertly by instimation (for openly they durst not) that he would submit himselfe with all his goods (as also his archbishoprike) to the will of the king, if peraduenture his indignation by that meanes might asswage. Adding moreouer, that vnles he would so doe, periurie would be laid against him: for that hee being vnder the oth of fidelitie to keepe the kings lawes and ordinances, now would not obserue them.

Becket taken with sickenesse when he should appeare.

A masse of S. Steuen to saue him from his enemies.

Becket called traitor of the king & all the realme.

Bethren yee sit and perceiue well how the world is set against me, and how the enemie riseth and seeketh my confusion. And although these things be dolorous & lamentable, yet the thing that grieueth me most of all, is this: The sonnes of mine owne mother be pickes and thornes against me. And albeit I doe hold my peace, yet the posteritie to come will know and report how cowardly you haue turned your backes, and haue left your archbishop and metropolitane alone in his conflict, and how you haue sitten in iudgement against me (although vngruilie of crime) now two daies together, and not onely in the ciuill and spirituall court, but also in the temporall court readie to do the same. But in generall this I charge and command (as the vertue of pure obedience, and in perill of your order) that ye be present personally in iudgement against me. And that yee shall not faile so to do, I here appeale to our mother (the refuge of all such as be oppressed) the church of Rome: and if any secular man shall lay hands vpon mee (as it is rumored they will) I straitly inioyne and charge you in the same vertue of obedience, that you exercise your censure ecclesiasticall vpon them, as it becommeth you to do for a father and an archbishop. And this I doe yee to vnderstand, that though the world rage, and the enemie be fierce, and the bodie trembleth (for the flesh is weake) yet God so fauouring me, I will neither cowardlie shrinke, nor yet vilie forsake my flocke committed vnto my charge, &c.

Becket appeleth to Rome.

But the bishop of London, contrarie to this commandement of the archbishop, did incontinent appeale from him. And thus the bishops departed from him to the court; saue onelie two, Henrie of Winchester, and Jocelin of Salisburie, who returned returned with him secretly to his chamber and comforted him. This done, the archbishop (which yesterday was so sore sicke that he could not stir out of his bed) now addresseth him to his masse of S. Stephan in all solemnitie, as though it had been an high festiuall day, with his metropolitan pall, which was not yet put vpon the holy day to be worne, &c. The office of his masse began, Sedeunt principes & aduersum me loquebantur: that is, Princes sat & spake against me, &c. (the kings seruants being also there and beholding the matter.) For this masse Gilbert bishop of London accused Becket afterward, both for that it was done Per artem magicam, & in contemptum regis (as the words of Houeden purport) that is, both by art magike, and in contempt of the king, &c.

London appeleth from the archbishop.

Becket taketh occasion to absent himself from the parliament going to the king.

The masse being ended, the archbishop putting off his pal, his miter and other robes) proceedeth to the kings court: but yet not trusting peraduenture so greatly to the strength of his masse to make the matter more sure) he taketh also the sacrament of the aultar about him, thinking thereby himselfe sufficiently defensed against all bugs. In going to the kings chamber (there to attend the kings comming) as he was entring the doze, he taketh from Alexander his crosier, the crosse with the crosse staffe, in the sight of all that stood by, and earnestly in himselfe, the other bishops following him, and saying he did otherwise then became him. Amongst others Robert bishop of Hereford offered himselfe to beare his crosse rather then he should so do, for that it was not comelie, but the archbishop would not suffer him. Then said the bishop of London vnto him: If the king shall see you come armed into his chamber, perchance he will draw out his sword against you, which is stronger then yours, and then what shall this your account profit you? The archbishop answereth again; If the kings sword doe cut carnallie, yet my sword cutteth spirituallie, and striketh downe to hell.

Becket refuseth to bring to the bishop of London, but to the archbishop of Psyche.

But pen my lord, as you haue plaied the sole in this matter, so you will not yet leaue off your follie to any thing I can see; and so he came into the chamber. The king hearing of his coming and of the manner thereof, tarried not long, but came where Becket was set in a place by himselfe with his other bishops about him. First, the crier called the prelats and all the lords of the temporalitie together. That being done (and euery one placed in his seat according to his degree) the king beginneth with a great complaint against the archbishop for his contempt of entring into the court not as (saith he) a subiect into a kings court; but as a traitor, shewing himselfe in such sort as hath not been seene before in any christian kings court, professing christian faith. To this all (there present) gaue witnesse with the king, affirming him alwaies to be a braine & a proud man, and that the shame of his fact did not only redound against the prince himselfe, but also against the whole realme. And moreouer, they said that this had so happened to the king, for that he had done so much for such a beast, aduancing him so highly in such a place and towne next vnder himselfe. And so all together with one crie called him traitor an cuery side, as one that refused to giue temporall right to the king, in keeping (as he had sworne) his lawes and ordinances, at whose hands also he had receiued such honor, and great preferments, and therfore was well worthie (said they) to be hanged like a periured traitor and rebell. Wherevpon great doubt and feare was that should befal vpon him. The archbishop of York comming downe to his inn, said he could not abide to see what the archbishop of Canturburie was like to suffer. Likewise, the tipstaues and other ministers of the allsmittie comming downe with an outcrie against him, crossed them to see his hautie stubbornnesse, and the brusnesse there was about him. Certaine there were of his disciples sitting at his feet, comforting him softly, and bidding him to lay his curse vpon them. Others (contrarie) bidding him not to curse, but to pray and to forgiue them; and if he lost his life in the quarell of the church and the libertie thereof, he should be happie. Afterward, one of them, named Johannes Stephani, desired to speake something in his care; but could not be suffered by the kings marshal, who sayd that any man should haue any talke with him. Then he (because he could not otherwise speak to him) wrought by signes, making a crosse, & looking vp with his eies, and wagging his lips, meaning that he should pray and manfully stand to the crosse. In the meane time commeth to him Bartholomew bishop of Exceter, desiring him to haue regard and compassion of himselfe and also of them, or els they were all like to perish for the hatred of him: for there commeth out (saith he) a precept from the king that he shall be taken, and suffer for an open rebell that hereafter taketh your part. It is said moreouer that Jocelinus bishop of Salisburie, and Willelmus bishop of Norwich are to be had to the place of execution, for their resisting and making intercession for the bishop of Canturburie. When he had thus said, the archbishop (looking vpon the said bishop of Exceter) auoid hence from me, saith he, thou vnderstandest not, neither doest saiour those things that be of God.

Becket cited to Rome vpon periurie by the bishops.

Becket taketh Becketes part, & counted a rebell.

The bishops and prelats then going aside by themselues from the other nobles (the king so permitting them to do) take counsell together what was to be done. Here the matter stood in a doubtfull perplexitie, for either must they incur the dangerous indignation of the king, or else with the nobles they must proceed in condemnation against the archbishop for resisting the kings sanctions; which thing, neither they themselues did fauor. In this strict necessitie, they denuing what way to take) at length agreed vpon this: that they with a common assent should cite the archbishop to the see of Rome vpon periurie: and that they should oblige and binde themselues to the king with a sure promise, to worke their diligence in depesing the archbishop (vpon this condition) that the king should promise their safetie, and discharge them from the peril of that iudgement which was to haue ben them. So all the bishops obliging themselues thus to the king, went forth to the archbishop: of whom ore speaking for the rest (which was Hilarie bishop of Chichester) had these words: Once you haue been our archbishop, and so long wee were bound to your obedience: but now forsomuch as you (once sweuring your fidelitie to the king) doe resist him, neglecting his inunctions and ordinances concerning and appertaining to his terren honor and dignitie; wee here pronounce you periured, neither be we bound to giue obedience to an archbishop thus being periured; but putting our selues and all ours in the popes protection, doe cite you by to his presence. And vpon the same, assigned him his day and time to appeare. The archbishop answering againe, said he heard him well inough, and vpon this sendeth vp to Rome in all hast to the pope, signifying to him by letters the whole matter, how and wherefore, and by whom he was cited. To whom the pope directed againe his letters of comfort (as he had done diuers before) the copie whereof here insueth.

Becket cited to Rome.

Pope Alexander to Thomas archbishop of Canturburie.

YOur brotherly letters, which you directed to vs, and such other matters which your messenger by word of mouth hath signified vnto vs, we haue diligently heard the reading thereof: and thereby fully vnderstand the grieuous vexations and dolorous griefes wherewith your mind is daily incombred: by reason whereof, we hearing and vnderstanding, are not a little disquieted in our spirit for your sake: in whose prosperities we do both gladly reioyce, and no lesse do sorrow in your aduersities as for our most deare brother. You therefore (as a constant and wise man) remember with your selfe that which is written: The apostles departed away (reioycing) from the face of the councell, &c. With like patience doe you also sustaine that mans molestations, and let not your spirit bee troubled therein more then needeth, but receiue in your selfe consolation: that we also together with you may be comforted in the Lord, who hath preserued you to the corroboration of his catholike and christian veritie, in this distresse of necessitie: and from whom also it hath pleased him to wipe away the blot of such things which haue been vnorderly of you committed, and heere to punish the same through sundrie afflictions: whereby (in the strict iudgement of God) they might not be called to account hereafter. But not this much grieue you: neither let your heart be so deiect or timorous in the matter (for that you are cited vp to the apostolike see) which to vs is both gratefull & accepted. And this we will you, that if they which haue cited you shall chance to come: draw not you backe, but follow the appeale (if you please) and spare not (al doubt and delay set apart) for the authoritie of the church tending this your constancy, may not doe that which may put you either in feare, or doubt. But our diligence shall be with all labour & studie, to conserue the right and preheminence (God willing) of that church committed to you, so much as in vs lieth (hauing our iustice and equitie) as to one whom in working for the church, we find to be both a constant and a valiant champion. Further, this I brotherly require you, to repaire vnto the church of Canturburie: and retaining but a few clerks about you (such onlie as serue your necessitie) make no excurses out (as little as you can) in that countrie. But in this especially I thought to premonish you (that in no case) neither for feare or any aduersitie, whatsoeuer may happen, you be brought to renounce and giue vp the right and dignitie of your church. Written at Senise the seuenth before the kalends of November.

As the archbishop was thus cited vp to Rome, sitting with his crosse waiting in the court, neither giuing place to the kings request, nor abashed with the clamor of the whole court against him, calling him traitor on euery side, neither following the abuertisement of his fellow bishops, at length the king by certaine earles and barons sent commandement to him, (Robert earle of Leicester doing the message) that he should without delay come & render a full account of all things that he had received, as the profits and reuenues of the realme, in the time he was chancellor, especially for the 2000. marks, for the which he was accountable to the king. To whom the archbishop answereth again; the king knew holo of the had made his reckoning of those things which now were required of him. Further and besides, Henrie his sonne & heire of his realme, with all his barons, and also Richard Lucie chiefe iustice of England told him, that he was free and quit to God & holy church from all receits and computations, and from all feeiar eractions on the kings behalfe. And so hee taking thus his discharge at their hands, entred into his office, & therefore other account besides this he would make none. When this word was brought to the king, he required his barons to do the law upon him, who so doing, iudged him to be apprehended & laid in prison. This done, the king sendeth to him Reginald earle of Cornewall and Dertonshire, and Robert earle of Leicester, to declare to him what was his iudgement. To whom the archbishop answereth: Heare, my sonne & good erle, what I say unto you: how much more pertious the soule is more then the body, so much more ought you to obay me in the Lord, rather then your terren king. Neither doth any law or reason permit the children to iudge or condemne their father. Therefore to auoid both the iudgement of the king, of you, & all others; I put my selfe onely to the arbitrement of the pope, under God alone to be iudged of him, and of no other, to whose presence here before you all I doe appeale, committing the ordering of the church of Canturburie, my dignitie, with all other things appertaining to the same, under the protection of God & him. And as for you my brethren and fellow bishops, which rather obay man then God, you also I call and cite to the audience and iudgement of the pope, and depart henceforth from you as from the enemies of the catholike church, & of the authoritie of the apostolike see.

Exi quadriparita hist. li. 1. cap. 18.

Becket apprehendeth the pope.

Becket thinketh it not sufficient the iudgement of God without the pope.

While the barons returned with this answer to the king, the archbishop passing through the throng, taketh unto him his pallerie, holding his crosse in one hand, and his bible in the other, the courtiers following after, and crying, Traitor, traitor, tarrie and heare thy iudgement. But he passed on till he came to the vttermost gate of the court, which being fast locked there had been staied, had not one of his seruants called Peter, surnamed Dunmaxio, finding there a bunch of keies hanging by, first prooued one keie, then another, till at last finding the true keie, had opened the gate, and let him out. The archbishop went straight to ỹ house of canons, where he did lie, calling vnto him the prior, where they could be found. When supper was done, making as though he would go to bed, which he caused to be made, whilst two altars, priuilie while the king was at supper, prepareth his iournie secretly to escape awaie; and changing his garment and his name, being called Dereman, first went to Lincolne, from thence to Sandwich, where he tooke ship, and sailed into Flanders, and from thence iourned into France, as Houedenus saith. Albert Alanus differing some thing in the order of his flight, saith that he departed not that night; but at supper time came to him the bishops of London & Chichester, declaring to him, that if he would surrender vp to the king his two manors of Otford & Wingham, there were hope to recouer the kings fauor, and to haue all remitted. But when the archbishop would not agree thereunto, for somuch as those manors were belonging to the church of Canturburie; the king hearing thereof, great displeasure was taken, insomuch that the next day Becket was faine to send to the king two bishops and his chaplaine for leaue to depart the realme. To the which message the king answered, that he would take pause thereof till the next day, and then he should haue an answer. But Becket not tarrying his answer, for fame day came word homefide straight secretly, as is aforesaid, to Ludouicus the French king. But before he came to the king, Gilbert the bishop of London, and William the earle of Arundell, sent from the king of England to France, preuented him: requiring the said French king in the behalfe of the king of England, that he would not receiue, nor retaine in his dominion the archbishop of Canturburie. Moreouer, that at his instance, he would be a meanes to the pope, not to shew any familiaritie vnto him. But the king of England in this point seemed to haue more confidence in the French king, then knowledge of his disposition. For thinking that the French king would haue been a good neighbour to him, in trusting him so much, he was deceiued. Neither considered he with himselfe enough the manner and nature of the Frenchmen at that time against the realme of England, who then were glad to seeke and take all maner of occasions to doe some act against England.

Ludouicus differ some thing in the order of his flight.

The French king supporteth Becket against the king of England.

And therefore Ludouike the French king, vnderstanding the matter, and thinking (perase thereby to haue some vantage against the king and realme of England by the occasion hereof, contrarie to the kings letters and request, not onely harboureth and cherisheth this Dereman, but also writing to the pope by his almoner & brother) intreateth him (vpon all loues as euer he would haue his fauour) to tender the cause of the archbishop Becket. Thus the kings ambassadors repulsed of the French king returned; at what time he sent another ambassage (vpon the like cause) to Alexander the pope then being at Seine in France. The ambassadors sent in this message, were Roger archbishop of Yorke, Gilbert bishop of London, Henry bishop of Winchester, Hilarie bishop of Chichester, Bartholmew bishop of Exceter, with other doctors and clerks: also William earle of Arundell, with certaine more lords and barons, who comming to the popes court, were friendly accepted of certaine of the cardinals: amongst the which cardinals rose also diuerse about the same cause. Some iudging the bishop of Canturburie in the defence of the liberties of the church (as in a good cause) to be maintained. Some thinking againg, that he (being a perturber of peace and vnitie) was rather to be bridled for his presumption, then to be suffered & incouraged therein. But the pope partly bearing with his cause (which onely tended to his exaltation and magnificence) partly againe inclined with the letters of the French king, and whole incline to Becket, as no maruel was. Wherfore the next day following, the pope sitting in consistorie with his cardinals, the ambassadors were called for, to the hearing of Beckets matter; and first begineth the bishop of London; next, the archbishop of Yorke; then Exceter; and the other bishops euery one in their order to speak. Whose oratiõs being not well accepted of the pope, and some of them also disdained; the earle of Arundell perceiuing that (and somewhat to qualifie and temper the matter to the popes eares) began after this maner.

The oration of the earle of Arundell to the pope.

Although to me it is vnknowne (saith he) which am both vnlettered and ignorant, what is that these bishops here haue said, neither am I in that tongue so able to expresse my mind as they haue done: yet being sent and charged thereunto of my prince, neither can nor ought I but to declare (as well as I may) what the cause is of our sending hither: not (truly) to contend or striue with any person, nor to offer any iniurie or harme vnto any man (especially in this place) and in the presence here of such an one, vnto whose beck and authoritie all the world doth stoope and yeeld. But for this time is our legacie hither directed, to present here before you and in the presence of the whole church of Rome, the deuotion and loue of our king and master, which euer he hath had, and yet hath still toward you. And that the same might the better appeare to your excellencie, he hath assigned and appointed to the furniture of this legacie, not the least, but the greatest: not the worst, but the best and chiefest of al his subiects: both archbishops, bishops, earles, barons, with other potentates more, of such worthinesse and parentage, that if he could haue found greater in all his realme, he would haue sent them, both for the reuerence of your person, and of the holy church of Rome. Ouer and besides this, I might adde to more (which your sanctitude hath sufficientlie tried and prooued alreadie) the true and heartie fidelitie of this our king and soueraigne toward you, who (in his first entrance to his kingdome) wholly submitted himselfe with all that is his besides, to your will and pleasure. And truely, to testifie of his maiestie he hath disposed to the vnitie of the catholike faith: we beleeue there is none more faithfull in Christ then he, nor more deuout to God, nor yet more moderat in keeping the vnitie of peace where vnto he is called. And as I may be bold this to protest for our king and master, so neither doe I denie the archbishop of Canturburie to be a man destitute or vnfinished with gifts and ornaments of learning and calling, but to haue a meet both sage and discreet in such things as to him appertaine, saue only that he seemeth to some more quicke & sharpe then needeth. This blot alone if it were not, and that the breach betweene our king and him had not so hapned, both the regiments together (of the temporaltie and spiritualtie) might quietly haue flourished one with the other in much peace and concord, both vnder a prince so worthie, and a pastor so vertuous. Wherefore (the case so standing as it doth) our message hither, and our supplication to your vigilant prudence is, that (through your fauour and wisdome) the necke of this dissension may be broken, and that reformation of vnitie and loue (by some good meanes) may be sought.

Becketes argument: The pope brought him not in but the kings. Nay, God brought him not in.

And why might he not (ỹ Becket) refuse it as well to his hands of whom he took it?

¶ This oration of his, although it was liked of them for the softnesse and moderation thereof, yet it could not so perswade the Romish bishop to condescend to their sute & request: which sute was, to haue two legats or arbitrers to be sent from his popish see into England, to examine & take vp the controuersie betweene the king and the archbishop. But the pope (in consist (as is said before) would not grant to their petition, for somuch as it should be (saith he) preiudiciall and tending to the oppression of the archbishop to grant vnto it, he being not present. And therefore he willed them to tarie his comming vp, or therwise (he being absent) he would not (he said in any case) proceed against him. But they (alleaging against their time to be spent, appointed vnto them of the king, hauing besides other lets and causes as they alleaged) said that they could not there wait for the comming of Becket, but returned backe (their cause frustrated) without the popes blessing to the king. Within foure daies after Becket commeth to the popes court, where he prostrating himselfe at his feet, brought out of his bosome a scroll containing the customs & ordinances of the king, before mentioned. The pope receiuing the foresaid scroll, and reading it in the open hearing of his cardinals, condemned and accursed the most part of the said decrees of the king, which he called Consuetudines auitas, that is, his grandfathers ordinances. Besides this, the pope moreouer blameth Becket, for that he so much pedled to them at the beginning, as he did; yet notwithstanding the cause he was repentant for his vnaduised fact) he was content to absolue him for the same, and the rather because of his great troubles, which he for the liberties of holie church did sustaine, and so with great fauour for that day dismissed him.

The pope wrongfully Becket cause against the king.

Becket complaineth of the king to the pope.

Repentance for his well doing.

The next day (Alexander the pope assembling his cardinals together in his secret chaber) appeareth before them archbishop Becket, hauing this oration to the pope & his popelings, which here I thought to set out in our vulgar English tongue (translated out of Latine) to the intent that the posteritie hereafter may vnderstand, either the vaine superstition or vile flaunerie of the churchmen in those daies: this, being not content with their owne natural king giuen them of God, must seeke further to the pope: thinking no ecclesiasticall liuing to be giuen, which is not taken at his hands. The words of his oration be these as followeth.

The oration of Becket resigning his bishoprike to the pope.

FAthers and lords, I ought not to lie in any place, much lesse before God, and in your presence here. Wherfore with much sighing and sorow of heart I grant and confesse, that these perturbations of the church of England be raised through my miserable fault. For I entred into the fold of Christ, but not by the doore of Christ, for that, not the canonicall election did call me lawfullie thereunto, but terrour of publike power droue me in. And albeit I against my will tooke this burden vpon me, yet not the will of God, but mans pleasure placed me in the roome. And therefore no maruell though all things haue gone contrarie and backward with me. And as for the resigning vp againe thereof, if I had so done, and giuen vp to their hands the priuiledge of my bishoplie authoritie, which I had granted to me at the commandement of the king (so as my fellow bishops did instantly call vpon me to do) then had I left a pernicious and dangerous example to the whole catholike church. By reason whereof I thought to defer that vnto your presence. And now therefore (recognising with my selfe my ingresse not to be canonicall, and therfore fearing it to haue the worse end; and againe pondering my strength and abilitie not to be sufficient for such a charge) left I should be found to sustaine that roome to the ruine of the flocke, to whom I was appointed a pastor vnworthie: I render vp to your fatherly hands the archbishoprike heere of Canturburie, &c. ¶ And so putting off his ring from his finger, and offering it to the pope, desired a bishop for the church of Canturburie to be prouided: seeing he thought not himselfe meet to fulfill the same, and so (with teares, as the storie saith) ended his oration.

A consultation betweene the pope and the cardinals about Beckets matter.

This done, the archbishop was bid to stand apart. The pope conferring vpon this with his cardinals, about the resignation of Becket what was best to be done: some thought it best to take the occasion offered, thinking thereby the kings wrath might easilie be allaged. If the church of Canturburie were assigned to some other person, and yet the said Becket otherwise to be prouided for: notwithstanding. Contrarie, others againe thought otherwise, whose reason was: The (which for the liberties of the church had ventured not onely his goods, dignitie and authoritie, but also his life) should now at the kings pleasure be deprined: like as it might be a president hereafter to others in resisting their king in like case, if this cause were maintained; so contrariwise if it quailed, it should be an example to all others hereafter, none to resist his prince in the like case. And so might it redound not onely to the weakening of the state of the catholike church, but also to the derogation of the popes authoritie. Briefly, this sentence at length preuailed: and so Becket receiueth his pastorall office of the popes hand againe, with commendation and much fauour. But for so much as he could not be well placed in England; in the meane while, the pope sendeth him (with a monkes habit) vnto the abbey of Pontinake in France, where he remained two yeares; from thence he remoued to Senon, where he abode fiue yeares. So the time of his exile continued a seuen yeares in all, &c.

Becket in banishment seuen yeares.

Vpon this, the king being certified by his ambassadours of the popes answere, how his fauour inclined more to Becket then to him, was moued (and worthily) with wrathfull displeasure. Who vpon the same sailing from England vnto Normandie directed ouer certaine iniunctions against the pope and the archbishop of Canturburie, as were reuiled afore. The contents whereof were declared to be these.

If any person should be found to bring from the pope, or from the archbishop of Canturburie, &c.

Of these and such other iniunctions Becket specifieth partly in a certaine letter, writing to a friend of his in this maner.

The kings decrees.

THomas archbishop of Canturburie, to his well beloued friend, &c. be it knowne to your brotherly goodnesse, that we with all ours heere (by Gods grace) are safe and in good health. Hauing a good hope and trust to your faithfull amicie, I charge you and require you, that either by the bringer hereof, or by some other (whom ye know faithfull and trustie to our church of Canturburie, and to vs) you write with all speed what is done. As touching the kings decrees here set out, these they be: That all hauens and ports should be diligently kept: that no letters of the popes interdict or curse be brought in. And if religious men bring them in, they shal haue their feet cut off: if hee be a priest or clerke, he shall lose his priuie members: if he be a lay-man, let him be hanged: if he be a leper, let him be burned. And if any bishop, for feare of the popes interdict, wil depart, besides his staffe only in his hand, let him haue nothing else. Also the kings will is, that all scholars and students beyond the seas shall repaire home, or else lose their benefices. And if they yet shall remaine still, they shall lose the libertie of all returning. Further, if any such priests shall be found, that for the popes suspence or interdict will refuse to sing, they shall lose their priuie members. In summe, all such priests as shew themselues rebels to the king, let them be depriued of their benefices, &c.

Besides these and such like iniunctions, it was also set forth by the kings proclamation, An. 1166, that all manner of persons, both men and women, whosoeuer were found of the kindred of Thomas Becket, should be exiled, without taking any part of their goods with them, and sent to him where he was: which was no little vexation to Becket to behold them. Persecuted, for so much as he then was lying with Gwarine abbat of Pontiniake, to whom the pope, as is aforesaid, had committed him, therefore the king writing to the same abbat, required him not to retaine the archbishop of Canturburie in his house: for if he did, he would driue out of his realme all the monkes of his order. Whereupon Becket was inforced to remoue from thence, and went to Lewis the French king, by whom he was placed at Senon, and there found of him the space of fiue yeers, as is aboue mentioned.

Becketts kindred banished.

These monkes were of the Cistertian order.

In the meane time, messengers went daily with letters betweene the king and the pope, betweene the pope again and him, and so betweene the archbishop and others. Whereof if the reader (peraduenture) shall be delirous to see the copies: I thought here to expresse certaine of them, to satisfie his desire: first beginning with the epistle of Becket, complaining of his prince to the pope, in maner and forme as followeth.

Becket complaineth of his prince to the pope.

The copie of an epistle sent of Thomas Becket to pope Alexander.

TO your presence and audience I flie, most holy father, that you, who hath brought the libertie of the church with your so great danger, might the rather attend to the same (either being the only or chiefest cause of my persecution) vsing and following therein the example of you. It grieueth me that the state of the church should fall to any decay, and that the liberties thereof should be infringed through the auarice of princes. For the which cause I thought to resist betime that inconuenience beginning so to grow. And the more I thought my selfe obliged to the same my prince (vnto whom next vnder God I am most chieflie bound) the more boldnesse I tooke to me, to withstand his vnrighteous attempts; till such as were on the contrarie part, my aduersaries, preuailed, working my disquietnesse, and incensig him against me. Whereupon, as the manner is amongst princes, they raised vp against me citations and slanders, to the occasion of my persecution: but I had rather to be proscribed, then to subscribe. Besides this, I was also called to iudgement, and cited before the king to make answere there as a lay person, to secular accounts: whereas they vnto whom I most trusted did most forsake me. For I saw my fellow brethren the bishops, through the instigation of some, readie to my condemnation. Whereupon all being set against me, and I thus oppressed on euerie side, tooke my refuge to appeale vnto your goodnesse, which casteth off none in their extremities: being readie to make my declaration before you, that I ought neither to be iudged there in that place, nor yet of them. For what were that (father) but to vsurpe to themselues your right, and to bring the spiritualtie vnder the temporaltie? Which thing (once begun) may breed an example to many. And therefore so much the more I thought to bee in withstanding this matter, how much more prone and procliue I saw the way to hurt, if they might once see vs to bee faint and weake in the same. But they will saie to mee heere againe: Giue to Cæsar that which belongeth to Cæsar, &c. But to answere againe thereunto, albeit we are bound to obey our king in most things, yet not in such manner of things, whereby he is made to be no king: neither were they such things belonging to Cæsar, but to a tyrant. Concerning the which points, these bishops should, not for me onelie, but for themselues, haue resisted the king. For if the extreme iudgement be referred to him which is able to iudge both bodie and soule: is it not then extreme pride for men there to iudge, or to iudge but by themselues? If the cause of the bishops and of the clergie, which I maintaine, be right: why be they set against me? why do they reprehend me? For if that I appealed to him, before whom either it was not lawfull, or els not expedient for me to do: what seeme they by this, but either to blame me causelesse, or else to distrust your equitie? For me to be conuicted before your holinesse, it had been a double confusion. Or wherein haue I deserued to be persecuted of them, for whose cause I haue set my selfe to stand in their behalfe? And if they had willed, I had preuailed, but it is ill with the head, when he is left of his members and forsaken: as if the eies should take the tongue to speake against the head. If they had had eyes to haue foreseene the matter, they might vnderstand themselues to speake their owne destruction: and that the princes did vse their help but to their owne seruitude. And what so great cause of hatred had they against me, to procure their owne vndoing, in vndoing of me? So while they neglected spiritual things in stead of temporall, they haue lost them both. What should I speake more of this, that I repugning them and appealing to your audience (yet notwithstanding they durst presume to stand in iudgement and condemnation against me, as children against their father? Yea, and not against me only, but against the vniuersall church of God (conspiring together with the prince) being with me offended. And this suspection might also as well pertaine to you holy father. But to this they will say, that they owe their dutie and seruice vnto the king, as their lord: to whom they are bound, vpon their allegeance. To whom I answere, that to him they stand bound bodily, to me spiritually. But to whom ought they rather to stand bound, then to themselues? And were it not better to sustaine the losse of corporall, then of spirituall things? But heere they will say againe: At this time the prince was not tobe prouoked. How subtillie doe these men dispute for their owne bondage? Yea, they themselues prouoke him by their owne excesse, ministring wings vnto him to fight against them; for he would haue rested if they had resisted. And when is constancie more to be required, then in persecution? Be not a mans chiefe friends most tried in persecution? if they giue ouer still, how shall they obtain the victorie? Sometimes they must needs resist. Condescend therefore (holy father) to my exile and persecution. And remember, that I also once was a great man, in the time when it was, and now for your sake thus iniuriously I am intreated. Vse your rigour and restraine them, by whose instigation the name of this persecution began. And let none of these things be imputed to the king, who rather is to be counted the repairer then the author of this businesse.

Ye meane by spirituall things, such as pertaine to the spirituall part of man, & grees: but your liberties be not such as which pertaine to the humane or spirituall man, but rather are things into e conspirall. Persecution teeth a true friend. but euer it cause maketh not a true persecution.

Besides this epistle sent vnto the pope, hee writeth also another letter, sent to the king in Latine: the tenour whereof hee that is disposed to reade, may peruse in our former edition, with the notes adioyned withall.

Besides which epistle to the king in Latine, he sent also one or two more to the said king Henrie the second, much after the like rate and sort: the one thus beginning: Loquis de Deo, liberamentis est & valde quiete. Inde est quod loquar ad dominum meum, & vtinam ad omnes pacificum, &c. Which epistle, for that I would not ouercharge the volume of these histories with too much matter superfluous, I thought heere to omit. Whether he sent afterwards, whereof the woords be these.

Another letter of Becket archbishop of Canturburie sent to the king.

TO his lord and friend Henrie by the grace of God, king of England, duke of Normandie and Aquitane, earle of Anion: Thomas by the same grace, humble minister of the church of Canturburie (sometime his temporally, but now more his in the Lord) health and true repentance with amendment. I haue long looked for, that the Lord would looke vpon you, and that you would conuert and repent, departing from your peruerse way: and cut off from you your wicked and peruerse counsellours, by whose instinction, as it is thought, you are fallen into that deepe, whereof the Psalme speaketh, A sinner when he cõmeth to the depth of mischiefes, is without care or feare. And albeit we haue hitherto quietlie suffered and borne; considering and earnestlie looking if there would anie messenger come that would say: Your soueraigne lord the king, which now a long time hath erred and been deceiued, and led euen to the destruction of the church, through Gods mercie with abundant humilitie doth now againe make speed for the deliuerance of the church, and to make satisfaction and amendment: Yet notwithstanding, we cease not, day by day continually to call vpon almightie God, with most humble deuotion: that that which we haue long desired for you and by you, we may speedily obtaine with abundant effect. And this is one point: that the care of the church of Canturburie, whereunto God hath presently appointed vs (albeit vnworthie) you being king, doth specially constraine me (in that as yet we are detained in exile) to write vnto your maiestie letters commonitorie, exhortatorie, and of correction. But I would to God they were fully able to correct, lest that I be too great a cloker of your outrages (if there be anie) as indeed there are: for the which we are not a little sorie. I meane specially of them which are done by you in euery place, about the church of God and the ecclesiasticall persons, without any reuerence either of dignitie or person; and left also that I appeare negligent to the great danger of my soule for without doubt he beareth the offence of him which doth commit anie offence, who neglecteth to correct that, which another ought to amend. For it is written, Not onely they which doe commit euill, but also they which consent thereunto are counted partakers of the same. For they verily do consent, which when they both might and ought, do not resist, or at the least reproue. For the errour which is not resisted is allowed, and the truth when it is not defended is oppressed: neither doth it lacke a priuie note of societie in him, which ceaseth to withstand a manifest mischiefe. (2) For like as, most noble prince, a small citie doth not minish the prerogatiue of so mightie a kingdome as yours is: so your royall power ought not to oppresse or change the measure of the religious dispensation. For it is prouided alwaies by the lawes, that all iudgements against priests should proceed by the determination of priests. For whatsoeuer bishops they are, albeit that they doe erre as other men doe (not exceeding in any point contrarie to the religion of faith) they (3) ought not, nor can in any case be iudged of the secular power. Truely, it is the part of a good and religious prince to repare the ruinous churches, to build new, to honor the priests, and with great reuerence to defend them, after the example of the godly prince of most happie memorie (4) Constantinus, which said, when a complaint of the clergie was brought to him: You (said he) can be iudged by no secular iudge, which are reserued to the only iudgement of God. And for so much as we do reade that the holy apostles and their soccessours, appointed by the testimonie of God, commanded that no persecution nor troubles ought to be made, nor to enuie those which labour in the field of the Lord: and that the stewards of the eternall king should not be expelled and put out of their seats: who then doubteth, but that the priests of Christ ought to be called the fathers and masters of all other faithfull princes? Is it not a miserable madnesse then, if the sonne should go about to bring the (5) father vnder obedience? or the scholar his master? and by (6) wicked bonds to bring him in subiection, by whom hee ought to beleeue that hee may bee bound and loosed, not onely in earth, but also in heauen? If you bee a good and a catholike king, and will be such a one as we hope, or that we rather desire you should be, (if it be spoken vnder your licence) you are the child of the church, and not the ruler of the church. You ought to learne of the priests, and not to teach them: you ought to (7) follow the priests in ecclesiasticall matters, and not to goe before them, hauing the priuiledge of your power giuen you of God to make publike lawes: that by his benefit you should not be vnthankfull against the dispensation of the heauenly order, and that you should vsurpe nothing, but vse them with a wholesome disposition.

Wherefore, in those things which contrarie vnto that, you haue, through your malicious counsell, rather then by your owne minde, wickedly vsurped; with all humilitie and satisfaction speedily giue place, that the hand of the most high be not stretched out against you, as an arrow against the marke. For the most high hath bended his bow openly to shoote against him, that will not confesse his offences. Be not ashamed (whatsoeuer wicked men say vnto you, or that traytours doe whisper in your eare) to humble your selfe vnder the mightie hand of God. For it is he which exalteth the humble, and throweth downe the proud, which also reuengeth himselfe vpon princes: he is terrible, and who shall resist him? You ought not to haue let slip out of your memorie, in what state God did find you: how he hath preferred, honoured, and exalted you: blessed you with children, inlarged your kindome, and established the same in despite of your enemies. In so much that hitherto, in a manner, all men haue said with great admiration, that this is he whom God hath chosen. And how will you reward, or can you reward him for all these things which he hath done vnto you? Will you, at the prouocation and instance of those which are about you, that (8) persecute the church and the ecclesiasticall ministers, and alwaies haue according to their power persecuted them, rendring euill for good, bringing oppressions, tribulations, iniuries, and afflictions vpon the church and churchmen, do the like? Are not these they of whom the Lord speaketh: He that heareth you heareth me, he that despiseth you despiseth me, and he that toucheth you toucheth the apple of mine eye? Verily forsaking all that thou hast, take vp thy crosse, that thou maiest follow thy God our Lord Iesus Christ. Yet will it scarcely be, or not at all, that thou shalt appeare a thankefull recompencer of the benefits receiued at his hand. Search the scriptures of such as are learned, and you shall vnderstand: that (9) Saul, albeit he was the elect of the Lord, perished with his whole house, because he departed from the waies of the Lord.

Ozias also king of Iuda, whose name is spoken of and spread ouer all, through the manifold victories giuen him of God, his heart was so puffed vp to his destruction, because the Lord did helpe and strengthen him in euery place, that the contemning the feare and reuerence of the Lord, would vsurpe vnto himselfe that which was not his office, that is to say, the priesthood, and to offer incense vpon the altar of the Lord, for the which he was stricken with a leprosie, and cast out of the house of the Lord. Many other kings and holy men of great substance, because they haue walked aboue their estate in the maners of the world, presuming to rebell against God in his ministeries, haue perished: and at the last, they haue found nothing of their substance in their power. Also king Achaz, because he did vsurpe the office of priesthood, was likewise stricken with a leprosie by God.

Oza also, albeit he was not king, yet for so much as he touched the arke and held it, when it would haue fallen by the vnrulinesse of the oxen, which thing pertained not vnto him, but vnto the ministers of the church, hee was stricken by the wrath wrath of God and fell downe by the arke. O king, it is a famous prouerbe: that A man forewarned by another mans misfortune, will take the better heed vnto himselfe. For euery man hath his owne businesse in hand, when his neighbours house is on fire.

Dearelie beloued king, God would haue the disposing of those things which pertaine vnto the church, to belong onlie vnto the priests, and not vnto the secular power. Do not challenge vnto thy selfe therefore another mans right: neither striue against him, by whom all things are ordained, lest thou seeme to striue against his benefits, of whom thou hast receiued thy power. For by the common (10) lawes, and not by the secular power, and by the bishops and priests, almightie God would haue the clergie of the christian religion to be ordered and ruled. And christian kings ought to submit all their doings vnto ecclesiasticall rulers, and not to prefer themselues: for it is written, that none ought to iudge the bishops but only the church, neither doth it pertaine vnto mans law to giue sentence vpon any such. Christian princes are accustomed to be obedient vnto the statutes and ordinances of the church, and not to preferre their owne power. A prince ought to submit himselfe vnto the bishops, and not to iudge the bishops: for there are two things whereby the world is chiefly gouerned (that is to say) the sacred authoritie of bishops and roiall power. (11) In the which, the bishops charge is so much the more weightie, in that they shall at the latter iudgement render account euen of the kings themselues. Truely you ought to vnderstand, that you depend vpon their iudgement, and cannot reduce them vnto your owne will: for many bishops haue excommunicated both kings and emperours. And if you require an especiall example thereof, Innocentius the pope did excommunicate Arcadius the emperour, because he did consent that Iohn Chrysostom should be expulsed from his seat: and Saint Ambrose also did excommunicat (12) Theodosius the great emperour for a fault (which seemed not so weightie vnto other priests) and shut him out of the church: who afterwards by condigne satisfaction was absolued.

There are manie other like examples. For Dauid when he had committed adulterie and murther, the prophet Nathan was sent vnto him by God to reproue him, and he was soone corrected. And the king (laying aside his scepter and diadem, and setting apart all princelie maiestie) was not ashamed to humble himselfe before the face of the prophet, to confesse his fault, and to require forgiuenesse for his offence. What will you more? He being stricken with repentance asked mercie, and obtained forgiuenesse. So likewise you (most beloued king and reuerend lord) after the example of this good king Dauid, of whom it is said, I haue found a man after mine owne heart; with a contrite and humble heart turne to the Lord your God, and take hold of repentance for your transgressions. For you are fallen and erred in manie things, which yet I keepe in store still, if (peraduenture) God shall inspire you to say with the prophet: Haue mercie on me ô God, according to thy great mercie, for I haue sinned much against thee, and done ill in thy sight. Thus much I haue thought good to write to you my deare lord at this present, passing other things in silence, til I may see whether my words take place in you, and bring forth fruits worthie of repentance: and that I may heare & reioyce with them that shal bring me word and say: O king, thy son was dead, and is aliue againe, was lost and is found againe. But if you will not heare me, looke where I was wont before the maiestie of the bodie of Christ to pray for you in abundance of teares and sighes: there in the same place I will crie against you, and say: Rise vp Lord and iudge my cause, forget not the rebukes and iniuries which the king of England doth to thee and thine: forget not the ignominie of thy church, which thou hast builded in thy blood. Reuenge the blood of thy saints which is spilt: reuenge, ô Lord, the afflictions of thy seruants, of whom there is an infinit number. For the pride of them which hate and persecute thee is gone vp so high, that we are not able to beare them any longer. Whatsoeuer your seruants shall do, all those things shall be required at your hands: for he seemeth to haue done the harme, which hath giuen the cause thereof. Doubtlesse, the Sonne of the most high, except you amend and cease from the oppressing of the church and clergie, and keepe your hand from troubling of them, will come in the rod of his furie, at the voices of such as crie to him, and at the sighes of them that be in bands: when the time shall seeme for him to iudge the vnrighteousnesse of men in equitie and seueritie of the holy Ghost. For he knoweth how to take awaie the breath of princes, and is terrible among kings of the earth. Your deare and louing grace I wish well to fare. Thus fare ye well againe and euer.

* Note the fury & zeale of God against this Becket, who thus stirreth at his master reproouing the bodie of Christ.

Certaine notes or clenchs vpon this epistle: which by the figures you may find out, and their places.

1 The scope of this epistle is this, to proue that bishops and priests ought not to come vnder the court and controlement of temporall power.

2 This similitude holdeth not. For though the smalnesse of a citie blemisheth not the prerogatiue of a kingdome, yet the enilnesse and rebellion of a citie doth worthily blemish his owne prerogatiue.

3 So saith the popes decree. Dist. 10: but the scripture of God imparteth otherwise. As that the priest was deposed of king Salomon, not for any heresie, but for other causes: 3. Reg. 2. Jonathas take his priesthood of king Alexander: and Simon of Demetrius, 1. Mach. 7. Christ offered tribute to Cesar for him and for Peter. Also Peter saith, Be ye subiect to euery humane creature: and it followeth, whether it be to the king as to the chiefe, &c. Item pope Leo submitted himselfe to Ludouicus the emperour with these woords: And if we do any thing incompetently, and do swerue from the path of righteousnesse, we will stand to your reformation, or of them whom you shall send. Quest. 2. Ilos. 7.

4 Notwithstanding the said Constantinus writing to the bishops congregated at Tirus, first chydeth them, then commaundeth them to refer it vnto his presence, to haue their cause iudged and decided. Trip. hist. lib. 2. cap. 7.

5 The father vnder obedience, &c. If fatherhood go by age, I suppose that king Henrie was elder then Becket. If fatherhood consist in authoritie, I iudge the authoritie of a king, to be aboue the authoritie of an archbishop. If the see of Canturburie make the fatherhood, yet had Becket no cause to claime fatherhood ouer the king, seeing the same obtained the father (that is) seeing the king made him his archbishop, and not he made him his king.

6 By wicked bonds. All is wicked with the papists, that bringeth them in subiection to their princes.

7 Ecclesiasticall matters be such, as properly belong to doctrine and diuine knowledge, for the institution of the soule, and information of conference. In which both princes and subiects ought to follow their pastor, so long as they go truly before them without error, or else not. But what maketh this for the lands and liberties of churchmen?

8 Punishment due to malefactors and rebels is not to be called persecution, but due correction.

9 Saul brake the commandement of God and was reiected. Dthis contrarie to the commandement of God take the office of a priest, and was thrusten. Dza against the expresse word of the law put his hand to the arke, and was punished. But what expresse word had king Henrie, why he should not correct and punish rebellious bishops, and wicked priests within his owne realme: wherefore these similitudes accord not. As for Achas he was not so much punished for taking the parths office, as for spoiling the temple of the Lord, and offering to idols.

10 Common lawes. S. Augustine writing to Boniface, saith thus: Whatsoeuer obeieth not the lawes of the emperour, being made for the veritie of God, procureth to himselfe great punishment. For in the time of the prophets, all the kings which did not forbid and subuert all such things as were vsed of the people against the law of God, are rebuked. And such as did withstand them, are commended aboue the rest. August.

11 Iustinus hath these woords: Let temporal princes know that they must render account to God for the church, which they haue at the hands of God to gouerne, &c.

12 The case of Arcadius Theodosius. Dauid, and of this king, as touching this matter, hath no similitude. In them was murther: this king doth nothing but claime that which is his due. And though by the spirituall sword those kings were reiected: yet it agreeth not therefore that the persons of them which haue the vse of the spirituall sword, are aboue the persons of them which haue the temporall sword.

Besides these letters of the archbishop sent to the king, the pope also in the same cause writeth to the king, beginning after this sort: Alexander papa ad Henricum regem. Et naturali ratione, & formarum distante, prouidentium tum creditum est ecclesiam fuisse, quod quanto quis ab aliquo maiora suscepisse dignoscitur, tanto eidem deuotior & magis obligatus teneatur, &c. The whole tenour of the letter as he wrote it to the king I would here expresse, but for tracting of the time and straitnesse of roume, hauing so many things else in this storie (by the grace of Christ) to be comprehended. But the letter tendeth to this effect: to exhort and charge the king to shew fauour to Thomas Becket. Where, in the processe of the epistle, it followeth in these woords: Ea propter seueritatem tuam per apostolica scripta regimus, monemus, & exhortamur in Domino; vt non in remissionem peccatorum ex parte Dei omnipotentis, & beati Petri principis apostolorum auctoritate nostra innitentes, vt memoratum archiepiscopum pro Deo & ecclesia sua, & honore tuo, necnon & totius regni tui, in gratiam & fauorem tuum recipias, &c. That is: Therefore we do desire in mith, and exhort your highnes by these our apostolicall writings, and also in the name and boon the remission of your sinnes, in the behalfe of almightie God, and of S. Peter, prince of the apostles, by our authoritie, that you will receiue againe the foresaid archbishop into your fauour and grace, for the honour of God, his church, and of your owne realme, &c. Thus haue you heard the popes intreating letter. Now heere is another letter sent into the foresaid king, where in he doth menace him, as in the tenour thereof here followeth.

W. fl. Bishop

Bishop Alexander, seruant of the seruants of God, to king Henrie, king of England, health and bles*sing apostolicall.*

HOw fatherly and gently we haue oft times intreated and exhorted both by leagars and letters your princely honor, to be reconciled again with our reuerend brother Thomas archbishop of Canturbury, so that he and his may be restored againe to their churches and other possessions to them appertaining; your wisedome is not ignorant, seeing it is notified and spread almost throughout all christendome. For so much therfore, as hitherto we could not preuaile with you, neither moue nor stir your mind with faire and gentle words; it lamenteth vs not a little, so to be frustrat and deceiued of the hope and expectation which we had conceiued of you. Especiallie seeing we loue you so dearely, as our owne dearely beloued sonne in the Lord, and vnderstanding so great ieopardie to hang ouer you.

But for so much as it is written: Crie out and cease not, lift vp thy voice like a trumpe, and declare to my people their wickednesse, and their sinnes to the house of Iacob. Also for so much as it is in Salomon commanded, that the sluggish person should be stoned with the dung of oxen: we haue thought good therefore, not to forbeare or support your stubbornnesse anie longer against iustice and saluation. Neither that the mouth of the foresaid archbishop should be stopped from henceforth any more: but that he may freely prosecute the charge of his office and dittie, to reuenge with the sword of ecclesiastical discipline, the iniuries both of himselfe, and of his church committed to his charge.

And heere I haue sent vnto you two legats, Petrus de ponte Dei, and Bernardus de Corilio, to admonish you of the same. But if yee will neither by vs be aduertised, nor giue eare vnto them in obeying: it is to be feared (doubtlesse) lest such things as they shall declare to you from vs in our behalfe, may happen and fall vpon you. Dated at Beneuent, the ninth day before the kalends of June.

To answere the se letters againe, there was another certaine writing deuised out and deuoted to the pope, made by some of the clergie, as it seemeth: but not without consent of the king, as by the title may appeare, inueying and dispraising the inordinatiour of the archbishop. The tenour whereof here followeth, and beginneth thus.

An answere to the pope.

TIme now requireth more to seeke helpe then to make complaints. For so it is now, that the holy mother church (our sinnes deserning the same) lieth in a dangerous case of great decay, which is like to insue, except the present mercie of the Lord support her.

Such is the wicked nesse now of schismatikes, that the father of fathers pope Alexander (for the defence of his faith, and for the loue of righteousnesse) is banished out of his countrie: not able to keepe free residence in his owne proper see, by reason of the indurat heart of Frederike the Pharao.

Further and besides, the church also of Canturburie is miserable impaired and blemished, as well in the spirituall as in the temporall estate: much like to the ship in the sea, being destitute of her guide, tossed in the floods, and wrestling with the winds, while the pastor being absent from his prouince dare not here remaine through the power of the king. Who being euer wise (to the ieopardie of himselfe, his church, and vs also) hath brought x intangled vs likewise with himselfe in the same partaking of his punishments and labours, not considering how we ought to forbeare, and not to resist superiour powers. And also the wetherwil himselfe to vs vnkind, which with all our affections beare the burden with him of his afflictions, not ceasing yet to persecute vs which stand in the same condemnation with him. For be it with him and our soueraigne prince, the king of England, arose a certaine matter of contention, whereupon they were both agreed, that a day should be appointed, to haue the controuersie discussed by equitie and iustice.

The day being come, the king commanded all the archbishops, bishops, and other prelats of the church to be called in a great solemne frequence: so that the greater and more general this councell was, the more manifest the detection of this stubborne malice should appeare and be espied.

At the day therefore aboue mentioned, this troubler of the realme and of the church, presently himselfe in the sight of our catholike king: who not trusting the qualitie and condition of his cause, armeth him with the armor of the crosse, as one which should be brought to the presence of a tyrant. By reason wherof, the kings maiestie being somewhat aggrieued (yet because he would be deliuered from all suspition) committeth the matter to the hearing of the bishops. This done, it rested in the bishops to decide and cease this contention, and to set agreement betweene them, removing all occasion of dissension. Which thing they going about, commeth in this foresaid archbishop, forbidding and commanding, that no man proceed in any sentence of him before the king.

This being signified to the kings hearing, his mind was grieuously prouoked thereby to anger: whose anger yet notwithstanding had been easily allaged, if the other would haue submitted himselfe, and acknowledged his default. But he adding stubbornnesse to his trespasse, through the quantitie and greatnesse of his excesse, was the author of his owne punishment, which now by the lawe ciuill he sustaineth, and yet shaueth to craue pardon for: his desert at the kings hand: whose anger he feared not to stir vp, in such a troublesome time of the persecution of the church, greatly against the profit of the same; augmenting and increasing thereby the perdition which now the church lieth vnder. Much better it had bin for him to haue tempered himselfe with the bridle of moderation, in the highest estate of his dignity, lest in exceeding so far, in straining the strict points of things by ouermuch presumption, peraduenture through his presumption being not in meane and tolerable things, might fall from higher. And if the detriments of the church would not mone him: yet the great benefits and preferments of riches and honors ought to perswade him, not to be so stubborne against the king. But here peraduenture his friend and our aduersarie will obiect, that his bearing and submitting to the king in this behalfe, were preiudicial against the authoritie and see apostolicall. As though he did not or might not vnderstand, that although the dignitie of the church should suffer a little detriment in that iudgement: yet he might and ought to haue dissembled (for the time) to obtaine peace vnto the church. He will obiect againe, alleaging the name of father, that it soundeth like a point of arrogancie, for children to proceed in iudgement of condemnation against the father: which thing is not conuenient. But he must vnderstand againe, that it was necessary that the obedience and humility of the children should temper the pride of the father: lest afterward, the hatred of the father might redound vpon the children. Wherefore, of these premisses your fatherhood may vnderstand, that the action of this our aduersarie ought to fall votone. as void and of none effect, who only vpon the affection of malice hath proceeded thus against vs, hauing no iust cause nor reason to ground vpon.

And for so much as the care and charge of all churches (as ye know) lieth vpon vs, it standeth vs vpon, to prouide concerning the state of the church of Canturburie, by our diligence and circumspection: so that the said church of Canturburie, by the occasse of his pastor, be not driuen to ruine or decay.

¶ By this epistle it may appeare to the reader thereof, that Becket (being absent from England) inuent about to worke some trouble against certaine of the clergy and the laitie (belike) in excommunicating such as he toke to be his euill willers.

Now to vnderstand further what his working was, or who they were whom he did excommunicat, this letter, sent to William bishop of Norwich, shall better declare the matter.

A letter of Becket to the bishop of Norwich.

HE bindeth himselfe to the penaltie of the crime, whosoeuer receiuing power and authoritie of God, vseth and exerciseth not the same with due seueritie, in punishing vice: but winking and dissembling, doth minister boldnesse to wicked doers, maintaining them in their sinne. For the blood of the wicked is required at the hand of the priest, which is negligent or dissembleth. And as the Scripture saith, Thornes and brambles grow in the hands of the idle drunkard. Wherefore, lest (through our too much sufferance and dissembling) the transgressions of manifest euill doers should also be laid to our charge, and redound to the destruction of the church through our guiltie silence; we therefore following the authoritie of the popes commandement, haue laid our sentence of curse and excommunication vpon the earle Hugo: commanding you throughout all your diocesse publikelie to denounce the said earle as accursed, so that (according to the discipline of the church) he be sequestred from the fellowship of all faithfull people. Also, it is not vnknowne to your brotherhood, how long we haue borne with the transgressions of the bishop of London; who amongst other his facts, I would to God were not a great doer and fautour of this schisme, and subuerter of the rights and liberties of holie church. Wherefore we, being supported with the authoritie of the apostolike see, haue also excommunicated him, besides also the bishop of Salisburie, because of his disobedience and contempt: and others likewise, vpon diuers and sundrie causes, whosenames heere follow subscribed: Hugo Bernards sonne, Rodulph of Brock, Robert of Brock a clerke, Hugo de S. Cleare, and Leardus a clerke of Northfolke, Nigellus of Seacauill, and Richard Chapleine, William of Hasting, and the frier which possesseth my church of Monchot. Wee therefore charge and command you by the authoritie apostolicall and ours, and in the vertue of obedience, and in the perill of saluation; and of your order; that ye cause these openly to be proclamed excommunicat, throughout al your diocesse, and to command all the faithfull to auoid their companie. Fare ye well in the Lord. Let not your heart bee troubled, nor feare: for wee stand sure through the assistance of the apostolike see, God being our borow, against the pretensed shifts of the malignant sort, and against all their appellations. Furthermore, all such as haue been solemnelie cited of vs, shall sustaine the like sentence of excommunication, if God will, on the Ascension daie: vnlesse vnlesse they shall otherwise agree with him. That is, to wit: Geffrey archdeacon of Canturburie, and Robert his vicar, Rice of Wilcester, Richard of Lucie, William Gifford, Adam of Cherings, with such others more: which either at the commandement of the king, or vpon their owne proper temeritie, haue inuaded the goods and possessions either appertaining to vs, or to our clerkes about vs. With these also we do excommunicat all such as be knowne either with aid or counsell, to haue incensed or set forward the proceeding of our king against the liberties of the church, and exiling of the innocents. And such also as be knowne to impeach or let by any maner of way the messengers (sent either from the pope, or from vs) for the necessities of the church. Fare you well againe and euer.

Hitherto hath thou seene (gentle reader) diuers and sundrie letters of Thomas Becket, whereby thou maist collect a sufficient historie of his doings and demeanor, though nothing else were said further of him, concerning his iustie and haultie stomacke, aboue that which deserued either his degree or cause which he take in hand. And here peraduenture I may seeme in the eyzie of this one man to tarie too long, hauing to write of so many others better then it: yet for the weaker sort, which haue counted him, and yet do count him for a saint, hauing in themselues little vnderstanding to iudge or discerne in the causes of men, I thought to adde this letter mine, wherein he complaineth of his king to a forren power; doing what in him did lie, to stir vp his owne cause mortall war to the destruction of many. For suppose wrong had been offered him of his prince, was it not enough for him to flie? What cause had he for his owne priuat reuenge, to set potentats in publike discord? Now hauing no iust cause but rather offering iniurie in a false quarell, so to complaine of his prince: what is to be said of this, let euery man iudge which heth this letter.

An epistle of Thomas archbishop of Canturburie to the pope Alexander.

A Mentissimo patri & D. Alexandro, Dei gratia summo pont. Thomas Cant. ecclesiæ humilis minister, debitam & deuotam obedientiam, &c. In English thus.

To our most louing father and lord. Alexander by the grace of God bishop: Thomas the humble minister and seruant of the church of Canturburie due and reuerend obedience. Long enough and too long most louing father haue I forborne, still looking after the amendment of the king of England, but no fruit haue I reaped of this my long patience: may rather, whilest that vnwisely I do thus forbeare, I augment and procure the detriment and diminishing of mine authoritie, as also of the church of God. For oftentimes haue I by deuout and religious messengers inuited him to make condigne satisfaction, as also by my letters (the copies whereof I haue sent you) intimat and pronounced Gods feueritie and vengeance against him, vnlesse he repent and amend. But he (that notwithstanding) groweth from euill to worse, oppressing and conculcating the church and sanctuarie of God: persecuting both me and those which take part with me: in so much that with fearefull threatning words his purpose is to terrifie such, as (for Gods cause and mine owne) seeke any way to relieue and helpe me. He wrote also the letters vnto the abbat of the Cistercian order, that as he fauored the abbasie of that his order (which was in his power said he) he would not accept me into the fellowship thereof, nor do any thing else for me. What should I vse many words? So much hath the rigor and feueritie as well of the king as of his officers, vnder our patience and sufferance shewed it selfe: that if a great number of men, yea and that of the most religious sort, should shew vnto you the matter as it is in deed (and that vpon their oth taken) I partly doubt whether your holines would giue credit vnto them or not. With heauinesse of mind therfore I considering these things, and beholding as well the perill of the king as of our selfe, haue publikely condemned not onlie those pernicious customes: but all those peruersities and wicked doings whereby the church of England is disturbed and brought to confusion: as also the writing whereby they were confirmed: excommunicating generallie as well the obseruers and exactors thereof, as also the inuentors and patrons of the same, with their fauourers, counsellours, and coadiutors whatsoeuer, either of the clergie or laitie: absoluing also our bishops from their oth, whereby they were so strictly inioyned to the obseruation of the same. These are the articles which in that writing I haue principally condemned. First, that it is inhibited to appeale vnto the see apostolicall, for any cause but by the kings licence. That a bishop may not punish any man for periurie, or for breaking of his troth. That a bishop may not excommunicate any man that holdeth of the king In capite, or else to interdict either their lands or offices without the kings licence. That clerkes and religious men may be taken from vs to secular iudgement. That the king or any other iudge may heare and decide the causes of the church and tithes. That it shall not be lawfull for any archbishop or bishop to go out of the realme, and to come at the popes call without the kings licence: and diuers others such as these. Namely also I haue excommunicated Iohn of Oxenford, who hath communicated with the schismatike and excommunicat person (Reginald Colonien sis) the which also contrarie to the commandement of the lord pope and ours, hath vsurped the deanrie of the church of Salisburie: and hath (to renew his schisme) taken an oth in the emperours court. Also I haue denounced and excommunicated Richard of Worcester, because he is fallen into the same damnable heresie, and communicated with that famous schismatike of Cullenden-using and forging all mischiefe possible, with the schismatikes and Flemings to the destruction of the church of God, and especiallie of the church of Rome, by composition made by the king of England and them. Also Richard de Lucie, and Ioceline de Baliol, which haue furthered the fauourers of the kings tyrannie and workers of their heresies. Also Randulph de Broc, and Hugo de Sancto Claro, and Thomas the sonne of Bernard, which haue vsurped the possessions and goods of the church of Canturburie without our licence and consent. We haue also excommunicated all those, which without our licence do stretch out their hands to the possessions and goods of the church of Canturburie. The king himselfe we haue not yet excommunicated perssonally, (till waiting for his amendment: whom (notwithstanding) we will not defer to excommunicat, vnlesse hee quickely amend and be warned by that he hath done. And therfore that the authoritie of the see apostolike, and the libertie of the church of God, which in these parts are almost vtterly lost, may be by some meanes restored; it is meet and verie necessarie that what wee haue herein done, the same be of your holinesse ratified, and by your letters confirmed. Thus I wish your holinesse long to prosper and flourish.

By this epistle he that listeth to vnderstand of the doings and quarels of Becket, may partly iudge what is to be thought thereof. Which his doings although in some part may be imputed either to ignorance of mind, or blindnesse of zeale, or humane fragilitie: yet in this point, so direly to complaine of his naturall prince, for the zeale of the pope, he can by no wise be defended. But such was the blindnesse then of the prelats in those daies, who measured and esteemed the dignitie and liberties of Christs church by no other thing, then only by goods and possessions flowing and abounding in the clergie: and thought no greater point of religion to be in the church then to maintaine the same. For the which cause they did most abominable abuse christian discipline and excommunication of the church at that time: as by this foresaid epistle may appeare. And what marueil if the acts and doings of this archbishop seeme now to vs in these daies both fond and strange: seeing the suffragans of his owne church and clergie writing to him, could not but reprehend him, as in this their epistle translated out of Latine into English may be seene.

Becket reprehended for complaining of his king.

Excommunication abused in priuat reuenge about lands and possessions.

An effectuall and pithie letter, full of reason and perswasion, sent from all the suffragans of the church of Canturburie to Thomas Becket their archbishop.

Qua vestro (pater) in longinquo discessu inopinata rei ipsius nouitate turbata sunt: vestra super adsumus humilitate, &c.
In English thus.

Such troubles and perturbations as happened through the strangenesse of your departure out of the realme, wee hoped by your humilitie and prudence should haue been reduced againe (Gods grace working withall) into a peaceable tranquillitie. And it was no little ioy to vs, to heare so of you in those parts where you are conuersant, how humblie you there behaued your selfe, nothing vanting your selfe against your prince and king, and to attempt no rimes or wrestlings against his kingdome, but that you bare with much patience the burthen of pouertie, and gaue your selfe to reading and prayer, and to redeeme the losse of your time spent, with fasting, watchings, and teares: and so being occupied with spirituall studies, to rend and rise vp to the perfection of vertue, &c. But now through the secret relation of certaine, wee heare (that wee are sorie of) that you haue sent vnto him a threatning letter, wherein there is no salutatiō premised. In the which also ye pretend no intreating nor prayers for the obtaining of fauour, neither do vse any friendly manner in declaring what you write, but manacing with much austeritie, threaten to interdict him, and to cut him from the societie of the church. Which thing if you shall accomplish with like seueritie as in words ye threaten to do, you shall not only put vs out of all hope of any peace, but also put vs in feare of hatred and discord without measure, and without all redresse amongst vs. But wisedome will consider before the end of things, labouring and indeuouring to finish that which shee wiselie beginneth. Therfore your discretion shall do well, diligently to forecast and consider whereto yee tend, what end may insue thereof, and whereabout ye go. Certes we (for our parts) hearing that we doe heare, are discouraged from that we hoped for, which before hauing some good comfort of tranquillitie to come, are cast from hope to despaire: so that while one is drawen thus against another, almost there is no hope nor place left to make intreaty or supplication. Wherfore writing to your fatherhood, we exhort and counsell you by way of charity, that you adde not trouble to trouble, and heape iniurie vpon iniurie: but so to behaue your selfe, that all menacies set aside, yee rather giue your selfe to patience and humilitie, and to yeeld your cause to the clemencie of God, and to the mercie of your prince: which in so doing you shall heape coles of charitie vpon the heads of many. Thus charitie shall be kindled, and that which menacings cannot do (by Gods helpe and good mens counsell) pitie peraduenture and godlinesse shall obtaine. Better it were to sustaine pouertie with praise, then in great promotions to be a common note to al men. It is right well knowne vnto all men, how beneficiall the king hath been vnto you, from what baseneſſe to what dignitie hee hath aduanced you, and also into his owne familiaritie hath so much preferred you, that from the north ocean, to the mount Perineus he hath subdued all things to your authoritie: in so much that they were ashamed all other accounted for men right fortunat, whosoeuer could find any fauour with you.

And furthermore, lest that your estimation should bee ouermarched by any nobilitie, hee (against the mind of his mother, and of his realme) hath placed and ratified you substantially in ecclesiastical dignitie, and aduanced in this honor wherein ye stand: trusting through your helpe and counsell to raigne more safely and prosperously. Now, if he shall find disquietnesse, wherein hee trusted to haue quietnesse; what shall all men say or thinke of you? What recompence or retribution shall this be thought to be for so many and great benefits taken? Therefore (if it shall please you) yee shall do well to take your and spare your fame and estimation, and to ouercome your lord and soueraigne with humilitie and charitie. Whereunto if our aduertisement cannot moue you, yet the loue and fidelitie you beare to the bishop and holy church of Rome ought to incline you thereunto, and not to attempt any such thing, whereby the troubles of the church our mother may increase; or whereby her dolour may be augmented in the losse of them, whose disobedience now she doth bewaile. For what if it so happen through prouocation, that the king (whom all his subiects and kingdomes obey) should reliquish the pope, which Godforbid: and should denie all obedience to him, as he denieth to the king helpe or aid against you? what inconuenience would grow thereof? And thinke you, he hath not great instigations, supplications, gifts, and many faire promises to do? Yet he (notwithstanding) abideth firme hitherto in the rocke, deipiring with a valiant mind all that the world can offer. This one thing feareth vs, lest his mind (whom no worldly offers can affaile, no gleric, riches, nor treasure can ouerturne) onlie through indignation of vnkindneſſe be subuerted. Which thing if it chance to happen through you, then may you sit downe and sing the song of the lamentation of Ieremie, and weepe your bellie full.

Consider therefore, if it please you, and foresee well with your selfe, this purpose of yours, if it proceed, how hurtfull and perillous it will be: not only to the pope, and to the holy church of Rome, but also to your selfe most especially. But some peraduenture about you, of haughtie and high minded stomes, more stout perceiue then wise, will not suffer you to take this way: but will giue you contrarie counsell, to proue rather and declare what ye are able to do against your lord and prince, and to practise against him and all his, the vttermost of your power and authoritie; which power and authoritie of yours, to him that offendeth, is fearefull; and to him that will not amend, terrible. Such counsell as this, some peraduenture will whisper in your eare. But to these againe, this we say and answere for our king, whom notwithstanding to be without fault we doe not affirme: but yet alwaies, that hee is readie to amend and make satisfaction, that we speake confidently and protest in his behalfe.

The king appointed for the Lords annointed, prouideth for the peace of his subiects all that he is able: and therefore to the intent hee may conserue this peace in his churches and among st his subiects committed to him; he willeth and requireth such ordinances due to kings, and exhibited to them before time, also to be exhibited to him. Wherein if there hath any contradiction sprung betwixt him and vs, he being thereupon contented and admonished from the pope by the reuerend bishops of London and Hereford, hath not out into any defiance: but meekely and humblie answered, that wherein soeuer the church or any ecclesiasticall person can shew himselfe grieued, hee would therein stand to the iudgement of the church of his kingdome. Which also he is readie no lesse to performe in deed, thinking nothing more sweet vnto him then to be admonished of his fault, if he haue offended the Lord, and to reforme the same; and not only to reforme and amend his fault, but also to satisfie it to the vttermost, if the law shall so require him. Wherefore, seeing he is so willing to recompence & satisfie the iudgement of the church in all things appertaining to the church; refusing no order that shall be taken, but in all things submitting his necke to the yoke of Christ: with what right, by what canon or reason can you interdict him, or vse excommunication against him? It is a thing laudable and a vertue of great commendation in wisemen, wisely to goe with iudgement and reason, and not to be caried with puffes of hastie violence. Whereupon this is the only and common petition of vs all, that your fatherly care will diligently prouide for your flocke and sheepe committed to you, so that they miscarrie not, or runne to anie ruine through any inconsiderat or too much headie counsell in you: but rather through your softnesse and sufferance, they may obtaine life, peace and securitie. It doth moue vs all, that we heare of late to be done by you against the bishop of Salisburie, and the deane of the same church, prosperously, as some men suppose, against whom you haue giuen out the sentence of excommunication and condemnation, before any question of their crime was following therein, as seemeth, more the heat of hastinesse then the path of righteousnesse. This is a new order of iudgement, vnheard of yet to this day in our lawes and canons, first to condemne a man and after to inquire of the fact committed. Which order lest we should hereafter attempt to exercise in like manner against our soueraigne and king, or against vs and our churches and parishes committed to vs, to the detriment of the pope, and the holy church of Rome, and to the no little confusion of vs all: therefore we lay heere against you for our selues the remedie of appellation. And as before, openlie in the publike face of the church with liuely voice we appealed to the pope for certaine perils that might haue happened: so now againe in writing we appeale to the same, assigning the tearme of our appellation the day of the Lords ascension. Most humblie and reuerendly beseeching your goodnesse, that you, taking a better way with you in this matter, will let your cause fall: sparing herein both the labours and charges, as well of your selfe, as ours also. And thus we wish you right well to fare, reuerend in the Lord.

The rescript or answere againe of Thomas Becket to all his suffragans, not obeying but confuting their counsell sent.

Fraternitatis vestræ scriptum (quod tamen prudentiæ vestræ communi consilio non facile credimus emanasse) iuxtaper ex insperato suscepimus, &c.

Your brotherly letters sent, albeit not by the whole assent of your wisedomes written, as I suppose, of late I received vpon a sudden, the contents whereof seeme to containe more sharpnesse then solace. And would to God they proceeded more of sincere zeale of godlinesse and affection of charitie, then of disobedience & froward wilfulnesse. For charitie seeketh not the things that be her owne, but which appertaine to Iesus Christ. It had been your dutie (if there be truth in the gospell, as most vndoubtedly there is) and if you would faithfully haue accomplished his businesse, whose person you represent, rather to haue feared him, which can cast both bodie and soule to hell; then him whose power extendeth no further then to the bodie, rather to haue obeyed God then man, rather your father then your master or lord, after the example of him who was to his father obedient vnto the death, which died for vs; leauing vs example to follow his steps. Let vs die therefore with him, and lay downe our liues for the deliuerance of his church out of the yoke of bondage and tribulation of the oppressor. Which church he hath founded, and whose libertie he hath procured with his owne proper blood: lest if we shall do otherwise, it may happilie fall vpon vs which is written in the gospell: Who so loueth his owne life more then me, is not worthie of me. This ye ought to know, that if it be right which your captaine commandeth, your dutie requireth to obey his will; if not, ye ought then rather to obey God then man.

Scriptures in words rightly alleaged, but falsilie applied.

One thing I will say (if I may be so bold to tell it vnto you) I haue now suffered and abstained a long space, waiting if the Lord had giuen you to take a better heart vnto you, which haue turned away cowardly your backes in the day of battell, or if any of you would haue returned against to stand like a wall for the house of Israel, at least if he had but shewed himselfe in the field, making but the countenance of a warriour against them, which cease not daily to infest the lambe of God. I waited and none came, I suffered and none rose vp, I held my peace and none would speake, I assembled and none would stand with me in like semblance: wherefore seeing I see no better towardnesse in you, this remaineth only, to enter action of complaint against you, and to cry against mine enemies. Rise vp O Lord, and iudge my cause, reuenge the blood of the church which is walled and oppressed. The pride of them which hate his libertie, riseth vp euer, neither is there any that doth good, no not one. Would God, brethren beloued, there were in you any mind or affection to defend the libertie of the church! for she is builded vpon a sure rocke, that although the be shaken, yet she cannot be ouerthrowne. And why then seeke ye to confound me? Say rather your selues in me, then me in you? A man which hath taken vpon me all the perill, haue sustained all the rebukes, haue sustained all the iniuries, haue suffered also for you all, to bene banishment.

I vnsie your mind O. Ro. lect.

The church of Christ cannot be ouerthrowne. Ergo, Becket ought not to be resisted.

And so it was expedient one to suffer for that church, that thereby it might be releast out of scruitude. These things discusse you simply with your selues and weigh the matter. Attend I say diligently in your minds for your parts, that God for his part remaining from your eies all maiestie of rule and imperie, as he is no accepter of persons, may take from your hearts the veile, that ye may vnderstand and see what ye haue done, what ye intend to doe, and what ye ought to doe. Tell me which of you all can say, I haue taken from him since the time of my promotion, either or by alse. If I haue defrauded him of any penie, if I haue misused the cause of any man wrongfully, or if by the detriment of any person I haue sought mine owne gaine, let him complaine, and I will restore him fourefold. And if I haue not offended you, what then is the cause that ye thus leane and for take me in the cause of God? Why bend yee so your selues against me in such a cause, that there is none more special belonging to the church?

Seruile and libertie of the Church wrongfully defined. The words of holy Scripture cleerely applied.

Brethren seeke not to confound your selues and the church of God (so much as in you is) but turne to me and you shall bee safe. For the Lord saith, I will not the death of a sinner, but rather he should conuert and liue. Stand with mee manfully in the warr, take your armor and your shield to defend mee. Take the sword of the word of the mightie God, that we all together may withstand more valiantlie the malignant enemies, such as go about to take away the soule of the church, which is her libertie: without which libertie she hath no power against them that seeke to inroch to their inheritance the possession of Gods sanctuarie. If ye will heare and follow mee, know ye that the Lord will be with you, and with vs all in the defence of the libertie of his church. Otherwise if yee will not, the Lord iudge betwixt me and you, and require the confusion of his church at your hands. Which church, whether the would will or no, standeth firmely in the word of the Lord, whereupon she is builded, and euer shall, till the houre come that she shall passe from this world to the father: for the Lord euer doth support her with his hand.

Turne to thee O Sion turne thou to the Lord and thy affliction shall be saued.

The soule of the church is the libertie of the church, saith Becket.

Wherefore to returne to the matter. Brethren remember well with your selues (which thing ye ought not to forget) what danger I was brought vnto, and the church of God also while I was in England, at my departing out of England, and after my departure from thence also; in what danger it standeth at this present day; but especially at that time, when as at Northampton Christ was iudged againe in my person, before the iudgement seat of the high president. Whose euer heard the archbishop of Canturburie (being troubled for iniuries done to him and to his church, and appealing to the pope of Rome) to be iudged, condemned, appealed, and put to his sureties, and that of his owne suffragans? Where is this law seene, or the authoritie (nay rather peruersitie) of this canon heard of? And why yet shame ye not at this your enormitie? Why are ye not confounded? Or why doth not this confusion worke in your repentance, and repentance driue you to due satisfaction before God and men? For these and such other iniuries done to God and to his church, and to me for Gods cause (which with a good conscience I ought to suffer, because that without danger of soule I ought not to dissemble them) I chose rather to absent my selfe for a season, and to diuell quietlie in the house of my Lord, then in the tabernacle of sinners, vntill the time that (their iniquity being complet) the harts of the wicked, and the cogitations of the same shall be opened. And these iniuries were the cause both of my appeale from the king and of my departure from thence, which yee doe terme to bee sudden. But if ye will speake the truth which ye know, it ought no lesse then to be sudden: lest (being foreknowne) it might haue been preuented and stopped. And as God turned the matter, it happed for the best, both for the honor of the king, and better safetie of them, which (seeking my harme) should haue brought slander to the king. If such troubles followed vpon my departing as ye say, let them bee imputed to him which gaue cause, the fault is in the worker, not in the departer, in him that pursueth, not in him that auoideth iniuries. What would ye more? I presented my selfe to the court, declaring both the causes of my comming and of my appeale, declaring also the wrongs and iniuries done to mee and to my church, and yet could haue no answer: neither was there any that laid any thing against mee, before we came to the king. Thus while wee stood waiting in the court, whether any would come against me or not, they sent to my officials: charging them not to obay mee in my temporalties, nor to owe any seruice to me or to any of mine. After my appellation made in the court, my church was spoiled; we and they about vs depriued of our goods, outlawed both of the clergie and of the laitie, men, women and infants: the goods of the church, that is, the patrimonie of the crucifix, confiscat, and part of the manie turned to the kings vse, part to your owne coffers. Bother bishop of London, if this be true that we heare of you, and that to the vse of your owne church ye conuert this mainie; we charge you and require you forthwith by vertue of obedience, that within fortie daies after the sight of these letters, all delay and excuse set aside, ye restore againe within the time aforesaid, all such goods and parcels as you haue taken away: for it is vnmeet and contrarie to all law, one church to be inriched with the spoile of another church. If ye stand vpon the authoritie that set you a worke, you must vnderstand, that in matters concerning the church goods, hee can giue no lawfull authoritie, which commiteth violent iniuries.

Becket seemeth here more skilfull of his matie booke then of What authoritie and what scripture giueth this prerogatiue to princes vpon church goods, which you would attribute to them? What will they lay for them the remedie of appeale? God forbid. It were euill with the church of God, if when the sacrilegious extortioner hath violentlie inuaded other mens goods (especially the goods of the church) he should after defend him with the title of appeale, &c.

Do not brethren to confound altogether the right of the church and of the temporall regiment: for these two are much different, one boroowing his authoritie of the other. Read the scriptures, and yee shall find what and how many kings haue perished for taking vpon them the priestly office. Therefore let your discretion prouide, lest for this your doing, Gods punishment light vpon you: which if it come, it will bee hard for you very easily to escape. Prouide also and see to your king, whose fauour ye preser before the wealth and profit of the church, lest it happen (which God forbid) that he doth perish with all his house, after the example of them which for the like crime were plagued. And if ye cease not off from that ye begin, with what conscience can I dissemble or forbeare, but must needs punish you? Let him dissemble with you who list (hauing authoritie so to doe, truth I will not) there shall be no dissimulation found in mee. And where you write in your letters concerning my promotion, that it was against the voice of the whole realme, and that the church did reclaime against it; what should I say to you, but that yee know right well: The lie which the mouth doth willingly speake, killeth the soule: but especially the words of a priests mouth ought euer to go with veritie. As touching this matter, I appeale to your owne conscience, whether the fame of my election stood not fully with the consent of them all to whom the election belonged, hauing also the assent of the prince by his soune, and of them which were sent thereto. And if there were some that repugned the same, hee that was troubled and is guiltie, let him speake.

Conscience made where is none.

Clubfisted words of high presumption. Christ is not iudged in the person of any bishop.

Yet say moreouer, that I was exalted and promoted from a base and low degree to this dignitie by him. I grant that I came of no roiall or kinglie blood: yet notwithstanding I had rather be in the number of them, whom vertue of mind then of birth maketh noble. Peraduenture I was borne in a poore cottage, of poore parentage; and yet through Gods clemencie, which knoweth how to worke mercie with his seruants, I which cherisheth the humble and low things, to confound the high and mightie, in this my poore and low estate, before I came to the kings seruice, I had abundantlie and wealthilie to liue withall (as ye know) amongst my neighbours and friends. And Dauid euen from the sheepfold was taken vp and made a king, Peter of a fisher was made a prince of the church, who for his blond being shed for the name of Christ, deserued to haue in heauen a crowne, and in earth, name and renowme: would to God wee could do the like! We bee the successors of Peter, and not of kings and emperors.

They be the successors and sons of saints, not that hold the places of saints, but that doe the works of saints. Hieronim.

And where ye seeme to charge me (by insimination) with the blot of kingratitude: This I answer: There is no offence capitall or infamous, vnlesse it proceed from the heart and intention. As if a man commit a murther vnwillingly, although he be called a murtherer, yet he is not thereby punishable: and so, although I owe my duty and seruice with reuerence to my king, yet if I haue forborne him as my lord, if I haue warned him and talked with him fatherlie and gentlie as with a sonne, and in talking with him could not be heard: it therefore, I say, being inforced thereunto, against my will, I doe exercise vpon him the censure of due seueritie, in so doing I suppose I make rather with him then against him, and rather deserue at his hand thanks for my correction, then note or suspition of vnkindnesse or punishment for the fact. Sometimes a man against his will receiueth a benefit. As when necessitie causeth a man to be refrained from doing that which he ought not: he that doth to refraine him, though he stop him, doth not hurt him, but rather profiteth him for his soules health. Another thing that he fendeth vs from ingratitude, is our father and patron Christ; which in that he is our father, to whom we as children owe obedience, then are we bound as children by necessitie to obay his commandement, in warning the euil doer, in correcting the disobedient, and in bridling the obstinat: which if we doe not, we run into danger to haue his blood required at our hands. Yee fet forth likewise and shew, what losse we thereby may sustaine of our temporalties. But ye spake no word of the losse of our soules.

But he leaueth out here the manner of his comming to the court, and the slurdinesse of his behauior.

Moreouer, as concerning the departure of the king from the homage of the church of Rome, which in your letters yee seeme to pretend, or rather threaten: God forbid, I say, that the deuotion or faith of our king should euer swarue away from the obedience and reuerence of the church of Rome, for any temporall commodite or incommodite: which thing to doe is very damnable in any priuat subiect, much more in the prince which draweth many other with him: therefore God forbid, that euer any faithfull man should once thinke so heinous a deed. And you according to your discretion take heed, lest the words of your mouth infect any person or persons therein, occasioning them by your words to such dangerous and damnable matter, right was not to be obayed. Take heed, ye marre not and ye open that bore.

If the king had been an infidel, error or tyrant against the true doctrine preaching of Christ, they might in this reason stand, and God wills to be obayed then in vain. Now where did Becket learne that the king in his temporall right was not to be obayed?

The commendation of king Henrie the second, for his meeke ruling and moderation.

Scriptures in words rightly alleaged, but falsilie applied.

The bonke of holy scripture, wherunto he might referre no new thing in the old law for kings to depriue priests, and to place whom they would. Kings in the old law did not intermeddle with the priestly office in fining things that were dedicated to God: but yet kings were of them ouer priests to reprehend them when they did amisse. The penance of Achas and Ozie in the old testament was done vpon them.

This Iohn was called a Constantine, because he broke peace with the King and the Bishop of Salisbury and the executor of Gods iudgement by the Pope.

knowledge and processe had of the matter) to this I answer: that both these are iustice and contingible excommunicat, and if ye vnderstand perfectly the condition of the matter, and the right order of iudgements, ye will say no lesse. For this standeth with good authoritie (as ye know) that in manifest and notorious offences, this knowledge and order of proceeding is not requisit. Perpend with your selues diligentlie, what the bishop of Salisburie did concerning the deanerie, after that he was prohibited of the pope and of vs, vnder paine of excommunication: and then shall you better vnderstand vpon to manifest disobedience, suspension did rightlie follow, as yee read in the decree of S. Clement, saying: If they doe not obay their prelates, all maner of persons of what order so euer they be, whether they shall be princes of high or low degree, and all other people, shall not onely bee infamed, but also benished from the kingdome of God, and the fellowship of the faithfull. As concerning Iohn of Oxford, this we say, that excommunication conuincth diuers wayes. Some are excommunicat for the plaine breaking them excommunicat. Some by the sentence of the prelat. Some by communicating with them which are excommunicated. Now he that hath fallen into this damnable hereste, in participating with schismatikes, whom the pope hath excommunicat, he draweth to himselfe the spot and leprosie of like excommunication. Wherefore, seeing he (contrarie to the popes expresse commandement and ours, being charged vnder paine of excommunication to the contrarie) take vpon him the deanerie of Salisburie, we haue denounced him, and hold him excommunicat, and all his doings we disanull by the authoritie of the eight synod, saying; If any man either priuilie or appertlie shall speake, or communicat with him that is excommunicated, he draweth vnto himselfe the punishment of like excommunication. And now, for somuch as your brother (bishop of London) which ought to know that saying of Sergius the seuenth, if a man bishop shall consent to the consecration of priests, deacons, &c. without his precinct, for reward, fauor, or petition, or doth not by authoritie of his office correct the vice, let him bee suspended from his office. And against that saying of pope Leo, which is this: If any bishop shall institute or consecrat such a priest as shall be vnmeet and vncanonicall, if he scape vnpunished of his owne proper dignitie, yet he shall lose the power of instituting any more, &c.

Therefore, forsomuch, I say, as you, knowing this, haue double wise offended against the sentence of these canons, wee command you, and in the vertue of obedience inioyne you, that if it be so, within three monethes after the receipt hereof, you will submit and offer your selfe to due correction and satisfaction to the councell of our fellow bishops, for these your so great excesses: lest others through your example run into the like offence, and we shal be constrained to proceed against you with seuerer sentence.

Finallie, in the closing vp of your letter, where ye bring in for your appellation against me, a safegard for you, which rather indeed is an hinderance to you, that we should not proceed against the imaders of the church goods, nor against the king in like censure, as we haue done against the bishop of Salisburie (as ye say) and his deane. To this I answer: God forbid that we haue, or else should hereafter proceed or doe any thing against the king or his land, or against you or your churches, inordinatly or otherwise then is conuenient. But that if you shall erred in the same or like transgression, as the bishop of Salisburie hath done: Thinke ye then your appellation shall helpe you from the discipline of our seueritie, that ye shall not be suspended? Marke ye diligentlie whether this bee a lawfull appeale, and what is the forme thereof. We know that euery one that appealeth, either doth it in his owne name, or in the name of another: if in his owne, either it is for some greiuance inferred alreadie, or else for that he feareth after to be inferred against him. Now concerning the first, I am sure there is no greiuance that you can complaine of as yet (God be thanked) that you haue received at my hands, for the which you should appeale from me: neither haue you (I trust) any cause speciall against me to doe. If ye doe it for feare that it is to come, lest I should trouble you and your churches: consider whether this be the feare that ought to fall in constant men, or whether this bee the appeale which ought to suspend or stay our power and authoritie that wee haue vpon you and your churches. It is thought therefore of wise men (and we allso iudge no lesse) your appeale to be of no force.

Elements decree.

Diuers kinds of excommunication.

The councell of Chalcedon saith he is to be taken for excommunicated, that receiueth any benefice of any bishop without the consent of the bishop that ordeined him.

Pope Stephane ordered so that he which should receiue any benefice of any bishop without his consent, should be excommunicated.

Pope Leo the 4. ordeined that no bishop should receiue any benefice of another bishop without his consent, vpon paine of losing his owne benefice.

The forme of a true appellation.

Forsomuch as it is not conuenient to reason, and lacketh order and helpe of the law.

Furthermore, if your appellation bee in another mans name, either it is for the king (as most like it is) or for some other. If it be for the king, then you ought first to vnderstand, that appellations are wont to be made to repell, and not to inferr iniurie: or to release such as be oppressed, that they should not be oppressed any more.

Wherefore, if any man shall enter any appellation (not trusting to the surete of his cause, but to delay the time, that sentence be not giuen vpon him) that appellation is not to be receiued. For what state will there be of the church, if the liberty thereof bring taken away, the goods of the church spoiled, the bishops driuen from their places, or at least not receiued with full restitution of their goodes, the inuaders and spoilers thereof may defend themselues by appealing, thereby to saue themselues from the penaltie of their desert?

What answer of the church will this be? Sée what ye haue done, and what ye say. See you not the vicars of Christ representing him in earth? Is it not your office to correct and bridle ill doers, wherein they may cease to persecute the church? And is it not inough for them to be fierce and to rage against the church, but that you should take their part, setting your selues against vs, to the destruction of the church? Who euer heard of so monstrous doings? Thus it shall be heard and said of all nations and countries, that the suffragans of the church of Canturburie (which ought to stand with their metropolitan vnto death in defence of the church) now go about by the kings commandement so much as in them doth lie, to suspend his authoritie, lest he should exercise his discipline of correction vpon them that rebell against the church. This one thing I know, that you cannot sustaine two sorts of persons at once, both to be the appeale makers, and to be appealed vp your selues. You be they which haue made the appellation, and you be they against whom the appellation is made. Is there any more churches then one, and the bodie of the same? And how meet were it then, that you being the members of the church should hold together with the head thereof? I am afraid, lest it may be said of vs: These be the priests which haue said, Where is the Lord? and hauing the law do not know the law. Furthermore, this I suppose you (being discréet men) are not ignorant of, that such as enter any appellation there, are not wont to be heard, vnlesse the matter of their appellation either belonged to themselues, or except speciall commandement force them thereunto, or else vnlesse another mans cause vpon them. First, that it belongeth nothing vnto you, it is plaine: for so much as the contrarie rather pertaineth vnto your dutie; that is, to punish and to correct all such as rebel against the church. And if he which subuerteth the liberty of the church, and inuadeth the goods thereof (conuicting them to his owne vse) bee not heard appealing for his owne defence, much lesse is another to be heard appealing for him. Wherefore, as in this case neither he can appeale for himselfe, nor yet command you so to do, so neither may you receiue the commandement to appeale for him.

Thirdly, as touching the taking of another mans cause or businesse vpon you: to this I say and affirme: that ye ought in no manner of wise so to doe, specially seeing the matter pertaineth to the oppression of the church, and thereupon insueth great damage to the same.

Wherefore, seeing it neither appertaineth to you, neither ought ye to receiue any such commandement, nor yet to take vpon you any such cause as that is, your appeale is neither to be heard, nor standeth with any law. Is this the deuotion and consolation of brotherly loue which you exhibit to your metropolitan, being so you in exile? God forgiue you this clemencie. And holdeth? Will ye loke so your letters and messengers to be gentlie receiued here of vs? Neither doe I speake this, as though there were any thing in hand betwixt your part and ours; or that we haue done any thing inordinatly against the person of the king, or against his land, or against the persons of the church, or intend (by Gods mercie) so to doe. And therefore we say plainlie and affirme confantlie, that our lord the king cannot complaine of any wrong or iniurie to be done vnto him, if he (being often called vpon by letters and messengers to acknowledge his fault, neither will confesse his trespasse, nor yet come to any satisfaction for the same) haue the censure of seueritie by the pope and vs laid vpon him: for no man can say that he vniustlie is intreated, whom the law doth iustlie punish. And briefle to conclude, seeing you this for certain, that extortioners, inuaders, detainers of the church goods, and subuerters of the liberties thereof, neither haue any authoritie of the law to maintaine them, neither doth their appealing defend them, &c.

The pope cannot both bee the appreciater and the partie appealed.

Though the popes law will not defend them yet the law of the scripture will and doth.

A briefe censure vpon the former rescript of Becket to his suffragans, in the page before, with a generall resolution of the reasons therein contained.

Becket reiecting vp the French king against the king of England.

IF the king of England had been an idolater, couetous, an adulterer, an incest, a murtherer, with such like: then the zeale of this archbishop (threatning the king & such as took his part) had deserued praise in this epistle, and the scripture would haue borne him out therein. For then all such causes should bishops prosecute the authoritie of the gospell against all persons. But the matter standing onlie vpon church goods, liberties (or rather licentiousnesse of priests) making of deanes, titles of churches, superioritie, of crowning the king, with such other: to stand so stiffe in these, is not to defend the church; but to rebell against the king. Againe, if the principles which he here groundeth vpon, were true, to wit that the pope were to be obeyed before princes, that the libertie of the church standeth vpon the immunitie of priests exempted from princes lawes, or vpon ample possessions of the church; or that the popes law ought to prevaile preuaile in all forren countries, and to bind all princes in their owne dominions, or that the sentence of the pope and his popelings (how or by what affection soeuer it is pronounced) may stand by the vndoubted sentence of God: then all the arguments of this epistle doe proceed and conclude well. But if they stand not ratified vpon Gods word, but tottering vpon mans traditions: then whatsoeuer he inferreth or concludeth thereupon (his assumpt being false) cannot be true, according to the schoole saying: One inconuenience being granted in the beginning, innumerable follow therupō. So in this epistle it hapneth, as is aboue noted: that the maior of this man is true, but the minor is cleane false, and to be denied.

The letter of Matild the empresse and mother of the king, to Thomas Becket.

The letter of the empresse to Becket.

MY lord the pope commanded mee, and vpon the forgiuenesse of my sinnes inioyned me, that I should be a mediator and meanes of peace and concord betweene my sonne and you, by reconciling of your selfe to him, whereunto (as you know) you requested mee. Wherefore, the earnester and with more affection (as well for the diuine honor as for holy church) I tooke the enterprise vpon mee. But this by the way I aduise you, that the king, his barons, and counsel, taketh it greiuously that you, whom he intirelie loued, honored, and made chiefest in all his realme, to the intent to haue more comfort and better trust in you, should thus (as the report is) rebel, and stir his people against him. Yea and further, that as much as in you lieth, you went about to disherit him, and depriue him of his crowne. Vpon the occasion whereof, I sent vnto you our trustie and familiar seruant Laurence archdeacon, by whom I pray you that I may vnderstand your mind herein, and good will toward my sonne and how you meane to behaue your selfe in my prayer and petition you may bee heard of him in your behalfe) toward his grace. But this one thing I assure you of, that vnlesse it bee through your great humilitie and moderation, euidently in you appearing, you cannot obtaine the fauour of the king. Herein what you meane to doe, I pray you send mee word by your proper letters and messengers.

5 Anno 1169

BUt to proceede further in the order of the historie. After these letters sent to and fro, the yeere of our Lord 1169. which was the fifteenth yeere of the raigne of king Henrie the second, the king mildoubting and fearing with himselfe, that the archbishop would proceed, or exceed rather in his excommunication against his owne person (to preuent the mischiefe) made this appeale to the presence of the pope, requiring to haue certaine legats sent downe from Rome from the popes side, to take vp the matter betweene the archbishop and him; requiring moreouer that they might also be absolued that were interdicted. Whereupon two cardinals, being sent from Alexander the pope with letters to the king, came to Normandie: where they appointed the archbishop to meet them before the king vpon saint Martins day. But the archbishop, neither agreeing with the day nor the place, delayed his comming till the eight day after, neither would any further goe then to Gisortium, where the two cardinals and the archbishop with other bishops conuenting together, had a certaine intreatie of peace and reconciliation, but came to no conclusion. The contents of which intreatie or action, because it is sufficientlie contained in the cardinals letters, who were called Guielmus and Otho, written to the pope, it shall require no further labour, but to shew out the words of the letter, where the summe of the whole may appeare. The words of the letter be these.

A communication between Becket and the cardinals.

Becketts ambition.

Becket would neither stand to iudgement nor triall.

The copie of the epistle written and sent by two cardinals to the pope, concerning the matter of the archbishop Becket.

WIlliam and Otho, cardinals of the church of Rome, to Alexander the pope, &c. Comming to the land of the king of England, we found the contencion betweene him and the archbishop of Canturburie more sharpe and vehement then wee would. For the king and the greater part of them about him said, that the archbishop had stirred vp the French king greiuously against him, and also the earle of Flanders his kinsman (who bare no displeasure to him before) he made his open aduersarie, readie to war against him, as is by diuers euidences most certaine. Thus when we came to Tadomus first to the kings seate, we gaue the letters of your fatherhood to his hands: which after that he had receiued and considered, bringing forth withall other letters receiued from you before, some thing diuers and altering from these which hee receiued of vs) was mooued and stirred with no little indignation, saying: that the archbishop after our departure from you, had receiued of you other contrary letters, by the vertue whereof he was exempted from our iudgement, to that he should not be compelled to answer vs. Moreouer, the said king to vs added and affirmed, and so did the bishops there present, testifying the same, that concerning the old and ancient customs of his progenitors (whereof complaint was made to you) all that for the most part was false and vntrue which was intimat to you; offering further to vs, that if there were any such customs or lawes in his time, that seemed preiudicial or disagreeable to the statutes of the church, hee would willingly be content to reuoke and disanull the same. Whereupon we with other archbishops, bishops, and abbats of the land, hearing the king so reasonable, labored by all the meanes we might, that the king should not vtterlie breake from vs, but rather should incline to vs to haue the matter brought before vs betwixt him and the forenamed archbishop. By reason whereof, we directed out our owne chaplens with letters vnto him, appointing him both time and place where safelie he might meet with vs in the feast of S. Martine. Neuertheles, he pretending certaine excuses, made his dilatories, driuing off the time from the day of S. Martin to the octaues following, which thing stirred the kings heart more then is to be thought.

Thus, although wee offered to the archbishop safe comming, yet when hee refused to meet vs in the borders of the king: we to satisfie his mind, condescended to meet him within the land of the French king, in the place where he himselfe appointed, because there should bee no let in vs whereby to stop his profit. After we had entred communication, we began to exhort him all that wee could, to submit and humble himselfe to his soueraigne and king, who had heaped him with such benefits and dignities: whereby matter might bee giuen vs to further occasion of reconciling them together. Hee being thus mooued and exhorted by vs, departed aside to consult with his counsell vpon the matter. At length after counsell taken, hee commeth againe mildowting in this manner; that hee would submit and humble himselfe to the king, Saluo honore Dei, & ecclesiæ libertate, salua etiam honestate personæ suæ & possessionibus ecclesiarum: & amplius, suæ & suorum in omnibus salua iustitia, &c. That is: Sauing the honor of God, and libertie of the church, sauing also the honestie of his person, and possessions of churches: and moreouer, sauing the iustice of him and of all his in all things, &c. After which communication had betweene vs, we mooued and required him more instantly, that he would come to the specialties, when as yet he had brought nothing in, either which was certaine or particular. Likewise we demanded of him, if hee would in all such things contained and comprehended in our letters, stand and submit himselfe to our letters, so as the king and the bishops before were contented to doe. To the which he answering against, said that he had receiued from you a commandement, not to answer before he and all his were restored full to all their possessions; and then he would to proceed in the matter, according as hee should receiue commandement from the see apostolicall.

Thus we breaking off communication, seeing that he neither would stand to iudgement, nor come to conformitie, thought to make relation thereof to the king, and so bid declaring that which he had expressed to vs: yet not vttering all, but keeping backe a great part of that which we had heard and seene. Which when the king and his nobles had vnderstanding of, affirmed to vs againe: that hee therein was cleared so much the more, for that the archbishop would not stand to their iudgement, nor abide their triall. After much heauinesse and lamentation of the king, the archbishop, bishops, and abbats of the realme repining of vs, whether we had any such power by vertue of our commission, to withstand him and proceed against him; and perceiuing that our authoritie would not serue thereunto, and fearing lest the foresaid archbishop, refusing all order of iudgement, would worke againe disquietnesse to some noble personages of the realme, and seeing our authority could not extend so far to helpe them against him (taking a consultation among themselues) agreed together with one assent, to make their appellation to your audience, prefixing accordingly the terme of their appeale.

Becket fourth letter his bishoprike either the peace of the church for all his gaie talke.

¶ And this is the epistle of these two cardinals sent to the pope: wherein may sufficiently appeare all the discourse and manner of that assemblie (although particularlie euery thing not expressed) concerning the talke betwixt the cardinals and the archbishop. As when that William (who of the two cardinals was the more eloquent) amongst other communication had, reasoned long with him as concerning the peace of the church: which Becket said he preferred aboue all things. Well then (saith the cardinall) seeing all this contention betweene the king and you, riseth vpon certaine lawes and customs to be abrogated, and that you regard the peace of the church so much: then what say you? Will you renounce your bishoprike, and the king shall renounce his customs? The peace of the church now lieth in your hands, either to retaine or to let goe; what say you? To whom he answereth againe, that the proposition was not like. For I, saith he, (sauing the honour of my church and my person) cannot renounce my bishoprike. Contrarie, it standeth the king vpon, for his soules health and honour, to renounce these his ordinances and customs. Which thing he thus prooued; because the pope had condemned those customs, and he likewise with the church of Rome had done the same, &c.

The

The talke betweene the French king, the king of England, and Becket.

AFter the cardinals were returned, the French king seeing the king of England vnquieted and vnlustous to haue peace (or at leastwise pretending to set an agreement betweene them) brought the matter to a communication among them. In which communication the French king made humble as tompare betweene them. The king of England hearing that the archbishop would commit himselfe to his arbitrement, was the more willing to admit his presence. Whereupon may ing being there present, the archbishop prostrating himselfe at the kings feet, declared vnto him kneeling vpon his knees, that he would commit the whole cause, wherein he stood in controuersie betweene them, vnto his wont arbitrement: adding thereto (as he did before) Salvo honore Dei. That is, saving the honor of God. The king, who as is said before, being greatly offended at this word, hearing and seeing the stiffenesse of the man the king so much to this word Salvo honore, &c. was highlie the vnruly displeasure, rebuking him with many grieuous words as a man proud and stubborne, and also charging him with vnkindy and great benefits bestowed vpon him, as a person vnkind and forgetting what he had so gently done and bestowed vpon him.

And speaking to the French king there present: Sir (sir (if it please you) saith the king of England) what seeme displeasith this man, that hee saith to bee contrarie to the honour of God. And so by this meanes he will vendicat and challenge to himselfe both that is his and mine also. And yet notwithstanding, for that I will not seeme to do any thing contrarie or preiudicall to Gods honor, this I offer him: There haue been kings in England before, both of greater and lesse puissance then I am, likewise there haue been bishops of Canturburie many, both great and holie men: What the greatest and most holy of all his predecessors before him hath done to the least of my progenitors and predecessors before me, let him do the same to me and I am content. They that stood by, hearing these words of the king, cried all with one voice. The king hath debased himself enough to the bishop. The archbishop staying a little at this (with silence. What (saith the French king to him my lord archbishop) will you be better then these holy men? will ye be greater then Peter, who that hand yet doubting? Here now haue you peace and quietnesse put in your owne hands, if ye will take it. To this the archbishop answered again: Truth it is (saith he) my predecessors before me were much both better and greater then I, and of them euery one for his time (although he did not extirpe and cut off all) yet something they did pluck vp and correct, which seemed aduerse and repugnant against Gods honor.

For if they had taken all together alway, no such occasion there had been left for any men to raise vp this fire of temptation now against vs, as is here raised to vexe vs withall. Neither we being so moued with them, might also be crowned with them, being likewise partakers of praise and reward, as wee are of their labour and trauell. And though some of them haue been slacke, or exceeded in their dutie doing, in that wee are not bound to follow their example.

Peter, when he denied Christ, we therfore rebuke him; but rather he resisted the rage of Nero, therein wee commend him. And therefore, because hee could not find in his conscience to consent vnto that he ought in no wise to dissemble, neither did he, by reason therof he lost his life. By such like oppressions the church hath alwaies grown. Our forefathers and predecessors, because they would not dissemble the name and honor of Christ, therefore they suffered. And shall I, to haue the fauour of one man, suffer the honor of Christ to be suppressed? The nobles standing by (hearing him thus speake) were greatly grieued with him, noting in him both arrogancie and wilfulnesse, in pertinacie and refusing such an honest offer of agreement. But specialie one among the rest was most grieued, who there openlie protested: that seeing the archbishop so refused the counsell and request of both the kings doms, he was not worthy e to haue the helpe of either of them: but as the kingdome of England had receiued to the realme of France should not receiue him.

Alanus Herbertus and certain other of his chaplens that committed to shrive the doings of Becket, doe record (whether truly or no I cannot say) that the French king sending for him, as one much sorrowing and lamenting the words that he had spoken at the comming of Becket do prostrat himselfe at his feet, confessing his fault, in giuing counsell to him in such cause pertaining to the honor of God: to relent therein and to yeild to the pleasure of man: wherefore declaring his repentance, hee desired to be absolued therof. So that af er this, the French king and Becket were great friends together. Insomuch that king Henrie sending to the king to intreat him and desire him that he would not support nor maintaine his enemy within his realme. The French king bitterly denied the kings request, taking part rather with the archbishop then with him.

Besides these quarels and grudges betwixt the king and the archbishop aboue mentioned, there followed yet moreouer another, which was this: Shortly after this communication recited betweene the king and Becket, the king of England returning againe from Normandie into England (which was the yeare of our Lord 1170, and the seuenth yeare of his raigne) about Midsummer, kept his court of parliament at Westminster, in the which parliament he (through the assent both of the clergie, and the lords temporall) caused his sonne Henrie to be crowned king. Which coronation was done by the hands of Robert archbishop of Yorke, with the assistance of other bishops ministring to the same, as Gilbert of London, Joseline of Salisburie, Hugo of Durefme, and Walter of Rochester. By reason whereof Becket of Canturburie being therewithall mentioned not called for, take no little displeasure; and so did Roboulke the French king, hearing that Margaret his daughter was not also crowned with her husband: wherevpon he gathering a great armie, forthwith marched into Normandie. But the matter was soone compassed by the king of England, who sending his son vnto him in Normandie, intreated there and concluded peace with him, promising that his sonne should be crowned againe, and then his daughter to be crowned also. But the archbishop not ceasing his displeasure and emulation, sent vnto the pope, complaining of these foure bishops, especiallie of the archbishop of Yorke, who durst be so bold in his absence and without his knowledge or his licence, to intermeddle to crowne the king, being a matter proper and peculiar to his iurisdiction. At the instance of whom the pope sent downe the sentence of excommunication against the bishop of London. The other three bishops with the archbishop of Yorke he suspended, whose sentence and letters hereof, for auoiding prolixitie, I here omit.

Besides these foresaid bishops excommunicated, diuers other clerks also of the court he cited to appeare before him, by vertue of his large commission which he gat from the pope, to whom they were bound to obay, by reason of their benefices. And some he commanded in vertue of obedience to appeare, in paine of forfeiting their orders and benefices. Of which when neither but few would appeare, he curssed them openlie. And also some lay men of the court and the kings familiars, some as intruders, and violent withholders of church goods, hee denounced: as Richard Lucie, and Joseline Balliol, and Rafe Broke which broke his goods that belonged to the church of Canturburie, and Hugh Scentcleare, and Thomas the sonne of Barnard, and all that should hereafter take any church goods without his consent, so that almost all the court was accursed either by reason, or as partakers.

This being done, the archbishop of Yorke with the foresaid bishops resorted to the king with a grieuous complaint, declaring how miserable their case stood, and what they had sustained for fulfilling his commandement. The king hearing this, was highly moued, as no marvell was. But what remedie? The tune of the ruine of the pope was not yet come; and that prince then might withstand the iniurious violence of that Romish protestant.

In the meane season the French king for his part, his clergie and countrers slacke no occasion to incite and solicit Alexander the pope against the king of England, to excommunicat him also: seeking thereby and thinking to haue some bantage against the realme. Neither was the king ignorant of this, which made him more readie to apply some agreement of reconciliation. At length came downe from the pope two legats (the archbishop of Rothomage and the bishop of Nauern) with direction and full commission either to driue the king to be reconciled, or to be interdised by the popes censures out of the church. The king vnderstanding himselfe to be in greater straits then he could auoid (at length through the mediation of the French king and of other prelats and great princes) was content to yeeld to peace & reconciliation with the archbishop, whom he receiued both to his fauour, and also permitted and granted him free returne to his church again. Concerning his possessions and lands of the church of Canturburie, although Becket made great labour therefore, yet the king (being then in Normandie) would not grant him before he should repaire to England, to shew how he would there agree with his subiects.

Thus peace after a sort concluded betwixt the king & him, the archbishop after six years of his banishment returned to England, where he was right ioyfully receiued of the church of Canturburie, albeit of Henrie the young king he was not so greatlie welcomed. In so much that comming by to London to the king, he was returned backe to Canturburie, and there bid to his feast his house. Roger Houden maketh mention in his chronicle, that the archbishop (vpon Christmas day) did excommunicat Robert de Broke for cutting off the taile of a certaine horse of his the day before. In the meane time the foure bishops before mentioned, whom the archbishop had excommunicat, sent to him, humblie desiring to be released of their censure. To whom when the archbishop would not grant cleerelie and simplie without cautels and exceptions, they went ouer to the king, declaring vnto him and complaining of their miserable state and vncourteous handling of the archbishop. Whereupon the king conceiued great sorrow in his mind, and displeasure toward the partie. In so much that he lamented oft and sundrie times to them about him, that (among so many that he had done for) there was none that would reuenge him of his enemie. By occasion of which words, certaine that were about the king (to the number of foure) hearing him thus to complaine and lament, addressed themselues in great heat of hast to satisfie the greeued mind and quarell of their prince: who within foure daies after the said Christmasse day (laying ouer into England, and hauing a forward and a prosperous wind in their tournie, being in the deepe of winter) came to Canturburie, where Becket was commanded to keepe. After certaine admonitions and consultations had among themselues, they preased at length into the palace where the archbishop was sitting with his company about him: first to alsay him with words, to see whether he would relent to the things required to come to his speech: but now seeing that I am stopt from that, neither can find redresse of so great vexations and iniuries as I haue and doe daily sustaine, nor can haue the benefit of the law or reason; such right and law as an archbishop may haue that will exercise, and let for no man. At these words one of them hurtling out in exclamation, cried, Hee threateneth, hee threateth. What: will he interdict the whole realme and vs al together: Nay that he shal not, saith another, he hath interdicted to many already. And drawing more neere to him, they protested and denounced him to haue spoken words to the ieopardie of his owne head. And so departing in great furie, and many high words, rushed out of the doores; who by the way returning to the monks, charged them in the kings name to keep him fast by comming, that he should not escape away. What, quoth the archbishop, think ye I will flie away? Nay, neither for the king, nor any man aliue, will I flie one foot from you. No, say they, thou shalt not auoid, though thou wouldest. And so they departing with many words, the archbishop followeth them out of the chamber doore, crying after them, Here, here, here shall you find me; laying his hand vpon his crowne.

The names of these foure souldiers aboue mentioned were these, the first Reginald Foresoun, the second Hugh Mortevill, the third William Tracie, and the fourth Richard Britto who going to Saruelle themselues, returned the same day against: but finding the hall doore of the palace of Canturburie shut against them, they went to an inward backe doore leading into the orchard, there brake they vp a window and opened the doore, and so issued into the place. The monks (being about euensong time) had got the archbishop into the church; who being perswaded by them, caused his crosse to be borne before him, & so through the cloister, by a doore which was broken vp for him, proceeded into the quire. The harnesse men following after, at length came to the church doore, which doore the monks would haue shut against them: but as the storie saith, the archbishop would not suffer them. So they approching into the church, and the archbishop meeting them vpon the staires, there was slaine, euery one of the foure souldiers striking him with his sword into the head; who afterward flying into the north, at length with much adoo obtaining their pardon of the pope by the kings procurement, as some hopes record, went to Jerusalem.

¶ Thus you haue heard the life and death of this Thomas Becket, of whom what is to be iudged, let this owne acts and facts declare. And albeit the scripture ought to bee onlie the rule to vs to iudge all things by, yet if any shall require further testimonie, partlie to satisfie their minds therein, yee shall heare the iudgements of certaine men, in yeares and times almost as ancient as himselfe, what they write & affirme of him.

And first to begin with the testimonie of one of his owne religion, and also not far (as it appeareth) from his owne time, who writing of his martyrdome and miracles, thus testifieth of the iudgement and sentence of diuers concerning his promotion and behauiour. The chronicle being written in Latine, and hauing the name of the author cut out, thus beginneth: Quoniam vero multi, &c. And in the first booke and eight chapter it followeth in this maner: Nonnullis tamen iderco promotionem eius, visum est minus canonicâ, quod ad eam magis operata est regis insatia, quâ cleri vel populi vota. Presumptionis quoque vel indiscretionis fuisse notatum est, quod quis tantæ cepere vix idoneus videbatur, primus gubernandi locum susceperit, &c. Et mox: Magis etiam secularia tum sapiens, tum sinthum tantæ dignitatis fastigium non horrens temuisse sed extroneus ascendisse creditus. Aliter Dei amicus Moses, &c. With much more as in Latine is to be seene, which for the English reader here followeth translated. Diuers notwithstanding there be, which as touching his promotion, suppose the same not to be canonicall. For that it was wrought rather by the instance of the king of him king him to bee a man readie and inclinable to his vtilitie) then by the assent either of the clergie or of the people. Further it is noted in him for a point of presumption, and lacke of discretion, for that he being scarse worthie to take the ore in hand and play the boteswane, would take vpon him to sit at ỹ helme, and guide the ship: namely in that church, where the couent being in gesture and vesture religious, be wont to haue their prelat taken out of the same profession. Where as he, scant bearing the habit of a clerke, and going in his changes and soft apparell, is more conuersant among the delicat rufflers in the court, labouring rather of worldly things, not refusing moreouer without any dread, to clime vp to the high preferment of such an holie dignitie, but rather willingly of his owne accord to aspire it. Moses we read did otherwise, who being the friend of God, and sent of him to conduct his people Israel out of Egypt, trembled at the message, and said: Who am I Lord, that I should go to Pharao, and bring thy people Israel out of Egypt? And againe, I pray thee (saith he) O Lord, I am nothing eloquent, send him whom thou wilt send. Likewise Ieremias also being sent of the Lord to prophesie against Ierusalem, was abashed to take the office vpon him, answering againe with much dread of heart; A, a, a, Lord, I cannot vtter my mind, for I am a child.

After like manner we read of the saints of the new testament, whereof many were preferred oftentimes to their bishoprikes and functions of the church by mere forcement and compulsion rather of others, then by their owne wils. Likewise S. Gregorie after his flight & going away, brought backe against his mind, who also of purpose accusing & confessing his owne defects, because he would be repealed: yet by the commandement of Valentinian the emperour was inforced to take the burthen vpon him, which he could by no wise shake off. S. Martin in like sort vnknowing of any such matter, was circumuented by a certaine godly traine and wile of the citizens, before hee could be brought to his consecration, ter, was circumuented by a certaine godly traine and wile of the citizens, before hee could be brought to his consecration, ther examples this chancello likewise should haue rather erred himselfe as vnworthie and vnmeet for that roome, then ting himselfe more willing to refuse them to take it. To the which this archbishop is iudged to doe cleane contrary, &c. Hæc ex chronico, cui titulus, De passione & miraculis beati Thomæ.

And although scarslie any testimony is to be taken of that age (being all blinded and corrupted with superstition) yet let vs heare what Neuburgensis an ancient historiographer saith, who in the daies of the sonne of this king Henrie the second, prosecuting his historie vnto king Richard the first, hath these words, writing of Thomas Becket: Sane clamplerique extant ex his quos amat & laudant affectu quodam propensiori, sed prudentis parcat quisquid ab eis geritur, approbare: plane ego in vniuersis venerabile ea quæ ita ab ipso alta sunt, quis nulla existat probrorum vitiligatio, sed feruor zelotypus accenderetur regnis, ex quo tot mala postmodum pullulasse nosuntur, laudanda negotiagam consecrim, licet ex laudabili zelo processerint: sicut in beatissimo apostolorum principe quid gentes sito exemplo iudaizare coegit in quo eum doctor gentium reprehensibilem declarat fuisse, licet eum confiet laudabili hoc pietate feciisse, &c. That is in English.

Ex chronico Neuburgensi.

Acta Becketi improbata.

Whereas many be wont, in them whom they loue or praise (iudging them more by affection then prudence) to allow and approoue whatsoeuer they do, yet for me to iudge vpon this reuerend man, verely I thinke not his doings and acts to be praise worthie, or to be allowed; forsomuch as thereof came no vtilitie but onely the anger and stirring vp of the king: whereupon afterward sprung so great mischiefes (although the thing that he did, might proceed of a certaine laudable zeale) like as in the blessed prince of the apostles, in that he taught the gentils by his example to play the Iewes, Paul the doctour of the gentils did declare him therein to be rebukeable, albeit it cannot be denied, but that he did it of a good affection, &c.

And in the same author, in another place it followeth to the like effect, in these words: Literas has in Anglicam ad suspensionem ejus, quam præmisserat ejus sequebatur, celo istius feruidus; verum ample secundum scientia non erat Dei. Nostræ enim patrinati negligunam concedimus, de tanti viri actibus temere indicare. Puto enim quod in molli adhuc teneritudine regis concordia minus prouide egisset, & ea que sine fidei christianæ periculo tolerari potuissent, ratione temporis & comperatione pacis dissimulanda diuisset, tract. illud propheticum: Prudens in tempore illo tacebit, quia tempus malum erit. Itaque, quod a venerabili pontifice tunc actum est, nec laudare illum esse indico, nec vituperare presumo: sed dico, si vel modice in his modis a sancto cetro per zeli immoderationem ingressus est excessum, hoc vel ipsum est sacre, quæ confessionis esse passionis excellit. Ita quippe simili in viri vel amarulent laudacis sunt audacia, qui nos illis longe impares esse cognoscimus, vt ea, in quibus homines fuerunt, vel fuisse nos minus negligamus vel amemus vel laudemus: sed ea tantum, in quibus eos sine scrupulo imitari debemus. Quis enim eos dicit in omnibus, qua ab ipsis sunt, esse imitabiles? Non igitur in omnibus, que facilit. sed sapienter & caute debet laudari, ne sit a Deo prærogatiua seruetur, in cuius utique laudibus nemo potest esse nimis, quantumcunq; laudare conetur, &c. That is in English.

The letters which were sent before for the suspending of the bishops, he pursued with burning zeale of iustice; but whether according to knowledge God knoweth it. It is not for my rude and slender wit to iudge of the doings of such a person. But yet this I suppose: that he did not behaue himselfe so circumspectlie as he ought (considering the time;) and that the concord betweene him and the king as yet was but soft and tender. Who for the consideration of the time, and for the recompence of peace, might haue forborne or dissembled such things, which without any perill of christian religion might be tolerat well enough, according to the prophetical saying: A wiseman in his time will keepe silence, because the time will not serue him. Wherefore, as the doings of that reuerend prelat I iudge in that behalfe not to be commended, so neither doe I presume to discommend them. But this I say, that if that holy man through immoderat violence of zeale, did exceed in a part therein, the same was excocted againe and purged by the fire of his suffring, which afterward insued. And so far holie men are to be loued or praised of vs, which know our selues much inferior to their vertues; that in such things wherein they haue been men, and also know ye to bee men, therein wee neither hold with them nor commend them: but onely such things wherin without al danger or scruple we ought to imitate them. For who is able to say, that they are to be imitated in all that they doe? and therefore are not to be esteemed and praised in all things generallie whatsoeuer they doe, but considerateliie and with aduisement, wherein they deserue praise, so that the onelie prerogatiue in this behalfe be reserued to God, in whose praise no man can exceed, how feruent soeuer hee bee in his praising, &c.

And heare yet more what the said author writeth in the same cause of the kings wrath and Beckets faults: Plusquam centum homicidia a clericis commissa sub Henrico secundo dicuntur. In quibus pleriosq; rex aliquanto clementior. Sed hanc mansuetudinem regia, vultrinecessorie episcopos tantum respicit culpa, quantum absit processe & causa. Cum enim sacri præcipiunt canones, clericos non solum sacrum ordinis, sed & grauioribus arreis criminibus, verum etiam leuioris criminum reos degradari, & ex valle talium, tanquā immundas inter pares grauipalatia ecclesia Anglicana continat, tamē quamplures a multis retrō annis clericos in Anglia contigit officio primari. Nempe episcopi deum defendendis magis clericorū libertatibus vel dignitatibus, quam eorum vitijs corrigēdis vel scandisque insigniam; arbitrantur obsequiū se præstare Deo & ecclesiæ, si facinorosos clericos, quos pro officij debito canonica vigore censura coercere debeant, extra publicam tuentur disciplinā. Vnde clerici qui in sortem Domini vocati, tanquā stelle in firmamento celi positi, vita & verbo lucere deberent super terram, habentes pro impunitate agendi quodcunque libuerit, licentiam & libertatem, nec Deum, cuius iudicium verdare videtur, neque homines potestatem habentes reuerentur, cum & episcopalis circa eos solicitudo sit languida, & seculari eos iurisdictione sacri eximat ordinis prærogatiua. In English.

More then an hundred murthers are said to be committed by the clergie vnder king Henrie the second: in punishing of whom the king was somewhat too vehement. But the fault, saith he, of this immoderat dealing of the king resteth most in the bishops of our time, forsomuch as the cause thereof proceedeth of them. For where it is decreed and commanded by the canon law (concerning the spiritual men of the clergy) that not onely such as bee notorious, but such as be spotted with lighter crimes should be degraded, whereof haue wee so many thousands and whole swarmes of such now in England, as innumerable chaffe among the little good graine; and yet how few do we see these many yeeres in England deprived of their office? For why? the bishops while they labour more to maintaine the liberties and dignities of churchmen, then to correct their vices, thinke they do God and the church great seruice, if they rescue and defend the enormities of the churchmen against publik discipline, whom they ought rather to punish by the vertue of the censure ecclesiasticall. Whereupon the churchmen, such as be sorted peculiarly to the Lord, and ought like stars to shine in earth by word and example, taking licence and libertie to doe what they list, neither reuerence God (whose iudgement seemeth to tarrie) neither men set in authoritie: when as both the bishops are slacke in their charge doing, and also the prerogatiue of their order exempteth them from the secular iurisdiction, &c. And thus much out of Neuburgensis.

Ex Cæsario monach. lib. 8. dialo. cap. 69.

To this matter also pertaine the words of Cæsarius the monke in his eight booke of dialogues and sixty ninth chapter, about the eight and forte yeere after the death of Thomas Becket, which was the yeere of God 1220. whose words in sum come to this effect: Quæsito Parisijs inter magistros ventilata fuit, vtrum damnatus in saluatus esset ille Thomas. Dixerat Regerius tunc Normanus, fuisse illum morte ac damnatione dignum, quod contumax esset in Dominum regem. Protulit contra Petrus Cantor Parisiensis, quod signa salutaris & magnæ sanctitatis essent eius miracula: & quod martyrium probasset ecclesiæ causa, pro qua mortem subierat, &c. In English.

Whether Thomas Becket be saued or damned.

There was a question mooued among the masters of Paris, whether Thomas Becket was saued or damned. To this question answereth Roger a Norman, that hee was worthie death and damnation, for that he was so obstinat against Gods ministers his king. Contrary, Peter Cantor a Parisian disputed, saying and affirming, that his miracles were great signes and tokens of saluation, and also of great holinesse in that man: affirming moreouer, that the cause of the church did loue and confirme his martyrdome, for the which church he died, &c.

Ex historia monachi Cant. de miraculis b. Thomæ.

The iudgement and censure of the schole of Paris touching this question, for the sancting of Thomas Becket. In which iudgement for so much as the greatest argument resteth in the miracles wrought by him after his death; let vs therefore paule a little vpon the same, to trie and examin these his miracles. In the triall whereof we shall find one of these two to be true, that either if they were true, that they were wrought not by God, but by a contrarie spirit, of whom Christ our Lord giueth vs warning in his gospell, saying: Whose comming shall be with lying signes and wonders, to deceiue if it were possible the elect, Matth. 24. or else wee shall find that no such were euer wrought at all, but fained and fayned of idle monks and religious bellies, for the exaltation of their churches, & profit of their pouches, which thing indeed seemeth rather to be true, and no lesse may appeare by the miracles themselues, set forth by one of his owne monks, and of his owne time, who in fine seuenne bookes hath comprehended all the reuelations, vertues and miracles of the archbishop, the which bookes (as yet remaining in the handes of William Stephanton citizen of London) I haue seene and perused, wherein is contained the whole sum of all his miracles, to the number of 270. being so far off from all truth and reason, some ridiculous, some monstrous, some vaine, absurd, some also blasphemous, and some so impudent, that not onelie they deserue no credit, (altogether sauoring of meere forgerie) but also for very shame will abash an honest pen to write of them. First, if miracles serue for necessitie and so infidels, what cause or necessitie was there (in a christian realme hauing the word of God) for God to worke such miracles after his death, who neuer wrought any in all his life? Then to consider the end of these miracles, whither doe they tend, but only to bring men to Canturburg, with their bowes and offrings to inrich the conent?

Liber de miraculis b. Thomæ autore monacho quodam Cantuar.

Besides the number of these miracles, which he said to be so many that they lose their owne credit; what disease is there belonging to man or woman, in the curing wherof some miracle hath not been wrought by this [illegible] as feuers, fistula, the gout, toothach, palsie, consumption, falling sicknesse, lepsie, headach, broken armes, maimed legs, swelling thotes, the raising vp of the dead which haue been two daies departed, with infinite others. And as all these haue been healed (for the most part) by one kind of salue (as a certaine Panacea) which was, with the water onely of Canturburie, like as a cunning smith which would open with one key all maner of locks; so again in reading of the storie of these miracles ye shall find the matter so conuied, that the power of this dead saint was neuer twice shewed on any one disease, but euery diuers disease to haue a diuers miracle.

A blasphemous diuision.

A false and impudent miracle.

Miracles of S. Thomas Becket confuted.

To recite in other all these prodigious reuelations and fantasticall miracles, falslie imagined and ascribed to this archbishop, were nothing else but to write a legend of lies, and to occupie the people with trifles. Which because it pertaineth rather to the idle profession of such dreaming monks and cloisterers, that haue nothing else to maintaine that religion withall: I will not take their profession out of their hands. Wherefore to omit all such vaine and lying apparitions and miracles, as how this angrie saint (three daies after his death) appeared by vision at the altar in his pontificalibus, commanding the quire not to sing, but to say this office of his masse: Exurge, quare obdormis Domine, &c. Which vision the author himselfe of the booke doth say he did see. To omit also the blasphemous lie, how in an other vision the said archbishop should say, that his blood did cric out of the earth to God, more then the blood of iust Abel. Item, in another vision it was shewed a monke of Lewis, how S. Thomas had his place in heauen appointed with the apostles, aboue Stephan, Laurence, Vincent, and all the other martyrs. Wherof this cause is rendred, for that S. Stephan, Laurence, and such others, suffered onelie for their owne cause, but this Thomas suffred for the vniuersall church. Item, how it was shewed to a certaine young man (Dimus by name) that twelue yeares before the death of this Becket, that among the apostles and martyrs in heauen there was a vacant place left for a certaine priest, as he said, of England, which was credible supposed to be this Thomas Becket. Item, how a certaine knights sonne being two daies dead, was restored againe to life as he had the water of Canturburie put in his mouth, and had by his parents foure pieces of siluer bended, to be offered in Canturburie in the childs behalfe. All these, I say, with such other like to omit (the number whereof commeth to an infinite nūber) onely this one storie of an other shall followeth shall suffice to reprehende the vanitie & impudent forgery of all the rest.

Singing at the masse for Thomas Becket after his death.

A blasphemous lie.

Becket aboue the martyrs in heauen.

A place prepared in heauen for Becket aboue martyrs before his death.

In the fourth booke of this fabulous author, and in the third chapter, a miracle is there contained of a certaine countriman of Bedfordshire in kings Weston, whose name was Gilwardus, which Gilwardus in his drunkennes busshing into another mans house which was his debter, take out of his house a great whetstone, & a paire of hedging gloues. The other partie seing this value not sufficient for his condemnation (by the counsell of the towne clerke) entred an action of felonie against him for other things besides, as for stealing his wiuits, his garnet, and other clothes. Wherupon Gilwardus being had to the gaole of Bedford, and afterward condemned for the same, was iudged to haue both his eyes put out, and also those members cut off which nature with secret shame hath couered. Which punishment by the malice of his aduersarie being executed vpon him, hee lying in great danger of death by bleeding, was counselled to make his prayer to this Thomas of Canturburie. Which done, (saith the miracle) there appeared one to him by night, in white apparell, bidding him to watch and pray, and put his trust in God and our ladie, and holy S. Thomas. In conclusion, the miracle thus fell out: The next day and euening the man rubbing his eye lids, began to feele his eyes to be restored againe: first in a little, after in a greater measure, so that one syne of a gray colour, the other was of blacke; and here was one miracle rung. After this followed an other miracle also vpon the same person: for going but the space of foure miles, when his eyes were restored, hee chanced (in like maner) to rub the place where his secret parts were cut off, and immediatly on the same his Pendenda (to vse the words of my storie) were to him restored. Principio parua quidem valde, sed in maius proficientia, which he permitted euery one to feele that would, and thanked not to deuie. In so much that hee comming vp to S. Thomas, first at London was received with ioy of the bishop of Durham, who then sending to the burgers of Bedford for the truth of the matter, received from them againe letters testimoniall, wherein the citizens there, saith this fabulous testimoniall confirmed sicke to the bishop, then to the count of Canturbury, the relation of this to be as hath been told. This one miracle (gentle reader) so shamelesse and impudent, I thought here to expresse, that by this one thou might est iudge of all the residue of all his miracles (and by the residue thereof might est iudge moreouer of all the filthie wicked nesse of all these lying monks and cloisterers, which count it a light sport so impudentlie to deceiue the simple soules of Christs church with trifling lies and dreaming fables. Wherfore (as I said) if the holy sainting of Thomas Becket standeth vpon no other thing but vpon his miracles, what credit is to be giuen thereto? and vpon what a weake ground his shine so long hath stood, by this may easilie be seene. Furthermore, an other fable as notable as this, and no lesse worthie of the whetstone, we reade in the storie of Gerualius: That Thom as Becket appearing to a certaine priest, named Thomas, declared to him that hee had so brought to passe, that all the names of the monks of the church of Canturburie with the names of the priests and clerks, and with the families belonging to that citie and church of Canturburie, were written in the booke of life. Ex Cornatol. 6.

A lying miracle.

Ex libro annalium Historiarum manuscripto I. Skeyn.

But what so euer is to be thought of his miracles, or howsoeuer the testimony of the schole of Paris, or of these ancient times went with him or against him: certaine it is, that this authente or collect lately collected and printed in his praise, is blasphemous, and derogateth from the praise of him to whom all praise only and honor is due, where it is said:

Tu per Thomæ sanguinem, quem pro te impendit,
Fac nos Christe scandere, quo Thomas ascendit.

That is:
For the blood of Thomas, which he for thee did spend,
Grant vs (Christ) to clime, where Thomas did ascend.

The blasphemous author of Thomas Becket.

Therein is a double lie contained: first, that hee died for Christ; secondly, that if he had so done, yet that his blood could purchase heauen. Which thing neither Paul nor any of the apostles durst euer challenge to themselues: for if any mans blood could bring vs to heauen, then the blood of Christ was shed in vaine.

And thus much touching the testimonie or censure of certaine ancient times concerning the cause of Thomas Becket. In the explication of whose historie I haue stood now the longer (exceeding peraduenture in ouermuch prolixitie) to the intent that his cause being fully opened to the world, & duely weighed on euery part, mens minds (thereby long deceiued by ignorance) might come vnto the more perfect certainetie of y truth therof, & therby to iudge more surely what is to be receiued, and what to be refused. Where by the way is to bee noted out of the testimonie of Rob. Crikeladensis, which in him I find: that among the peeres & nobles of this land neere about the king, gaue out in strait charge vpon paine of death and confiscating of all their goods, no man to be so hardie to name Thomas Becket to be a martyr, or to preach of his miracles, &c. Ex Crikeladensi.

After the death of Thomas Becket, the king fearing the popes wrath and curse to be laid vpon him (whereunto Lubouike y French king also helped what he could to set the matter forward) sent to Rome the archbishop of Rothomage, with certaine other bishops and archdeacons vnto the pope with his excuse; which the pope would in no wise heare. And after other messengers being sent (whom some of the cardinals receiued) it was shewed to them that on Good friday (being then neere at hand) the pope of custome was wont to assoile or to curse, and that it was noised how the king of England with his bishops should be cursed and his land interdicted, and that they should be put in prison. After this, certaine of the cardinals shewed the pope, that the messengers had power to sweare to the pope that the king should obey his punishment and penance: which was taken both for the king and the archbishop of Yorke. So that in the same day the pope cursed the bed doers with such as were of their consent, either that aided or harboured them. Concerning these bed doers it is touched briefle before, how they fled vnto Yorkeshire lying in Snarlborough, who after hauing in penance to go in their linnen clothes barefoot (in kissing and prayer) to Jerusalem, by reason of this hard penance are said to die in few yeares after.

The king of England assoiled lying, as is said, in Rome, could find no grace nor fauor a long time at the popes hands. At length with much ado it was agreed, that two cardinals should be sent downe to inquire out the matter concerning them that were consenting to Beckets death. The king perceiuing what was preparing at Rome, neither being yet certain vnto the intent of the pope and comming downe of the cardinals would tend: in the meane time addressed himselfe with a great power to enter into Ireland, giuing in charge and commandement, as Houeden writeth, that no bringer of any briefe or letter should come ouer into England or passe out of the realme (of what degree or condition soeuer he were) without speciall licence and allowance, so bring nothing that should bee preiudicial to to the realme.

The king of England assoiled lying.

The king sendeth to Rome.

The penance of the foure knights.

Heresies.

This order being set and ordained, the king with 400 great ships taketh his iourney to Ireland, where he abode in short time the whole land vnto him, which at that time was governed vnder diuers kings to the number of fiue: of whom foure submitted themselues vnto the said king Henrie, onely the fift, who was the king of Conaata, denied to bee subdued, keeping him in woods and marishes.

Ireland first subdued to England.

In the meane season while the king was thus occupied in Ireland, the two cardinals that were sent from the pope (Theodinus and Albertus) were come to Normandie. Vnto whom the king the next peere following resorted about the moneth of October, in the yeare 1172. But before, during the time of the kings being in Ireland, the bishop of London, and Joselme bishop of Salisbury had sent to Rome and procured their absolution from the pope. The king returning out of Ireland by Wales into England, from thence to Normandy, there made his purgation before the popes legats, as touching the death of the foresaid Becket, to the which he sware hee was neither aiding or consenting, but onely that he spake rigorous words against him, for that his knights would not auenge him against the said Thomas; for the which cause this penance was inioyned him vnder his oth.

The kings penance for the death of Becket.

Firſt, that hee ſhould ſend ſo much into the holy land, as would find two hundred knights & ſoudiers for the defence of that land.

Alſo that from Chriſtmas day next following he ſhould ſet forth his owne perſon to fight for the holy land, the ſpace of three yeares together, vnleſſe he ſhould bee otherwiſe diſpenſed withall by the pope.

Item, that if he would make his iourney into Spaine (as his preſent neceſſitie did require) there he to fight againſt the Saracens, and as long time as hee ſhould there abide, ſo long ſpace might he take in prolonging his iourney toward Ieruſalem.

Item, that he ſhould not hinder nor cauſe to be hindred by him any appellations made to the pope of Rome.

Item, that neither hee nor his ſonne ſhould depart or diſſeuer from pope Alexander, or from his catholike ſucceſſors, ſo long as they ſhould recount him or his ſonne for kings catholike.

Item, that the goods and poſſeſſion taken from the church of Canturburie ſhould be reſtored againe fully and amplie (as they ſtood the yere before Thomas Becket departed the realme, and that free liberties ſhould be granted to all ſuch as were outlawed for Beckets cauſe to returne againe.

Item, that the foreſaid cuſtoms and decrees by him eſtabliſhed againſt the church, ſhould be extinct and repealed, ſaue only except that concerned his owne perſon, &c.) beſides other ſecret ſtallings and aliances inioyned him.

All theſe former conditions the king with his ſon did both agree vnto, behaling himſelfe in ſuch ſort of ſubmiſſion before the two cardinals by the occaſion whereof, the cardinall tooke no little glorie, vſing this verſe of the pſalme; Qui reſpicit terram, & facit eam tremere: qui tangit montes & fumigant: That is: (Which) ſaieth vpon the earth, and maketh it to tremble; (which) toucheth the hils, and they ſmoke, &c. Moreouer, it is mentioned in hiſtories of the ſaid king, that a little after William king of Scots with his armie had made a rode into the realme, he returning out of Normandie into England, came firſt to Canturburie, who by the waies ſide ſone as hee came to the ſight of Beckets church, lighting off his horſe and putting off his ſhoes went barefoot to his tombe, whoſe ſteps were found bloudy through the roughneſſe of the ſtones. And not only that, but alſo receiued further penance by euery monke of the cloiſter certaine diſcipline of a rod. By which ſo great deiection of the king (if it were true) thou maieſt ſee the blind and lamentable ſuperſtition and ignorance of thoſe dates. If it were pretended (as might ſo bee in time of warre) to get the hearts of the people) yet maieſt thou learned reader ſee what flaurie kings and princes were brought into at that time vnder the popes clergie. The ſame yeare (as Houeden writeth) which was 1174, the whole citie of Canturburie was almoſt all conſumed with fire, and the ſaid miniſter church cleane burnt.

The next yeare inſuing, which was 1175, a conuocation of biſhops was holden at Weſtminſter by Richard archbiſhop of Canturburie. In which conuenticle all the biſhops and abbats of the prouince of Canturburie and of Yorke being preſent, determined (as it had done a little before in the daies of king Henrie the firſt. Anno 1123.) about the obedience that Yorke ſhould do to Canturburie: that is, whether the archbiſhop of Yorke might beare his croſſe in the dioceſſe of Canturburie or not, whereof ſome thing was touched before in the former proceſſe of this hiſtorie. Alſo about the biſhoprike of Lincolne, of Chicheſter, of Worceſter, and of Herford, whether theſe churches were vnder the iuriſdiction of the ſee of Yorke or not, &c. Vpon theſe and other like matters roſe ſuch controuerſie betweene theſe two ſees, that the one appealed the other to the preſence of the biſhop of Rome.

Anno 1175. Controuerſie betweene the ſee of Canturburie and the ſee of Yorke.

Archbiſhop of Yorke appealeth the archbiſhop of Canturburie immediately to the biſhop of Rome.

In theſe and ſuch like cauſes, how much better had it been if the ſupremacie had remained more intire in the kings hands at home, whereby not only much labor and trauell had been ſaued, but alſo the great and vnaſſful expenſes beſtowed at Rome might with much more fruit and thanke haue been conuerted to the reares and ſtocks committed vnto them, and alſo perceaſe their cauſe no leſſe indifferently heard, at leaſt more ſpeedilie might haue been decided. But to the purpoſe againe. In this controuerſie diuers of the biſhop of Yorks clergie, ſuch as were of Gloceſter, belonging to the church of S. Oſwald, were excommunicate by the archbiſhop of Canturburie, becauſe they being ſummoned, refuſed to appeare before him, &c. At length the ſame yere, which was 1175, there was a cardinall ſent downe from Rome by the kings procurement, who trauailed to ſet a peace betweene the two archbiſhops. Whereupon this way of agreement was taken (by the meanes of the king) at Wincheſter, that as touching the church of S. Oſwald at Gloceſter, the archbiſhop of Canturburie ſhould ceaſe off his claime thereof, inaſmuch as the ſee of Yorke no more therein ſhould abſolute againe the clerkes thereof whom hee had excommunicated before. And as concerning the bearing of the croſſe and all other matters, it was referred to the archbiſhop of Rothomage, and of other biſhops in France: ſo that for fiue yeares a league or truce was taken betwixt them, till they ſhould haue a full determination of their cauſe.

The clerks of S. Oſwalds in Gloceſter excommunicated.

Matters of ſtate diuided into 60 ſix circuites.

The next yeare following, the foreſaid king Henrie the ſecond (diuiding the realme of England into ſix parts) ordeined vpon euery part three iuſtices of aſſiſe. The circuit or limitation of which iuſtices was thus diſpoſed. The firſt vpon Northfolke, Suffolke, Cantebrigſhire, Huntingdonſhire, Bedfordſhire, Buckinghamſhire, Eſſex, Hertfordſhire. Two vpon Lincolneſhire, Notinghamſhire, Darbiſhire, Staffordſhire, Warwikeſhire, Northamptonſhire, Leiceſterſhire. Three vpon Kent, Surrey, Southamptonſhire, Southſax, Barkeſhire, Oxfordſhire. Foure vpon Herefordſhire, Glocetterſhire, Worceſterſhire, Saloppſhire. Five vpon Wiltſhire, Dorſetſhire, Sommerſetſhire, Deuonſhire, Cornewall. Six vpon Euerwichſhire, Richmondſhire, Lancaſter, Copland, Weſtmerland, Northumberland, Cumberland.

In the which yeare alſo Richard archbiſhop of Canturburie made three archdeacons in his dioceſſe, whereas before there was but one. About which time alſo it was granted by the king to the popes legat, that a clerke ſhould not bee called before a temporall iudge, except for offence in the foreſt, or for his lay fee that he holdeth.

Ex epiſtolis Matth. Paris, & aliarum hiſtoriarum.

A ſeditious contention betweene the archbiſhop and the abbat of Canturburie. Whereof was here the place of the goſpell: for that with be reaſon ariſen amongſt ſouldes him to be an vnderling to others?

Item, that no archbiſhoprike, biſhoprike, or abbey ſhould remaine in the kings hands aboue one yeare without great cauſe. It chanced the ſame yeare that this was done, there was at Canturburie one elected to be abbat in the houſe of S. Auſtin named Albert, who made great labor and ſute vnto the archbiſhop that hee would come to his church, and there conſecrate him abbat of S. Auſtins. To whom the archbiſhop ſent word againe, that he was not bound to come to him, but rather the other ſhould repaire to the metropolitan church of Canturburie, there to receiue his conſecration. Whereupon (controuerſie riſing betweene them) the foreſaid new elect appealed vp to the audience of the pope, and ſo laboured vp himſelfe to Rome. Where he ſo handled the matter (by what meanes I cannot tell, vnleſſe with his golden bottell, wherewith he quenched the popes thirſtie ſoule, for abbats neuer trauell lightly without fat purſes to Rome) that with ſhort diſpatch hee procured letters from Alexander the pope, to Roger biſhop of Worceſter, ſignifying to him, that he had giuen in charge and commandement to the archbiſhop of Canturburie (in the behalfe of his deare ſonne Albert) that hee ſhould conſecrate him within his owne monaſterie (which monaſterie properly and ſoly without mediation belonged to the iuriſdiction of Rome, and ſo likewiſe ſhould doe to his ſucceſſors after him, without any creation of obedience of them. Which thing further hee had, if the archbiſhop would refuſe to doe, within the terme appointed, that then he the foreſaid biſhop of Worceſter ſhould (by the authoritie committed vnto him) execute the ſame, all maner of appellation or other decree whatſoeuer ſhould come, notwithſtanding. This letter being obtained, the abbat that would be, returneth home, ſuppoſing with himſelfe all things to be ſure. The archbiſhop vnderſtanding the cauſe, and ſeeing himſelfe ſo ſtraitly charged, and yet loth to yeeld and ſtoope to the abbat, take to him police where authoritie would not ſerue: and both to ſaue himſelfe, and yet to diſappoint the abbat, he watcheth a time when the abbat was about buſineſſe of his houſe. And comming the ſame time to the monaſterie, as hee was commanded to doe, with all things appointed, that to ſuch a buſineſſe appertained, called for the abbat, pretending no leſſe but to giue him his conſecration. The abbat being called for, was not at home: the archbiſhop fayning himſelfe not a little grieued at his labor and good will to him, departed; as one in whom no readie diligence was lacking, if in caſe that the abbat had been at home. Whereupon the abbat being thus diſappointed, taas faine to fill his filthie flagons afreſh, and make a new courſe to Rome to his father the pope, of whom hee receiued his conſecration, and ſo came home againe, with as much wit as he went forth, but not with ſo much money peraduenture as he went withall.

The letter of pope Alexander, ſent to Roger archbiſhop of Yorke, and to the biſhop of Dureſme.

ALexander ſeruant of the ſeruants of God, to his reuerend brethren Roger archbiſhop of Yorke, and Hugh biſhop of Dureſme greeting, and apoſtolicall bleſſing. The obſequie and ſeruice of your kind deuotion, which hitherto you are knowne to

We haue declared a little afore touching the acts and doings of this pope Alexander the third, how hee had brought the emperors head vnder his foot in S. Parks church at Venice: at which time and place peace was concluded, and a compoſition made betweene the pope and the ſaid Frederike the emperor. Which pacification Rogerus Houedenus, and Cauſarius Gisbergenſis, referre to this time, being the yeare of our Lord 1177, bringing in two ſeuerall letters ſent from the ſaid pope to Richard archbiſhop of Canturburie, and to Roger archbiſhop of Yorke, and Hugh biſhop of Dureſme. Out of the which letters, ſo much as ſerueth to our purpoſe, I haue taken and here inſerted.

to haue giuen both deuoutly and laudablie to vs and to the church, requireth that we ſhould deſcribe to you as to our ſpeciall friends, the proſperous ſucceſſe of the church, and to let you know as ſpirituall children of the church what hath happened to the ſame. For meet it is, conuenient, and alſo honeſt, that you whom we haue had ſo firme and ſure in our deuotion, ſhould now be cheriſhed and made ioyous in the proſperitie of vs and of the church. And about the end of the epiſtle it followeth thus:

The next day following, which was the feaſt of S. Iames (the ſaid emperor ſo requelting) we came to the foreſaid church of S. Marke, there to celebrate our ſolemne maſſe; where (as we were comming in the way) the ſaid emperor met vs without the church, and placing vs againe on his right hand, hee brought vs ſo into the ſaid church. After the maſſe was done placing vs againe on his right hand, hee brought vs to the church dore. And moreouer, when we ſhould take our paſſage, he held our ſtirrup, exhibiting to vs ſuch honour and reuerence as his progenitors were wont to exhibit to our predeceſſors. Wherefore thefe ſhal be to incite your diligence and ſtudie towards vs, that you reioyce with vs and the church in theſe our proſperous ſucceſſes, and alſo that you ſhall open the ſame effect of peace to other deuout children of the church: that ſuch as be touched with the zeale of the houſe of the Lord, may congratulate and reioyce alſo in the Lord for the great working of peace which hee hath giuen. Giuen at Veniſce in the deepe riuer, the ſix and twentith of Iulie.

The emperor holdeth the popes ſtirrup.

This yere the contention reuiued againe ſpoken of a little before, betweene the two archbiſhops of Yorke and Canturburie, the occaſion whereof was this: The maner and practiſe of the pope is, when he beginneth to lacke money, he ſendeth ſome limiting cardinall abyde to fetch his harueſt in. So there came this yeare into England (as lightly few peers were without them) a certaine cardinall from Rome, called Hugo, or as Houedenus nameth him, Hugezim, who would needs keepe a counſell at Weſtminſter. To this counſell reſorted a great confluence (about middle of Lent) of biſhops, abbats, priors, doctors, and ſuch others of the clergie. As euery one was there placed in his order, and after his degree, firſt commeth the archbiſhop of Yorke named Roger, who (thinking to preuent the other archbiſhop) came ſomething ſooner, and ſtraightway placed himſelfe on the right hand of the cardinall. Richard the archbiſhop of Canturburie following ſhortly after, and ſeeing the firſt place taken by, refuſeth to take the ſecond, complaining of the archbiſhop of Yorke, as one prejudicial to his ſee. So while the one would not riſe, and the other part not ſit downe, roſe no ſmall contention betweene them two. The archbiſhop of Canturburie claimed the vpper ſeat by the preheminence of his church. Contrarie, the archbiſhop of Yorke alleaged for him the old decree of Gregorie, whereof mention is made before. By which this order was taken betweene the two metropolitans of Canturburie and Yorke, that which of them two ſhould bee firſt in election, hee ſhould haue the preheminence in dignitie, to go before the other. Thus they contending to and fro, waxed ſo warme in words, that at laſt they turned to hote blowes. How ſtrong the archbiſhop of Yorke was in reaſon and argument I cannot tell, but the archbiſhop of Canturburie was ſtronger at the armes end: whoſe ſeruants being more in number, like valiant men) not ſuffering their maſter to take ſuch a foile, ſo preuailed againſt Yorke, ſitting on the right hand of the cardinall) that they pluckt him downe from the hand to the ſeat of the cardinal vpon the ground, treading and trampling vpon him with their feet, that narrowlie it was hee eſcaped with life. His calle, chimer, and rochet were all to bee rent and ſome from his backe. Here no reaſon would take place, no debating would ſerue, no praying could bee heard, ſuch clamor and tumult was there in the houſe among them, much like to the tumult which Virgil deſcribeth.

Contention betweene two archbiſhops who ſhould ſit on the right hand of the cardinall.

The tenor of the popes letter to the biſhop of Worceſter.

Ac veluti in magno populo, cùm ſæpe coorta eſt
Seditio, fæuſque animis ignobile vulgus,
Iamque faces & ſaxa volant, furor arma miniſtrat:

Now as the firſt part of this deſcription doth well agree, ſo ſome peraduenture will take againe, that according to the latter part alſo of the ſame, my lord cardinall with ſagenelle and grauitie (after the maner of the old Romans ſtanding by) ſhould haue ceaſed and allaied the diſturbance, according to that which followeth in the poet:

Tum pietate grauem meritis ſi forte virum quem
Conſpexere, ſilent, arrectiſque auribus aſtant:
Ille regit menes dictis, & pectora mulcet, &c.

But what did the noble Roman cardinal? Like a pretty man of his hands (but a prettier man of his feet) ſtanding vp in the midſt, and ſeeing the houſe in ſuch a broile, committed himſelfe to flight, and (as Houedenus writeth) Abſcondit ſe à facie illorum. The next day after, the archbiſhop of Yorke bringeth to the cardinall his rochet, to beare witneſſe what inturie and violence he had ſuſtained, appealing and citing vp the archbiſhop of Canturburie with certaine of his men to the biſhop of Rome. And thus the holy counſell (the ſame day it was begun) brake vp and was diſſolued.

Vnder the reigne of this king Henrie the ſecond, the dominion and crowne of England extended ſo far as hath not been ſeene in this realme before him, whom hiſtories record to poſſeſſe vnder his rule and iuriſdiction: firſt, Scotland, to whom William king of Scots, with all the lords temporall and ſpirituall did homage both for them and for their ſucceſſors (the ſcale thereof remaineth in the kings treaſurie) as alſo Ireland, England, Normandie, Aquitan, Gant, &c. to the mountaines of Pirenee, which be in the vttermoſt part of the great ocean in the Weſtrill ſea, being alſo protector of France, to whom Philip the French king yeelded both himſelfe and his realme wholly to his gouernance, in the yeare of our Lord 1181. Moreouer, he was offered alſo to be the king of Ieruſalem by the parte arch and maiſter of the hoſpitall there: who then being diſtreſſed by the Soldan, brought him the keyes of their citie deſiring his aide againſt the infidels: which offer he then refuſed, alleaging the great charge which he had at home, and the rebellion of his ſonnes, which might happen in his abſence.

The large dominion of king Henrie the ſecond.

Homage of Scotland in part of inheritance.

King Henrie the ſecond protector of France.

King Henrie refuſeth the kingdome of Ieruſalem and refuſed it.

¶ And here the old hiſtories find a great fault with the king for his refuſall, declaring that to bee the cauſe of Gods plagues, which after inſued vpon him by his children, as the patriarch (in his oration, being offended with the king) prophecied ſhould ſo happen to him for the ſame cauſe. Which ſtorie if it be true, it may be a leſſon to good princes, not to denie their neceſſarie helpe to their diſtreſſed neighbors, eſpecially the cauſe appertaining vnto God.

Ad not to be denied to one neighbour, the cauſe being godly.

Ex Polychro. Ex Geraldo Cambrenſi.

The wiſdome, diſcretion, manhood, and riches of this prince was ſo ſpread and renowned from all quarters, that meſſages came fro Emmanuel emperor of Conſtantinople, Frederike emperor of Rome, and William archbiſhop of Treuers in Almaine, the duke of Saxon, and from the earle of Flanders, and alſo from the French king, vpon determination of great queſtions and ſtrifes, to alle counſell and determination thereof of this king Henrie, as of one of moſt wiſe and ſcholemaiſter of all wiſedome and iuſtice, to haue ſolution of their queſtions and doubts. Moreouer, Alphonſus king of Caſtile, and Sancius king of Nauerne, being in ſtrife for certaine caſtles and other poſſeſſions, ſubmitted them (of their free accord) and by their oth to abide the award of this king Henrie, who made award and pleaſed them both: whereby it is to bee preſuppoſed that this king, to whom other princes did ſo reſort, as to their arbiter and deciſer, did not attend either to ſwar oth or bleſions ſtuing. Wherefore it may ſeeme the acts of this prince not to be ſo vicious as ſome monſtilly writers doe deſcribe.

King Henrie choſen arbiters by two kings.

Among many other things in this king memorable, this one is to be noted, follow it who can, that he reigning fiue and thirtie yeares, and hauing ſuch wars with his enemies, yet neuer vpon his ſubiects put any tribute or tar, nor yet vpon the ſpirituaſtie, firſt fruits and appropriations of benefices. Beſides they were not knowne, or elſe not vſed. And yet his treaſure after his death (weighed by king Richard his ſonne) amounted to aboue nine hundred thouſand pounds, beſides iewels, pretious ſtones, and houſhold furniture. Of the which ſubſtance eleuen thouſand pounds came to him by the death of Roger archbiſhop of Yorke, who had procured a bull of the pope, that if any prieſt died within his prouince without teſtament, then he ſhould haue all his goods. And ſhortly after the archbiſhop died, and the king had all his goods, which extended (as is ſaid) to eleuen thouſand pounds beſides plate, in the yeare of our Lord God 1181.

The treaſure of king Henrie the ſecond.

A courteous archbiſhop.

But as there is no felicitie or wealth in this mortall world ſo perfect, which is not darkened with ſome cloud of incumbrance and diſcurſie: ſo it happened to this king, that among his other princely ſucceſſors, this incommoditie followed him withall, that his ſonnes rebelled and ſtod in armour againſt him, taking the part of the French king, againſt their father. Firſt, at the coronation of Henrie his ſonne, whom the father toyned with him as king, he being both father and king, take vpon him (that notwithſtanding) as but a ſeruant, and ſet downe the firſt diſh as ſeiner vnto his ſonne, renouncing the name of a king. At what time the foreſaid archbiſhop of Yorke, ſitting on the right hand of the yong king, ſaid: Sir, yee haue great cauſe this day to toy, for there is no prince in the world that hath ſuch an officer this day, &c. And the yong king diſdaining his words, ſaid: My father is not diſhonoured in this doing, for I am a king and a quenes ſonne, and ſo is not he: and not onely this, but after he alſo perſecuted his father; and ſo in his youth when he had raigned but a few yeares, died: teaching vs what is the price and reward of breaking the truſt commandement of God.

Ouid. de Metamorph.

After him likewiſe Richard his ſonne (who was called Richard coeur de lion) rebelled againſt his father, and alſo John his yongeſt ſonne did not much degenerate from the ſteps of his brethren. Inſomuch that this foreſaid Richard (like an vnkind child, perſecuting and taking part againſt his father) brought him to ſuch diſtreſſe of body and mind, that for thought of heart he fell into an ague, and within foure daies departed, after he had reigned fiue and thirtie yeares: whoſe corps as it was caried to be buried, Richard his ſonne comming by the way and meeting it, and beginning to compaſſion to weepe, the blood ryall incontinent out of the nose of the king at the comming of his sonne; giuing thereby a certaine demonstration how he was the onely author of his death.

After the death and reigne of which king, his children after him worthily rewarded for their vnnaturalnesse against their father, lacking the successe which their father had, lost all beyond the sea that their father had got before.

And thus much concerning the reigne of Henrie the second, and the death of Thomas Becket, whose death (as is aforesaid) happened in the daies of pope Alexander the third, which pope blurping the keyes of ecclesiasticall regiment one and twentie yeares, or as Gisburnensis writeth, three and twentie yeares, gouerned the church with much tumult: striuing and contending with Frederike the emperor, not shaming like a most proud Lucifer to tread with his foot vpon the necke of the said emperor, as is aboue described.

This pope among many other his acts had certaine councels (as is partly before touched) some in France, some at Rome in Lateran, by whom it was decreed, that no archbishop should receiue the pall, vnlesse he should first sweare. Concerning the solemnitie of which pall, for the order and maner of giuing and taking the same with obedience to the pope, as it is contained in their owne words: I thought it good to set it forth vnto thee, that thou maiest well consider and vnderstand their doings therein.

The forme and maner how and by what words the pope is wont to giue the pall vnto the archbishop.

Giuing of the pall.

AD honorem omnipotentis Dei, & beate Marie virginis, & beatorum Petri & Pauli, & domini nostri N. pape, & sancte Romane ecclesie, necnon N. ecclesie tibi commisse, tradimus tibi pallium de corpore beati Petri sumptum, plenitudinem pontificalis officij, vt vsuris eo infra ecclesiam tuam certis diebus, qui exprimuntur in priuilegijs tibi ab apostolica sede concessis.

That is in English.

To the honor of almightie God, and of blessed Marie the virgin, and of blessed S. Peter and Paul, and of our lord pope N. and of the holy church of Rome, and also of the church of N. committed to your charge, we giue to you the pall taken from the body of S. Peter, as a fulnesse of the office pontificall, which you may weare within your owne church vpon certaine daies, which bee expressed in the priuiledges of the said church, granted by the see apostolike.

Notes vpon the same.

¶ To the honor, &c. With what confidence durst the pope couple the honor of almightie God, and the honor of Mary, of S. Peter, and of the pope, and of the Romish church all togither, if he had not been a presumptuous Lucifer, equalling himselfe not only with such saints, but also euen with him which is God alone, to be blessed for euer?

Taken from the bodie, &c. If S. Peters bodie be not all consumed, let him shew it if he can. If he cannot shew it, how then is this pall taken from the bodie of S. Peter? Or if he meane it to be of S. Peters owne wearing, then belike S. Peter had a goodly wardrope of palls, when euery archbishop in all christendome receiueth from the pope a diuers pall.

As a fulnesse of the office, &c. Rather he might say, the fulnesse of his owne purse, when as archbishops paid so sweetly for it. Insomuch that Iacobus the archbishop of Mentz, as is about touched a little before in the councell of Basil, where the price was wont to be but a thousand florens, could not obtaine it without six and twentie thousand florens.

Vpon certaine daies, &c. This difference there was between the pope and other archbishops: for the pope might were the pall at all times and in all places at his pleasure. Archbishops might not weare it but vpon certaine daies, and in their church onely within their prouince. Moreouer this pall should not be asked but with great instance, and within three months, without which pall he is not to be named archbishop, but may be deposed, hauing it not after three monethes and the same pall must also be buried with him when he dieth; and when it is giuen, some priuiledge must be giuen withall, or the old reuoked.

In like maner proceedeth the oth of euery bishop swearing obedience to the pope, in like words as followeth.

The solemne oth of bishops made to the pope.

FIo. N. episcopus N. ab hac hora in antea fidelis & obediens ero beato Petro, sanctæque apostolicæ Romanæ ecclesiæ, & domino meo D.N. pape, sanctæque successoribus canonice intrantibus. Non ero in consilio, vel facto, aut vllo auxilio, consensu, vel facto, aut vitam perdent, aut membrum, seu capiantur mala captione. Consilium vero quod mihi credendum fuerit per se aut per nuncium, seu literas eorum, me sciente nemini prodam. Papatum Romanum & regalia S. Petri adiutor eis ero ad retinendum & defendendum salvo meo ordine, contra omnem hominem. Legatum apostolicæ sedis in eundo & redeundo honorifice tractabo, & in suis necessitatibus adiuuabo. Vocatus ad synodum veniam, nisi prapeditus fuero canonica præpeditione. Apostolorum limina singulis triennijs visitabo, Saluo meo ord. it is as the archbishop of Mentz & Treuer did when they were to be depriued and to be slain.

That is in english.

I N. bishop of N. from this houre hence forth, will be faithfull and obedient to blessed S. Peter, and to the holy apostolike church of Rome, and to my lord N. the pope. I shall bee in no counsell, no; helpe either with my consent or deed, whereby either of them or any member of them may be impaired, or hurt: by them may be taken with any euill taking. The counsell which they shall commit to me either by themselues or by my messenger, or by their letters, wittingly or willingly I shall vtter to none to their hinderance and damage. To the retaining and maintaining the papacie of Rome, and the regalities of S. Peter, I shall be an aider (so mine order be saued) against all persons. The legat of the apostolike see both in going and comming I shall honourablie intreate and helpe in all necessities. Being called to a synod I shall be readie to come, vnlesse I bee let by some lawfull and canonicall impeachment. The palace of the apostles euery third yeare I shall visit either by my selfe or my messenger, except otherwise being licensed by the see apostolike. All such possessions as belong to the table and diet of my bishoprike, I shall neither sell, nor giue, nor lay to mortgage, nor lease out, or remoue away by any maner of meanes without the consent and knowledge of the bishop of Rome: so God helpe me and the holy gospels of God.

And how he vseth those that pertured, which at the death of M. Marie, sit and see out a great part of their possessions taken from them successe.

A note vpon the same.

¶ Hereby thou hast by the way (gentle reader) to note and consider, among other things which here may bee vnderstood, that since the time the oth began to be laid and thrust vpon bishops, all generall councels began to lose their liberte. For how could any freedome remaine for men to speake their knowledge in redresse of things, being by their oth so bound to the pope to speake nothing but on his side, to maintaine the papacie and the church of Rome in all times and places? Coniecture by thy selfe (christian reader) what is more hereby to bee considered.

BEsides this it was also decreed in the said councell at Rome of 210 bishops by pope Alexander, that no man should haue any spirituall promotion, except hee were of lawfull age, and borne in wedlocke. That no parish church should be void aboue six moneths. That none within orders should meddle with temporall businesse. That priests should haue but one benefice, and that the bishop should be charged to find the priest a liuing till he be promoted.

That open diuers should not communicate at Easter, nor be buried within the church-yard.

That nothing should be taken for; ministring sacraments, or burying.

Item, that euery cathedrall church should haue a maister to teach children freely, without taking any thing for the same.

The bishopt of Waldenses or Albingenses.

In this councell the vow of chastitie was abrogated and laid vpon priests. Thomas Becket also and Bernard were canonized for saints.

The vow of chastitie laid vpon priests.

During the reigne and time of this king Henry the second, the citie of Norwich was destroyed and burnt by the men of Flanders. Also the towne of Leicester. Nottingham walled and the burgesses slaine by the earle of Ferrers. The towne of Warwicke destroyed by the Scots. The king of Scots was taken in war by Englishmen in the yeer of our Lord 1174. The towne of Huntington taken and burned. The towne of Canturburie by casualtie of fire burnt with all the churches, specially with the Trinitie church where Becket was worshipped. An. cod. The yeare of our Lord 1170. William king of Scots with Dauid his brother and all the barons of the realme did homage to the king of England. Ireland made subiect to England. Decreed in a councell in Normandie, that no popes or children should possesse any benefice. A councell of Lateran was holden at Rome, where were three and thirtie articles concluded. An. 1179. The French king came in pilgrimage to Tho. Becket, the king of England meeting him by the way. An. 1184. After the death of Richard archbishop of Canturburie, who followed after Tho. Becket, succeeded Baldwinus, who of a Cistercian monke being made a bishop, is said neuer to eate flesh in his life. To whom a certaine poore woman, bare & leane, meeting him in Ffrance, desired to know of him whether it were true that was said of him, that he neuer did eate flesh. Which thing when he had affirmed to be true: Nay (saith she) that is false, for you haue eaten my flesh vnto the bone: for I had but one cow wherewith I was sustained, & that haue your deanes taken from me. True, true, said the bishop, and then shalt haue another cow as good as that, &c. Iornalensi.

Baldwinus archbishop of Canturburie.

Moreouer, in the reigne of the said king Henrie, about the yeare of our Lord 1178. I find in the storie of Roger Houeden and others, that in the citie of Tholouse was a great multitude of men and women whom the popes commissioners, to wit, Peter cardinall of saint Chrysogon, and the popes legat, with with the archbishops of Narbon and Biturience, Reginald bishop of Bathe, John bishop of Pitcania, Henrie abbat Clarevallensis, &c. did persecute and condemne for heretikes; of whom some were scourged naked, some chased away, some compelled to abiure. Concerning whose articles and opinions I haue no sirme ground to make any certaine relation, for so much as I see the papists many times so false in their quarelling accusations, intrusely collecting mens sayings not as they ment, and meaning not as they said: but working and deprauing simple mens affections after such a subtill sort as they list themselues to take them. But this I find, how one of the said commissioners or inquisitors (Henrie the abbat) in a certaine letter of his wrote thus of them: Nam & panem sanctum vitæ æternæ facerdotis ministerio in verbo Domini consecratum non esse corpus Domini, nouo dogmate contendebat asserere. That is: after a new opinion hee affirmed, that the holy bread of eternall life, consecrated by the ministerie of the priest, was not the body of the Lord, &c.

The true nature of antichrist, in what humilitie to further the worke, vnto the ouerthrow of others.

In the time of this Alexander sprang vp the doctrine and name of them which were then called Pauperes de Lugduno, which of one Waldus a chiefe senator in Lions, were named Waldenses; Item Leonistæ & Insabbatati: about the yeare of our Lord 1109. or (as Lazarus writeth) An. 1170.

Not long before this time (as is expressed aboue) rose vp Gratianus master of the decrees, and Petrus Lombardus master of the sentences, both archpillers of al papistrie; after whom followed also two as euill, or lw se then they, Franciscus and Dominicus, maintaining blind hypocrisie no lesse then the other maintained proud pelacie. As these laboured one way by superstition and worldly aduancement to corrupt the sincerity of christian religion: so it pleased Christ the contrarie way labouring against these, to raise vp therefore the said Waldenses, against the pride and hypocrisie of the others.

Thus we neuer see any great corruption in the church, but that some sparkle of the true and cleare light of the gospell set by Gods prouidence doth remaine, whatsoeuer doctor Augustinus, Remerius, Syluius, Cranzius, with others in their popish histories do write of them (defaming them through misreport) and accusing them to magistrats, as disobedient to orders, rebels to the catholike church, and contemners of the virgin Mary: yet they that carie iudgement indifferent, rather trusting truth then wauering with times, in weighing their articles, shall find it otherwise: that they maintained nothing else but the same doctrine which is now defended in the church. And yet I suppose not contrarie, but as they did with the articles of Wickliffe and Hus, so the papists did in like maner with their articles also, in gathering and wresting them otherwise then they were ment.

The historie of the Waldenses, concerning their ori- ginall and doctrine, with their persecutions.

The bishopt of Waldenses or Albingenses.

THe first originall of these Waldenses came of one Waldus, a man both of great substance, and no lesse calling in the citie of Lions: the occasion whereof is declared of diuers writers thus to come: About the yeare of our Lord 1160, it chanced that diuers of the best and chiefest heads of the citie of Lions, talking and walking in a certaine place after their old accustomed maner, especially in the summer time, conferred and consulted togither vpon matters, either to passe ouer time, or to debate things to be done. Amongst whom it chanced one (the rest looking vpon) to fall downe by hidden death. In the number of whom this foresaid Waldus there being amongst them was one, who beholding the matter more earnestly then the other, and terrified with so heauie an example, being (as is said) a rich man, and Gods holy spirit working withall, was stricken with a deepe and inward repentance, whereupon followed a new alteration with a carefull studie to reforme his former life. In so much that first hee began to minister large almes of his goods to such as neded. Secondly, to instruct himselfe and his familie with the true knowledge of Gods word. Thirdly, to admonish all that resorted to him by any occasion, to repentance and vertuous amendment of life. Whereby partly through his large giuing to the poore, partly through his diligent teaching and wholesome admonitions, more resort of people daily frequented about him, whom when he did see readie and diligent to learne, began to giue out to them certaine rudiments of the scripture, which he had translated himselfe into the French tongue: for as he was a man wealthie in riches, so he was also not vnlearned.

Although Lazarus, Molaterannis, with others, note him vtterly vnlearned, and charge him with ignorance, as who should procure others to write and translate for him: by others that haue seene his doings yet remaining in old parchment monuments, it appeareth he was both able to declare and translate the bookes of scripture, and also did collect the doctors mind vpon the same.

But what soeuer he was (lettered or vnlettered) the bishops and prelats seeing him so to intermeddle with scriptures, and to haue such resort about him, albeit it was but in his owne house vnder priuate conference, could not abide, either that the scriptures should be declared of any other, neither would they take the paines to declare it themselues. So being moued with great malice against the man, threatened to excommunicate him if he did not leaue so to doe. Waldus seeing his doing to be but godly, and their malice stirred vp vpon no iust no; godly cause, neglecting the threatnings and frettings of the wicked, said that God must be obeyed more then man. To be briefe, the more diligent hee was in setting forth the true doctrine of Christ against the errors of antichrist, the more maliciously their fiercenesse increased. In so much that when they did see their excommunication to be despised and would not serue, they ceased not with prison, with sword and banishment to persecute, till at length they had driuen both Waldus and all the fauourers of his true preaching out of the citie.

Whereupon came first their name, that they were called Waldenses, or Pauperes de Lugduno, not because they would haue all things common amongst them, or that they professing any wilfull pouertie, would imitate to liue as the apostles did (as Syluius did salsly belie them) but because they being thrust out both of countrie and goods, were compelled to liue poorly whether they would or no. And thus much touching the first occasion and beginning of these men, and of the restoring and maintaining of the true doctrine of Christs gospell, against the proud proceedings of popish errors. Now concerning their articles, which I find in order and in number to be these.

Concerning the supper of the Lord, their faith was, that it was ordained to be eaten, not to be shewed and worshipped: for a memoriall, not for a sacrifice; to serue for the present ministration, and not for reseruation; to be receiued at the table, not to be caried out of the doores: according to the ancient vse of the primitiue church, when they vsed to communicate sitting. And this they prone both by an old chronicle called Chronica gestorum, as also by ancient Origen vpon the third booke of Moses, bringing in his words, which be these, proouing that this sacramentall bread ought not to be reserued: Quicunque hunc panem cœna Christi, secunda vel tertia die sumpserit, non benedicitur anima eius, sed inquinabitur. Propterea Gabaonite, quia antiquos panes, &c. i. Whosoeuer receiueth this bread of supper of Christ upon the second or third day after, his soule shall not be pleased, but polluted. Therefore the Sabaonits because they brought old bread to the children of Israel, it was unsauery them to taste wood and water, &c.

Doctor Austin (of whom mention is made before) disputing against them about this matter of the holy Eucharist, giueth them such interrogation; whether it be the same Christ present in the sacrament, which is present at the right hand of the father? If it be not the same Christ, hold is it true in the scripture, Viam fides, venus Dominus noster Iesus Christus. One faith, one Lord Iesus Christ? If it be the same Christ, then how is hee not to bee honoured and worshipped here as well as there?

To this the Waldenses answere againe, and grant that Christ is one, and the same with his naturall bodie in the sacrament, which he is at the right hand of his father, but not after the same ordinance of his body. For the ordinance of his bodie in heauen is not personall and locall, to bee apprehended by the faith and spirit of men. In the sacrament the ordinance of his bodie is not personall or locall, to be apprehended or received of any bodily, after a personall or corporall manner, but after a sacramentall manner: that is, where our bodies receive the signe, and our spirit the thing signified. Moreouer, in heauen the ordinance of his bodie is dimensiue, and complet with the full proportion and quantitie of the same body wherewith bee ascended. Here perfidence of his complete body with the full proportion, measure, and stature thereof, both not, neither can stand in the sacrament. Briefly, the ordinance of his body in heauen is naturall, not sacramentall: that is, to be seene, and not remembred. Here it is sacramentall, not naturall: that is, to be remembred, not to be seene.

That answere being made to the captious proposition of D. Austin, the Waldenses (retorting the like interrogation to him againe) demand of him to answere them in the like obiection: whether it be all one Christ substantially and naturally, which sitteth in heauen, and which is vnder the formes of bread and wine, and in the receiuers of the sacrament? If hee graunt to both: then bid him say, seeing Christ is as well in the sacrament as in heauen, and as well in the receiuer as in the sacrament, and all one Christ in substance and nature; why then is not the same Christ as well in the breast of the receiuer to bee worshipped, as vnder the formes of bread and wine in the sacrament: seeing he is there after a more perfect manner in man, then in the sacrament: for in the sacrament he is but for a time, and not for the sacraments sake, but for the mans cause. In man he is not for the sacraments cause, but for his owne, and that not for a season, but for euer, as it is written: Qui manducat hunc panem viuet in æternum, that is: Hee that eateth this bread shall liue for euer, &c.

Moreouer and besides, seeing transubstantiation is the going of one substance into an other; they question against him, whether the formes of bread and wine remaining, the substance thereof be changed into the whole person of our Lord Christ Iesus: that is, both into his body, soule, and diuinitie, or not into the whole Christ? If the grant the whole, then say they, that is impossible concerning the diuinitie, both to nature and to our faith, that any creature can be changed into the creator. If he say the bread is changed into the body and soule of Christ, not to his diuinitie, then he separateth the natures in Christ. If he say into the body alone and not the soule, then hee separateth the natures of the true manhood, &c: and so cannot bee the same Christ that was betrayed for vs, for that hee had both body and soule. To conclude, to what part soeuer hee would answere, this doctrine of transubstantiation cannot bee defended without great inconuenience of all sides.

Other and besides, Genesius Sepulueda writing of their doctrine and affections (perchance as he found them, perchance making worse of them then they taught or ment) reporteth them after this maner, which I thought here to set out as it is in the Latine.

Omnium præsulem religiosis episcopis parem esse. Inter sacerdotes nullam discrimen. Presbyterum non dignitatem sed vitæ meritum efficere episcopum.

In English.

The bishop of Rome to be equall with other bishops. Amongst priests to be no difference of degree. No priest to be reputed for any dignitie of his order, but for the worthinesse of his life.

The soules of men departed, either to enter into paine euerlasting, or euerlasting ioy. No fire of purgatorie to bee found. To pray for the dead to be vaine, and a thing only found out for the lucre of priests.

The images of Gods as of the trinitie and of saints to bee abolished. The hallowing of water and palmes to bee a mere ridicle. The religion of begging friers to bee found out by the diuell. That priests should not inrech riches in this world, but rather follow pouertie, being content with their tithes, and meere deuotion. The preaching of the word to be free to al men called thereunto.

That no deadly sinne is to be tollerated, for whatsoeuer respect of a greater commoditie to insue thereupon. The confirmation which bishops exercise with oyle, and extreme vnction, are not to be counted amongst the sacraments of the church. Auricular confession to be but a toy; to suffice for euery man to confesse himselfe in his chamber to God. Baptisme ought to be ministred onely with pure water, without any mixture of hallowed oyle. The temple of the Lord to be the wide world. The maiestie of God not to be restrained more within the walls of temples, monasteries and chapels, so that his grace is rather to be found in one place then in another.

The temple of the Lord, that is, the proper habitation wherein God must properly dwell and worship. That to the place made by the ministration of holy things either more or lesse holy.

Priests apparell, ornaments of the high altar, vestiments, corporaces, chalices, patins, and other church plate, to serue in no stead. For the difference & respect of the very place, to make no matter, where the priest doth consecrate, or doth minister to them which doe require. To be sufficient to vse onely the sacramentall words without all other superfluous ceremonies.

The suffrages of saints reigning with Christ in heauen, to be craued in vaine, being not able to helpe vs. In laying or singing the houres and matins of the day, the time to bee but lost. A man ought to cease from his labor, no day, but only vpon the sunday.

The feasts and festiuals of saints ought to be reiected. Item, such fasts as be coacted and inioyned by the church, haue no merit in them.

These assertions of the Waldenses being thus articuled out by Genes Sepulue, I thought to giue them abrode in English as they are in Latine: to the intent that as they are the lesse to be doubted, being set out of a popes pen; so wee may the better know both them hereby what they were, and also vnderstand how this doctrine now preached and taught in the church, is no new doctrine, which here we see both taught and persecuted almost 400 yeares agoe. And as I haue spoken hitherto sufficiently concerning their doctrine; so now we will briefly somewhat touch of the order of their life and conuersation, as wee find it registred in a certaine old written booke of inquisition.

Ex inquisitorio quodam libello.

Modus autem Waldensium talis est, &c. The whole processe commeth to this effect in English. The maner of the Waldenses is this. They kneeling vpon their knees, leaning to some banke or stay, do continue in their prayers with silence so long as a man may say thirtie or fortie times Pater noster. And this they doe euery day with great reuerence, being amongst themselues, and such as be of their owne religion, and no strangers with them, both before dinner and after; likewise before supper and after, also what time they go to bed, and in the morning when they rise, and at certaine other times also, as well in the day as in the night. Item, they vse no other prayer but the prayer of the Lord, and that without any Aue Maria, and the creed, which they affirme not to be put in for any prayer by Christ, but onely by the church of Rome. Albeit they haue and vse the seuen articles of faith concerning the diuinitie, and seuen articles concerning the humanitie, and the ten commandements, and seuen works of mercy, which they haue compiled together in a compendious booke, glorying much in the same, and thereby offer themselues ready to answere any man for their faith.

De moribus & conuersatione Waldensium.

Before they goe to meat they haue their grace, Benedicite, Kyrie eleyson, Christe eleyson, Kyrie eleyson, Pater noster. Which being said, then the elder amongst them beginneth thus in their owne tongue: God which blessed the fiue barlie loues and two fishes in the desert before his disciples, blesse this table and that is set vpon it, as shall be set vpon it. In the name of the father, of the sonne, and of the holy ghost. Amen. And likewise againe when they rise from meate, the seruice giueth thanks, saying the words of the Apocalypse: Blessing, and worship, and wisedome, and thanksgiuing, honor, vertue, and strength to God alone for euer and euer. Amen. And addeth moreouer, God reward them in their bosomes, and bee beneficiall to all them that be beneficiall to vs, and blesse vs. And the God which hath giuen vs corporall feeding, grant vs his spirituall life, and God be with vs, and wee alwaies with him. To which they answere againe, Amen. And thus saying grace, they bold their hands vpward, looking vp to heauen. After their meate and grace said, they teach and exhort amongst themselues, conferring together vpon their doctrine, &c.

Their manner of grace before meat.

Their grace after meat.

In their doctrine and teaching they were so diligent and painefull, that Reinerius a writer about their time (an extreme enimie against them in a long processe, wherein hee describeth their doctrine and teaching; testifieth, that he heard of one which did know the partie, that a certaine heretike (latly he) onely to nurse a certaine person away from our faith, and to bring him to his: in the night and in the winter time) swam ouer the riuer called Ysis, to come to him and to teach him. Moreouer, to perfect the more them in the scriptures, that the said Reinerius saith, he did heare and see a man of the countrie whetted, which could recite ouer the whole booke of Iob word by word, without booke, with diuers others which had the whole new testament perfectly by heart.

Reinerius an old Inquisitor against Waldenses.

And although some of them rather merily then vnskilfully expounded the words of 1. Ioan. Sui non receperunt eum, Sibaite did not receiue him: yet were they not so ignorant and void of learning, nor yet so few in number, but that they did mightily mightily preuaile, in so much that Reinerius hath these words; Non erat qui eos impedire auderet propter potentiam & multitudinem fautorum suorum. Inquisitioni & examinationi sæpe interfui, & computatæ sunt 40 ecclesiæ, quæ hæresi infectæ fuerunt, ac in vna parœcia Cammach fuerunt decem eorum scholæ, &c. That is, There was none durst stop them for the power and multitude of their fauourers. I haue often beene at their inquisition and examination, and there were numbred fortie churches infected with their heresie, in so much that in one parish of Cammach, were ten open schooles of them, &c. Hæc ille.

The ordinance and multitude of Waldenses.

And the said Reinerius, when he hath said all he can in depraying and impugning them, yet is driuen to confesse this of them, where he doth distinct their sect from other sects, and hath these words: Hæc verò Leonistarum secta magnam habet speciem pietatis, eò quòd coram hominibus iustè viuant, & bene omnia de Deo credant, & omnes articulos, qui in symbolo continentur, solam Romanam ecclesiam blasphemant, & odeunt. That is: This sect of Leonists hath a great shew of holinesse, in that both they liue iustly before men, and beleeue all things well of God, and hold all the articles contained in the creed; onely they doe blaspheme the Romish church and hate it, &c.

VValdenses sic all other points found, but only for holding against the church of Rome. Ex Ordinario Gratia.

Now to touch somewhat their persecutions. After they were driuen out of Lions, they were scattered into diuers and sundry places (the prouidence of God so disposing) that the sound of their doctrine might bee heard abrode in the world. Some, as I said, went to Bohemia, many did flee into their prouinces of France, some into Lombardy, others into other places, &c. But as the crosse commonly followeth the veritie and sincere preaching of Gods word, so neither could these be suffered to liue in rest. There are yet to be seene the consultations of lawyers, archbishops, and bishops of France, as Narbonensis, Arelatensis, Aquensis, and Albanensis, deuised amongst themselues, and yet remaine in writing, for the abolishing and extirping of these Waldenses, written aboue three hundred yeres ago; whereby it appeareth that there was a great number of them in France.

The crosse commonly followeth the word.

Besides, there was a whole councell kept in Tholouse about three hundred fifty and fiue yeres before, and all against these Waldenses, the which also were condemned in another councell at Rome before that.

Waldenses persecuted more then 300 yeres ago, by antichrist.

What great persecutions were raised vp against them in France by these foure archbishops before mentioned, it appeareth by their writings, whereof I will recite some of their words, which toward the end be these; Quis enim est solus ille peregrinus, qui condemnationem harreticorum Waldensium ignoret à longe retrò annis factam, tam famosam, tam publicam, tot & tantis laboribus, expensis & sudoribus fidelium inscutam, & tot mortibus ipsorum infidelium solemniter terminatorum, publicè? punitorum tam fortiter figillatam? &c. That is, Who is such a stranger that knoweth not the condemnation of Waldenses the heretikes, done and past so many yeres agoe, so famous, so publike, followed vpon with so great labors, expences, and trauell of the faithfull, and sealed with so many deaths of these infidels, so solemnly being condemned and openly punished? Whereby wee may see persecution to be no new thing in the church of Christ, when antichrist so long before (euen 300 yeres) began to rage against these Waldenses.

Antichrist with whom he first began his persecution.

In Bohemia likewise after that, the same called by the name of Thaborites (as Sylnius recordeth) suffered no little trouble. But neuer persecution was stirred vp against them, or any other people more terrible, then was in these latter yeres in France by the French king, in the yere of our Lord one thousand fiue hundred fourty fiue, which lamentable storie is described in Sleidan, and hereafter, in the processe of his book, as we come to the order of yeres, shall bee set forth (by the grace of Christ) more at large. In the which persecution is declared in one towne Cabriera, to bee slaine by the captaine of Saphan Sincerius, eight hundred persons at once, without respect of women or children of any age, of whom fourty women, and most of them great with child, thrust into a barne, and the windowes kept with pikes, and so fire set to them, were all consumed. Besides, in a caue not far from the towne Mussium, to the number of fiue and twenty persons, with smoke and fire were the same time destroied. At Merindolum the same tyrant (seeing all the rest were fled away) finding one young man, caused him to be tied to an olive tree, and to be destroied with torments most cruelly: with much other persecution, as may appeare hereafter, in the historie translated out of Sleidane into English.

An horrible murther of Christs holy martyrs.

Minerius an horrible persecutor.

But to returne againe to higher times, from whence we digressed. Besides that, Reinerius aboue mentioned speaketh of one in the towne of Cheron, a glouer, which was brought in this time to examination, and suffered. There is also an old monument of processe, wherein appeareth foure hundred fourty and three, brought to examination in Pomerania, Marchia, and places thereabouts, about the yere of our Lord one thousand three hundred ninetie and one.

A glouer suffered martyrdom in Cheron.

443 brought to examination.

And thus much touching the origin, doctrine, and the lamentable persecutions of the Waldenses: who, as is declared, first began about the time of this king Henry the second of that name.

Great warre happened in Palestina, wherein the citie of Jerusalem with the crosse and king of the citie, and others of the temple, was taken of the Sarazens, and most part of the christians there either slaine or taken. Cruell murther and slaughter there was vsed by the Turke, who caused all the chiefe of the christians to be brought forth, and beheaded before his face. In so much, that pope Vrbanus the third so sorrowed and grieued, that Gregory the eighth, next pope after him, lined not two moneths. Then in the daies of pope Clement the third, newes and sorrow growing daily for the losse of Palestina and destruction of the christians, king Henry of England, & Philip the French king, the duke of Burgundy, the earle of Flanders, the earle of Campania, with diuers other christian princes with a generall consent, vpon Saint Georges day, take the marke of the crosse vpon them, promising together to take their voyage into the holy land. At which time, the stories say the king of England receiued first the red crosse, the French king tooke the white crosse, the earle of Flanders take the Greene crosse, and so likewise other princes diuersly diuers colours, thereby to be discerned euery one by his proper crosse. But king Henry (after the three yeres were expired, in which he promised to performe his voyage) sent to the pope to further delay of his promise, offering for the same to erect three monasteries. Which thing he thus performed. In the church of Waltham he thrust out the secular priests, and set in monks for them. Secondly, he repaired againe and brought in the nuns of Amesbury, which before were excluded for their incontinent life. And thus performed he his promise made before to the pope, An. 1173.

A worthy seruice of Sibylla and Guido in Ierusalem.

Mention was made a little aboue of Almarike king of Hierusalem, which destroied Babylon, so that it was neuer after to this day restored, but lieth waste and desolate, wherein was fulfilled that, which in the prophets in so many places was threatned to Babylon before. This Almarike had a sonne named Baldwin, and a daughter called Sibylla. Baldwin from the beginning of his raigne was a leper, and had the falling sickenesse, being not able for feblenesse of body (although valiant in heart and stomacke) to satisfie that function.

Sibylla his sister was first married to one Willermus, marquesse of mount Ferrat, by whom she had a son called also Baldwinus. After him she was married to another husband, named Guido de Lisimaco earle of Ioppe and of Ascalon. Vpon this befell, that the foresaid Baldwin the leper, sonne of Almaricus, being thus feeble and infirme, as is said, called his nobles together, with his mother the patriarche, declaring to them his inability, and by the consent of them committed the vnder-gouernment of the citie vnto Guido the husband of Sibylla his sister. But he being found insufficient, or else not lucke in the gouernement thereof: the office was translated to another named Raimundus earle of Tripolis. In the meane time, the Soldan with his Saracens mightily preuailed against the christians, and ouerran the country of Palestina, in which meane time, Baldwin the king departed. Whereby the kingdome fell next to Baldwinus, the sonne of Sibylla by her first husband Willermus; the which Baldwinus being but fiue yeres old, was put to the custody of Raimundus aforesaid. Who also in his minority, before he came to his crowne, died: whereby the next succession by descent fell to Sibylla the wife of Guido aboue mentioned. To whom the peres and nobles hauing together in counsell offred vnto the said Sibylla, as to the lawfull heire to the crowne, to be their queene, with this condition, that she should sequester from her by solemn diuorcement the foresaid Guido her husband: but she refused the kingdome offered to her on that condition, all at last the magistrats with the nobles in general, granted vnto her, and by their oths confirmed the same, that whomsoeuer shee would chuse to be her husband, all they would take and obey as their king. Also Guido her husband with like petition among the rest, humbly requested her, that the kingdom not for his false, or for his priuat lasse, might be destitute of gouernment. At length shee with teares consenting to their intreaty, was contented, and solemnly was crowned their queene, who after the maner again receiued their fidelity by their oth. Wherupon Guido without all hope both of wife and kingdome, departed home quietly to his owne. This done, the queene assembling her states and prelats together, entred talke with them about the chusing of the king, according to that which they had promised and sworne vnto her, and to obey him as their king, whom she would name to be her husband. Thus, whilest they were all in great expectation, waiting euery man whom she would nominat, the queene with a loud voice said to Guido that stood amongst them: Guido my lord, I chuse thee for my husband, and yeelding my selfe and my kingdome vnto you, openly I protest you to be the king. At these words all the assembly being amazed, wondred that one simple woman so wisely had beguiled so many wise men. And worthy was she no doubt, to be commended and extolled for her singular vertue, both of faithfull chastitie and high prudence: so tempering the matter, that both she obtained to her husband the kingdome, and retained to her selfe against her husband, whom she so faithfully loued: An. 1186. The death of K. Henry the second.

As I haue hitherto described the publike acts of king Henry, so now I meane to touch something of his priuat conditions. He was of meane stature, eloquent and learned, manly and bold in chiualry, fearefull of the mutabilitie and chance of warre, more lamenting the death of his souldiers dead, then louing them aliue; none more courteous and liberall for the obtaining of his purpose; in peace a tranquillity none more tough, stubborne against the stubborne, sometimes mercifull to those whom he had vanquished, strict to his household seruants, but liberall to strangers; publisher of publike things liberall, sparing of his owne, whom once he take a displeasure against, hardly or neuer would he receiue againe to fauo, somewhat lauish of his tongue, a willing breaker of his promise, a louer of his ease, but an oppressor of his nobilitie, a seuere reuenger and furtherer of iustice, variable of mind, and craftie in his talke, an open aduoutrer, a nourisher of discord amongst his children: moreouer, the papists bearing him, for Thomas Becket's quarrell, and such like, as may be gathered) no good will, terme him to be an aduersary of the faith, the mall and beetle of the church.

Also in the chronicle intituled Scala mundi, I finde of him, that he followeth the steps, manners, and conditions of Henry the first his grandfather, in euery point. He preferred firme peace, and executed strict iustice through all his dominions. He loued marcellous well his forrests: and against, those that were transgressors either to his crowne or person, he most seuerely punished.

A Iew through feare was baptised.

Moreouer, in a certaine history intituled De regibus Anglie, I find that this king was sundry times admonished to reforme and amend his life, and first by one that was an old man in the castell of Cardif in Wales, at that time of the yere called Dominica in albis, the eighth day after Easter: where also after that he had heard masse, and was going to take his horse, there stood a certaine man by him, somewhat pellofthy (his haire being rounded, leane and illfauored) hauing on a white roie, and being barefoot, looked vpon the king, and spake on this wise: God aid king: (that done, thus he proceeded:) the king saluteth you and his blessed mother, Iohn Baptist, and Peter, straitly charging you, that vpon the sundaies throughout all your dominions there be no buying and selling or other seruile businesse (those only except which appertaine to the preparation of meat and drinke: which thing if thou shalt obserue, whatsoeuer thou shalt take in hand, thou shalt happily finish and bring to pass. Then spake the king in French vnto the knight that held his horse by the bridle: Alke of this churle whether he beareth this or not. And in the meane while that the knight should haue interpreted the kings words and message, he spake before and said: Whether this be a dreame or not, marke well what day this is, for vnlesse that thou do these things and amend thy life, such newes shalt thou heare within these twelue months, that will make thee lament and mourne till thy dying day. And when these words were spoken, the man vanished out of his sight: and within one yeere next after, Henry, Geffrey, and Richard his sonnes, forsooke him their father, and take part with the French king. The king also Geffrey, the earle of Chester, and earle of Leicester, made an insurrection against the king. Many other premonitions were giuen also to the king, but all these did he little esteeme. The second which did admonish him, was a certaine Irishman, giuing him certaine secret signes. And thirdly, a certaine knight of Fridesele, named Philip de Sakerbie, sailing with him ouer into France, declared vnto the king in Normandy seuen articles, which he should amend. Which thing if he would doe, hee should raigne seuen yeres most honorably, and should take the holy crosse from his enemies: or else he, in the fourth yeere should dies a great ignominie. The three first things were these, which he at his coronation sware sware to obserue, that is, to defend the church, to maintain good lawes, and to condemne no man to death without iudgement. The fourth was, for the restoring of inheritance wrongfully taken: the fifth was in doing iustice without reward: the sixth was of ministers and officers wages and stipends: the seuenth was of expelling the Iewes, leauing them some money to depart withall. But the king not amending his life, there rose vp against him three strong enemies; that is to say, his three sons with the French king. But after that, the king following had gone on pilgrimage to the martyrs tombe barefoot, William king of Scots, and the earles of Chester and Leicester were taken at Alnewike.

In the fine and thirtith yere of his raigne, being in the castell of Chinon in Normandy, he died; at whose death those that were present were so greedy of the spoile, that they left the body of the king naked, and not so much could be found as a cloth to couer it, till that a page comming in, and seeing the king so ignominiously to lie, threw his cloke vpon his nether parts: whereupon (saith the author) was verified the surname which from his youth he bare, being called Henry Court mantill.

King Richard.

Anno 1189. King Richard crowned.

IN this yere of the Lord aboue recited, which was 1189, king Richard the eldest sonne of Henry the second succeeding his father, entred his crowne: at which time pope Clement sat at Rome, succeeding after Gregory, which died a little before with sorrow for the losse of the holy crosse.

The kings receiuing of his treasure.

During the time of whole coronation it befell, that notwithstanding the king the day before his coronation, and by publike edict commanded both the Iewes and their wiues not to presume either to enter the church, or else his palace, during the solemnization of his coronation amongst his nobles and bishop of Durham bought the lordship of Seggefield, of Sedberge with the wapentake, and all the appurtenance thereto belonging: he bought also the earldome of Northumberland; whom when the king should solemnize after the maner of secular earles, merily with a mocking iest. Then the king sent his writs to the shiriffes of seuery country, to inquire for the authors and firrers of this outrage. Of whom three were hanged, diuers were imprisoned. So great was their the hatred of Englishmen against the Iewes, that as soone as they began to be repulsed in the court, the Londoners taking example thereof, fell vpon them, set their houses on fire, and spoiled their goods. The country againe, following the example of the Londoners, semblably did the like. And thus the yere which the Iewes tooke to be their while, was to them a yere of confusion: in so much, as in the citie of Yorke, the Iewes obtaining the occupying of a certaine castell for their preseruation, and afterward not willing to restore it vnto the christians againe, when they saw no other remedy but by force to be banquished, first they offered much mony for their liues; when that would not be taken, by the counsell of an old Iew amongst them, euery one with a sharpe rasor cut another's throte, vnlesse by a thousand and fiue hundred of them were at that present destroied. Neither was this plague of theirs vnderserued; for euery yere commonly their custome was to get some christian mans child from the parents, and on Good friday to crucifie him in despite of our religion. such a person to be archbishop, &c. Or else thus; that the prior should pronounce forth the election in these words, saying: The bishops of England, and I prior, and the couent of Canturburie, with the assent of our lord and king, doe chuse such a person, &c.

Upon this, the prior said hee would consent with his couent. Who with much adoo were content to grant to the kings desire; but afterward being required to put downe the same in writing, that they refused to doe: yet notwithstanding relented at last to the king. But when the bishops made excuses for the absence of their fellow bishops, to the matter for that time stood in peace, deferred that businesse to a further day, which was till the first day of December; commanding the prior with his fellowes the same day not to faile, but to be at London about the chusing of the archbishop.

The bishops & monks could not agree about the forme of election.

As the day prefixed came, the prior with his companie were also present, who giuing attendance all that day and the next day also following, so were driuen off till the third day after. At length the lord Steward, with other nobles of the realme, were sent vnto them from the king, to declare, that whereas the king before had diuided the bishops from the monkes, that they both might haue their election by themselues, after the forme of a bill which was put downe in writting: now the mind of the king was, that the monkes taking another way, should ioyne with the bishops, and so hauing the matter in talke together, should proceed iointly in the election.

The kings message to the monks of Canturbury to agree and ioine with the bishops.

Against this, many things were alleaged by the prior and his mates, complaining much vpon the bishops, which said that the bishops had euer holden with the kings against the liberties of their church and archbishops. As first they stood against Anselme for king William; then Theobald for king Stephan; after that, against Thomas Becket for king Henry, and after him, did supplant the election of Richard their archbishop; and now againe went about to practise and worke against their election present, &c. At last the prior with his fellowes concluding, desired they might speake with the king himselfe. Who eftsoones comming vnto them, willed them as good men to be contented, and goe talke with the bishops about the election, promising that whom they agreed vpon, he also would grant his assent vnto the same. To whom when the prior againe had obiected the writings that before were made: Truth it is (said the king) such writings were made, but I neither may nor will goe against the counsell of my realme; and therefore agree, said he, with my bishops and abbats, and remember that the voice of the people is the voice of God.

The kings words to the monks of Canturbury.

Upon this the prior with his monks, seeing no other remedie, went to the bishops to consier, according to the king his request, about the election, who then were willed by the bishops to nominat whom they would, and the bishops would likewise name theirs. So that when the prior with his complices had named three after their chusing, the bishops said they would nominat but one, and so did, which was the bishop of Worcester, willing the prior to goe home, and to conferr with his couent about the same. To whom shortly after, the bishops sent certaine priests to signifie to the couent, that they according to the popes letters, should repaire to the bishops concerning the election of the archbishop: also to declare moreouer to them, that the persons whom they had named were good men: but he whom they had nominated was a more worthy man, whom they both had nominated, and also would elect. The monks marueiling hereat, sent two monks with the archdeacon of Canturbury to the king.

The monks of Canturbury compelled against their wils to ioine with the bishops touching the election of the archbishop.

This done, immediatly after the returne of the priests, the bishops caused all the bels of the city to be rung, and Te Deum to be sung for the archbishop new elect. Whereof when the two monks brought tidings to the couent at Canturbury what was done at London, they were all in a maruellous bumpe. The king hearing this, perceiuing the stirres of the monks, in all hast sent messengers to Canturbury with gentle words, to will the prior to come to the king, and certifie him of the purpose of his monks. Vnto whom the prior eftsoones being come, declareth in the name of the whole couent, that in no case he nor the monks would euer while the world stood agree to that election of the bishops, vnlesse the king in his owne person would come to Canturbury, and there openly before the whole couent, protest by his owne mouth the forsaid election to be nought and void, and to returning to London againe, openly likewise before the clergy and the people would repudiat and reiect the same: and furthermore, that the partie also elected, should openly in the same place protest and say, that he neither would nor ought to take that function vpon him, vnlesse he entred by the consent of the prior and couent of Canturbury: and all this to be done in the same place where the bishops had made their election before: and so peraduenture (said they) at the kings so earnest suit and request, they would gratifie his will, and ratifie the said election with the voices of their consent. To make the story short, after great hold betweene the secular clergy on the one side, and the regular order on the other side, and after the kings indignation against the prior, and the vsounding of the prior before the king, at length the king to take vp the matter, and to saue the priors life, was faine to performe in his owne person all those conditions aboue prescribed by the monks. Appellation against the archbish. op.

Conditions prescribed to the king by the monks of Canturburie, for the ratification of the election of their archbishop.

The bishops of the realme make their election of their archbishop without the monks of Canturbury.

And thus haue ye heard the tragicall election of the bishop of Worcester, named Baldwin, made archbishop of Canturbury. Now what a troublesome time the said Baldwin had with the monks in gouerning the church of Canturbury, here followeth likewise not vnworthy to be considered.

The troubles betweene Baldwin archbishop of Canturbury, and the monks of the same Church.

IN the first yere the archbishop shewed himselfe friendly and louing to the monks, the next yere following he began to appeare somewhat rough vnto them. The maner then was of the house of Christs church towards the time of the Nativity and of Easter, to receiue certaine presents of gifts of their farmers or tenants, which the cellarer should take and lay vp. Those presents the archbishop began first to intercept from the monks, and to bestow them vpon his secular clerks. After this he take those churches or benefices (which the monks claimed as proper to themselues) and placed in them three of his chaplens. After this, hee incroched to his hands certaine tenements, reuenewes, and victuals, belonging before to the monks (as they said) and committed the custody thereof to certaine of his owne clerks and houshold seruants.

The great trouble and contention betwixt Baldwin archbishop and the monks of Canturburie.

Businesse betweene the monks and the archbishop for placing secular clerks in the church of S. Stephans in Canturburie.

The prior of Canturburie suspended.

The monks which had borne so much with the archbishop before, seeing this, could forbeare him no longer, but needs would make their appeale against him. The archbishop not much regarding that, waxed therby more fierce against them, in so much that such fiercenes and tenements as he before had let alone, now he recouered to his own occupying, with many other grieuances wherewith hee greatly vexed the monks, so that three abbats were faine to come and reconcile the archbishop and the monks: which reconciliation was this, that the monks should let fall their appeale, and the archbishop should restore againe to them their farmes and tenements. But as touching the benefices and the priests, the archbishop still kept them in his hands for a further triall of their obedience and patience. Neuertheless, some there were of the ancient monks, which in no case would giue ouer the forsaid appeale, before the archbishop made a full restitution of all together.

The monks of Canturbury appeale to the pope against their archbishop.

Another grieuance betweene the monks of Canturburie and their archbishop.

Reconciliation betwixt the archbishop and the monks, which lasted not long both.

After this agreement, such as it was, betweene the monks and him, the archbishop gone after sent by to Rome one of his chaplens (vnto whom he had giuen one of the benefices aforementioned) partly for confirmation of his benefice, partly also to obtaine licence for the archbishop to build a church, which he intented to erect of secular priests there vnto the town of Canturbury. Which being obtained of the pope, the archbishop not a little glad thereof, began now more and more to wax fierce against the monks, not onely in taking from them their churches and oblations, but also in aggrauating the whole estate of their house, which he intended either to subuert, or greatly to diminish to pluckе downe the pride & stubbornes of the monks. Wherefore taking with him certaine other bishops (them he knew bare no good will to that monkish generation) he went to the king, declaring how he had a good purpose in his mind to erect a new and a solemne church in the honor of S. Thomas of Canturbury, of secular priests or canons; and therefore desired of the king to haue his fauorable licence to the same. The king right well perceiuing the purpose of the archbishop whither it tended, as to the bridling of the stiffnecked monks, was the more willing to giue assent, if he were not also the chiefe worker of that matter himselfe.

Baldwin archbishop of Canturbury about to build a new church on the north side of Canturbury.

The purpose of the archbishop in building his new church at Canturbury.

The intent of the archbishop in planting of that new church, was to found there diuers prebends, 4 to make both the king and euery bishop being his suffragans, prebendaries thereof, so that euery one of them should confer one prebendship to the same foundation, minding there to consecrat bishops, to make his chrismatory, to celebrat his synods, and to administer all other things belonging vnto the function of his see, and the same to be called Hakington church. The monks not ignorant how the archbishop priuily intended the desolation and subuersion of their house and liberties, consulting vpon the matter, determined at length among themselues to appeale to the see of Rome, namely for these three causes against the archbishop. First, for spoiling them of their gifts and oblations: secondly, for denying them of their churches and benefices: and thirdly, for creating a new foundation of secular canons, to the derogation and ouerthrow of their religious order, giuing admonition to the archbishop before by their monks sent to him of this their appellation. To whom the archbishop answered, that the foundation which hee went about, was to no derogation, but rather to the fortification and honor of their house. Who answered again, that it was, 5 could not otherwise be, but to their subuersion. And what should let me then (said the archbishop) but I may builde in mine owne ground what I will? Yes (said they) no ground of yours, but your ground is our ground, as all other things that you haue by right are ours, so so much as you haue them not of your selfe, but of the church and for the churches cause. All which things hau ben giuen neither to you, nor to the archbishops, but vnto the church of Christ: and therefore (said they) all such as apperteine vnto vs inwardly and outwardly, with the persons also, and the whole state of our church we submit vnder the popes protection: and now here make our appeale to the see apostolike, assigning also the terme when to prosecute the same.

The archbishop receiuing this appellation, and saying that he would answere to the same either by himselfe, or by his proctors, to within three daies after, which was the fifteenth of December, he came to Canturburie: where the monks vnderstanding how he was in mind to place new secular priests in the church of S. Stephan, where the monks had serued before, came to the church to stop the proceeding of the archbishop by way of appeale. Whereof the archbishop hauing warning before, deferred the matter till the next day after. On which day the monks againe being sent by Honorius the prior into the church, charged the archbishop in the name of almightie God, and by vertue of their appeale made to the apostolike see, to surceasse those his doings, forbidding also the parson of the church in no wise to suffer those secular clerks to bee admitted into the church. All which yet notwithstanding the archbishop proceedeth in his businesse. And first placing in his clerks hee suspendeth the prior from his administration. Then he aduiseth the posters of the gate vpon their oth to let none of the monks passe out of the house without his licence. The monks likewise be commanded by vertue of obedience, not to stray any where abrode without his leaue. And furthermore, one of the foresaid monks, which serued the appeale against him, bee vtterly banished from that couent. Vpon this, the day next following, Honorius the prior trusting (saith the storie) on God, and S. Thomas, take his way to Rome, sent in commission by the couent, to prosecute the appeale against the archbishop.

A letter of pope Clebun against the archbishop.

In this meane season a new iar began betweene the said archbishop and the monks, about their rents and reuenues, which the archbishop would haue committed to the receiuing and keeping of three monks; but the suppriour Geffrey, with the couent, in no case would suffer that: whereabout there was a soule ado. The archbishop taking the aid of the king, first had the bishops send downe to him, of Couentrie, Norwich and Worcester. Who being instant with the monks to submit their cause into the kings hands, like as the archbishop had done, they vtterly refused it; especially seeing they had already referred the whole state of their cause to the determination of the apostolicall see. The king seeing no other remedie came himselfe with the archbishop into the chapter house, where hee commanded first the dores to be kept fast, that none should enter but which by name were called for. Amongst whom were two bishops, to wit, of Norwich, and Durham, and one Petrus Blesensis a learned man, whose epistles be yet extant in libraries) a chiefe worker in this matter against the monks. Then was called in Geffrey the suppriour, with a few other monks whom he brought with him. The king then first talking with the archbishop, and his companie, and afterwards with the monks, laboured to intreate them that they would let fall their appeale, and so stand to the arbitrement of him and of the bishops, concerning the cause which was betweene the archbishop and them in trauerse.

Another grieuance betweene the monks of Canturburie and their archbishop.

Letters of the king, the archbishop and of the bishops to the pope.

To this he monks answered, that these were good words, but fenced not for that time, for so much as their cause was already translated to the court of Rome, and now was presently in hearing before the popes holinesse: and therefore they could not, ne would do that iniurie to their lord pope, to refuse him, and to put the matter vnto the iudgement of any other. Then was it required of the monks, that they would put the matter in compromise, in case the prior would consent thereto; vpon this intent, that if the prior consented and the monks not, then should they run in contempt and disobedience: or if the monks would consent, and the prior not, then should the prior be excluded the realme. The wise monks being not vnpossessed of this subtilitie, made their answere, that seeing they had sent their prior forth in their commission, it stood not with their honestie to giue any determinate consent, without the knowledge and before the returne of the said prior, vnlesse the archbishop first would promise to make full restitution of all that he had wrongfullie wrested from them. When the king could get no other answer of the monks, neither could moue the archbishop to release the sentence of their suspension, vnlesse they would confesse and knowledge their fault, hee so parting from them passed ouer into France.

The pope holdeth on the monks side against the king, the archbishop, and the bishops of the realme.

The pope excommunicated by R. Glanuile in the kings name not to proceed against the archbishop.

But not long after this came a messenger from Rome, bringing letters from pope Vrban to the archbishop, wherein the pope condemning and tendering (as hee said) the enorme greuances done against the monks, straitly inioined and commanded him, within ten daies after the receiuing thereof, to release the sentence of his suspension against the prior and others of the said couent, and also to retract and reuoke againe to the monks what soeuer he plucked from them since the time of their appeale first made. Who in case he should denie, or forslacke the doing hereof, commission was giuen to three abbats, of Battell, of Feuersham, and of S. Aulkins, with ample authoritie to performe the same, &c. The archbishop receiuing these letters brought to him by a monke of the forsaid house, first made his excuse, that the pope was misinformed. But the monks not contented with that excuse, when they would needs know what answere he would make to the popes Nuncio: his answere was, that he had yet ten daies giuen him of the pope. In which meane time the archbishop went to London, and there in the church of S. Paul consecrated his holy oyle and creame (making one of the popes seuen sacraments) which was graciously taken in the church of Canturburie. At last the ten daies being ended, when the archbishop refused to accomplish that was in the popes letter inioyned him, the three abbats aforesaid to execute the popes commandement, came at their day assigned, to Canturburie, and there assoiled all such as the archbishop before had suspended, and in the end certified pope Vrban by letters what they had done.

The answere of the archbishop to the popes letter.

Three abbats assoile the monks of their suspension.

The archbishop hearing this, within foure dayes after sent two of his clerks, which appealed the three abbats aforesaid up to Rome, and hee himselfe in the meane time prepared busilie for the building vp of his church, sending to all churches in England, vpon releasement of their sinnes, to confer vnto the same: and to make the more haste, for lacke of free stone hee made vp his building with timber, and such other stuffe as hee could get.

Businesse betweene the monks of Canturburie and their archbishop.

The prior Honorius all this while remained still at the court of Rome, giuing attendance vpon the pope, who hauing intelligence of the archbishops doings, procured another letter of pope Vrban to the whole clergie of England straitly inioyning them, that none should confer to the new fraternitie of Baldwin archbishop of Canturburie. To these letters the archbishop shewed such reuerence, that where before hee had planted his chapell of wood and bords, now hee prouided the same to be builded of lime and stone.

By this time Petrus Blesensis, with other messengers of the archbishop, seeing Honorius the prior to be gone from the court of France, resorted to the court of Rome, bringing with them letters of credit from the king, from the archbishop, and also from other bishops of the realme: but the pope reading onely the kings letters and the archbishops, the residue he cast into a window by, saying hee would reade them at further leisure. Then the pope giuing audience in his consistorie to heare their cause: first came in Petrus Blesensis with the agents of the archbishop, exhibiting their letters and propounding their requests to the pope, which were, that restitution should be made by the monks to the archbishop, wherein they had iniuried him. Item, that the things which had beene granted before to the prior in that court, might bee called in againe. Thirdly, that the archbishop might haue licence to proceed in building his college of monks at Arc: After this was called in M. Pilleus, the attorney for the monks of Canturburie. Who alleging many great things against the archbishop for his contempt and disobedience to the popes precepts, required that hee should make restitution to the monks for his iniuries done to them: and also that his new foundation of secular canons, tending to the ouerthrow of the conuentuall church of Canturbury, should bee vtterly raced and throwne downe to the ground. Thus betweene these parties pleading & replieing one against the other, much hard bold there was, but in conclusion for all could not, the matter went on the monks side. So that there was no remedie, but the pope would needs haue the archbishops new building come downe, and the monks to be restored againe to their full possessions. The execution whereof was committed to the three abbats aforesaid, to wit, of Battell, of Feuersham, of S. Aulkins in Canturburie, and to Geffrey suppriour of Canturburie.

Letters of the king, the archbishop and of the bishops to the pope.

M. Pilleus attorney in the popes court for the monks of Canturburie.

Which things being thus determined at Rome, then Radulph Glanuile lord Iusticiar of England writing to the said abbat of Battell, and to the suppriour and couent of Canturbrie, commanded it in the kings name, and vpon their oth and fealtie giuen vnto him, that they not any of them doe proceed in this controuersie betweene the monks and the archbishop of Canturburie, before they come and talke with him, there to know further of the kings pleasure: and further more charging the couent of Canturburie not to enter further in any examinations as concerning the archbishops matters, and also citing the suppriour of the said house, to appeare before him at London, at the feast of S. Iames the same yeare, which was 1187. Notwithstanding hee creating himselfe so sicknesse, sent two monks in his stead, and so kept himselfe at home. To whom commandement was giuen, that the monks of Canturburie within fiftene daies should saile ouer to Normandie to the king, and there to shew the tenor and euidences of their priuiledges: and also that such stewards and bailiffes whom they had placed in their farmes and lordships, contrarie to the will of the archbishop, should be removed. And likewise the three abbats in the kings name were commanded, in no wise to execute the popes commandement against the archbishop. Not long after this the archbishop tooke shipping at Douer, and went ouer to the king, where hee obtained three principall offices ouer the monks of Christs church; the sacrill, the cellarer, and the chamberlaine, contrarie to the till of the conuent, with other grieuances more, whereby the monkes were not a little offended; so that vpon the same they made a new appellation to the pope. Whereupon pope Vrban, by the setting on of Honorius the prior, who was now come againe to the court, wrote to him another letter after a sharper and more vehement sort, to the effect as followeth.

Another appellation of the monks against the archbishop.

The tenor of pope Vrbans letters to Baldwin archbishop of Canturburie.

Vrbanus episcopus seruus seruorum Dei, Baldwino Cantuar. archiepiscopo & apostolicæ sedis legato, salutem & apostolicam benedictionem, &c.

The copie of pope Vrbans letter to the archbishop of Canturburie.

In that we haue borne with your brotherhood hitherto, and haue not proceeded in such grieuous maner against you, as wee might, although being thereto greatly prouoked: the chiefest cause was this, that we supposed your heart would haue relented from the presumption of the conuentuall church of Canturburie committed vnto you; if not for our reuerence, which you seeme to haue contemned more then became you, yet at least for feare of Gods iudgement. For well wee hoped, our conscience perswading vs to the same, that after you had obtained that high state and dignitie in the church of England, you would haue been an example to others of obedience and reuerence to be giuen to the see apostolike, of all ecclesiasticall persons. Wherefore at the first beginning both of our and also of your promotion, we did not spare to aduance and honor you as wee haue done few others besides, thinking no lesse, but that we had found a faithfull friend of the church, for our honour. Wherein we perceiue now (which maketh vs not a little to maruell) our expectation greatly deceiued. And whom we will trusted to be a sure stay for the maintenance of our estate, him now we find a persecutor against vs in our members.

Note how the popes stand all vp in their bones.

For whereas we sundrie times haue written to you in the behalfe of our brethren, and the church committed to your charge, that you should desist from disquieting them, and not to vex or disturbe their liberties, at least for reuerence of vs: you not onely in this, but in other things more (as commonly is reported of you in all places) setting at light our letters and appellations made vnto the apostolicall see, what you haue wrought against them after their so manifold appellations laid vnto vs, and our inhibitions againe vnto you, we are ashamed to vtter. But reuolue and consider in your mind, if ye haue well done, and aduise in your owne conscience what you haue done. We for our part because we may not ought not with deafe eares to passe ouer the clamors of the brethren, and such contempt of the apostolike see, although our biddings and warnings giuen to you seeme to be all in vaine: yet notwithstanding we send our mandates againe vnto your brotherhood, in their apostolicall writings, districtly and in vertue of obedience commanding you, that whether you bee present in your church, or absent; all that notwithstanding, whatsoeuer you haue done in building of your chapell (which you to the destruction of the monasterie of Canturburie haue erected) after the time of their appeale made to vs, or our inhibition sent to you, you faile not of your proper costs and charges to remooue, vndoing againe, and making voide, whatsoeuer ye haue begun and innouated concerning the institution of the canons, and other things belonging to the erection of the said chapell: accounting moreouer and reputing the place where the chapell was, to bee accursed and prophane: and also that all such whosoeuer haue celebrated in the same place, shall stand suspended till the time they appeare before our presence. Commanding furthermore, that all those monks, whom you haue presumed to remoue from their office or to excommunicate, since the time of their appeale made, you shall restore and absolue againe, rendering also and restoring all such farmes, manors, tenements, and oblations, as you after their appeale made, haue inueagled from them; and finally, that you innouate nothing touching the state of that monasterie, during the time of this controuersie depending before vs. Giuing you to vnderstand, that in case you shall continue in your stubbornesse and rebellion vpon this present warning, or defer the execution of this precept thirtie daies after the receiuing hereof, wee shall appoint others to execute the same; inioyning also your suffragans, that as you shall shew your selfe disobedient and rebelling to vs, so they all shall resiste likewise to giue any obedience or reuerence vnto you, &c.

The archbishop commanded by the pope to build vp againe the chapell he had pulled downe, & to restore the monks to their former state and charge.

Giuen at Ferrara, 5. non. Octob.

The archbishop excommunicated by the pope.

Another letter besides this the pope also sent to the three abbats aforesaid for the correction of these enormities. Likewise an other letter was sent to king Henrie the second, wherein the poor innocents and requireth him vpon remission of his sinnes not to dissemble and beare with the archbishop in his oppression of his monks, but to helpe these things to bee amended, where he hath trespassed against them.

The pope writeth to the abbats and also to the king.

These pontificall letters were written An. 1187: the third day of October, & in the nineteenth day after, the same moneth, the said pope Vrban died. In the which yeare, and about the which moneth, Baldwin king of Jerusalem was taken with many noble men of Solaan the Saracen: and Jerusalem lost, after that it had been in the possession of the christians, and so continued the space of eightie eight yeres, and eightie daies, from the time that Godfridus Boloinus did first win it from the infidels.

Jerusalem lost.

After the receiuing of those letters of pope Vrban aboue specified, both the king and archbishop, with all the bishops of the realme were maruellous quaint, glad now to please, and speake faire to the monks, promising all things to be done and restored to them after the best sort. Neither was the king now and archbishop so submisse; but the monkes on the other side were as brag and vncant, being fully assured that all now was their owne. In the narration of which historie (as it is set in Gernasius at large) this we haue to note by the way, in what feare and thraldome kings in those daies were vnder the pope, who could not be maisters ouer their owne subiects, but that a verie pild monke, or pelting priest, vpon vertue of their appeale to the court of Rome, and making their house tributarie to the pope, was able not onely to match, but to giue checkemats vnto the best king christened, as not in this story onely may appeare.

The king and archbishop glad to agree with the monks.

The monks got the vpper hand ouer the archbishop.

The miserable subiection of kings vnder the pope to be noted.

It followeth then in the storie of these monks, that as they were thus in the midst of their ioy and iollity, suddenly commeth newes of the death of pope Vrban their great Caliphe, and also how that Gregory the eight was placed in his rome, who was a speciall friend and fauourer of the archbishop; which as it did greatly incourage the king and the archbishop, so the monks on the other side were as much discomforted, to that now all was turned vpside downe. For whereas the king and the archbishop before thought they had lost all, and were glad to compound with the monks, and to seeke their fauour: now were the monks on the contrarie side faine to crouch to the king, and glad to haue a good countenance; who then reioyting to him, and finding him altered both in word and gesture, desired he would confirme and grant that which of late before he had promised. To whom it was answered againe by the king, that seeing the archbishop had granted to them their sacrist, their chamberlaine, and their cellerar, they should haue no more restored of him: neither would he suffer the liberties and priuiledges of the archbishop to be impaired or take any wrong. And touching the new chapell of S. Thomas (said he) wherearbout pe striue so long, with the canonships and other buildings belonging thereto, the same I receiue into my hands, so that none shall haue any thing to doe therein but my selfe, &c. In like maner of the archbishop such an other like answere they receiued, and of bishops little better. So the monks sent away with a flea in their care, went home againe out of Normandie to their cell.

Caliphe is the high priest of the Saracens dwelling in Babylon, vnto whom all the Sultans here subiect, as our princes now are to the pope.

Three things to be obserued in this storie of Canturburie monks about rehearsed.

The kinges answere to the monks of Canturburie.

Hypocrisie in monkerie.

Kings made slaues vnder the pope.

No concord nor vnitie in popish churches.

And to the archbishop hauing the monks here as he would, wrought them much grieuance, but that continued not verie long. For within two moneths after, and lesse, died pope Gregorie the eight, about the sixteenth day of December following. After whom succeeded pope Clement the third, who following the steps of Vrban sent all his power with the monks against the archbishop, sending diuers precepts and mandats in the next yeare following, which was the yeare 1188: with an imperious letter, willing and commanding him to desist from his oppression of the monks, and to throw downe his new chapell. Whereupon the archbishop made his appeale and minded to go to Rome, but was called backe of the king being readie to saile ouer. In the which yeare Honorius the prior died at Rome of the plague, which was some helpe and comfort to the archbishop, for whom the archbishop made Roger Norris prior, against the wils of the conuent. After this, about the latter end of the same yeare, pope Clement sent downe his legat called Radulphus a cardinall, to Canturburie with another letter more sharpely written to the same effect into the archbishop. In the which yeare also died king Henrie the second, after whom succeeded king Richard his sonne, who ioyning likewise with the archbishop, take his part strongly against the said monks. At last, after much adoe on both parts, and after great disturbance, and imprisoning diuers of the monks, king Richard preparing his voyage towards Jerusalem, and studying first to set peace betweene them, conuicted and agreed with the bishops and abbats about a finall concord in this matter, betweene the archbishop and monkes of Canturburie, which at length on both parts was made, vpon these conuentions as follow.

1 First, that Roger Norris should bee deposed, whom the archbishop had made prior against their wils: whom the king then at the request of the archbishop promoted to bee abbat of Sudham. 2 Item, that the archbishop should plucke downe his chappell, which he builded in the suburbs of Canturburie, against the minds of the monks. 3 Item, that the foresaid monks should make profession of their obedience and subiection to the archbishop, as they had done to his other predecessors before him. 4 Item, as touching all other complaints and iniuries, except onely the chapell, and deposition of Roger Norris the prior; the monks should stand to the arbitrement of the king, of the archbishop, and the prelate. 5 Item, that the monks kneeling downe before the king in the chapter house, should aske the archbishop forgiuenesse. Which being done, they they went all together to the church, and sang Te Deum for this reformation of peace. Ex veteri chronico manuscripto, & ex Gerualio.

The next day after the archbishop comming into the chapter, restored to the conuent their manors and farmes againe: also discharged the prior (with he had made before) desiring them likewise, that if he had offended them either in word or deed, they would from their heart remit him. This reconciliation being made betweene the archbishop and the conuent, then the archbishop going about to dissolue the building of his new church, though he changed the place, yet thought not to change his intent, and therfore making exchange of lands with the bishop and monks of Rochester, purchased of them their ground in Lambeth. An. 1191. Which done, he came to his clerks whom he had placed to be canons in his new college of Dalington, and also willed them to remoue all their goods and furniture to Lambeth ouer against Westminster, where hee erected for them another church, and there placed the said canons. About which colledge of Lambeth afterwards much trouble likewise ensued, by the stirring of the said monks of Canturburie, in the time of Hubert the archbishop in the reigne of the said king Richard, and in the peare of our Lord 1196. Further more, after the deposing of Roger Norris prior of Canturburie aforesaid, Baldwin the archbishop inforced to grant them another prior by the assent of the king and of the conuent, aligned Osbernus to bee their prior, who had taken part before with the archbishop; but the monks not pleased with him, after the death of Baldwin the archbishop removed him againe.

And thus haue you the tedious discourse of this catholike tragedie, betweene the monks of Canturburie and their archbishop, scarce worth the rehearsall: notwithstanding, this I thought to giue the reader to vnderstand, of purpose, first to shew forth vnto the world the blockishnesse of this monkish generation, who professing profound humilitie in their cote, what little humilitie they had in their heart, what pride and arrogancie in their conuersation, and what hypocrisie in their religion, this one example among a thousand others may giue some experience. Secondly, that the politicke note may see, how little kings could then doe in their owne realmes for the pope. And thirdly, to the intent it may more notoriously appeare to all readers, what little trifle and debate, what dissolute causes, what little vnitie and concord hath alwaies followed the popes catholike church, wherefoeuer the corrupt religion and vsurped ambition of the pope preuailed. For, not to speake onely of this monkish house of Canturburie, what church cathedrall, collegiat, or conuentuall; what see, church, monasterie or chapell was vnder all the popes gouernment, but euer there happened some variance, either betweene the king and the archbishop, as betweene king William and Lanfranke, king Henrie the first and Anselme, king Stephan and Becket, king Henrie the second and Becket, king John and Stephan Langton, king Henrie the third and Boniface, &c. or else betweene archbishop and archbishop, for making profession, for carrying the crosse, for sitting on the right hand of the popes legat, &c. or else betweene archbishops and their suffragans, or betweene archbishops and their counts, or betweene bishops and monks, betweene deane and chapter, betweene monks and secular priests, monks of one sort against another, friers of one order against another, students against friers, to omit many men against scholers, &c. As for example: What discord was betweene the archbishop of Canturburie and Richard archbishop of Roüe, betweene Lanckfrancus and archbishop Thomas, betweene Theobald archbishop of Canturburie, and Siluester abbat of S. Austins, betweene Walter of Ophilis church and Siluester abbat aforesaid, betweene William archbishop of Canturburie, and Jeremias prior of Canturburie, Anno 1244. betweene the monks of Canturburie and Odo their prior for translating the reliues of Dunstan, betweene king Stephan and Roger bishop of Salisburie, the bishop of Lincolne and Roger bishop of Elie his sonne, Anno 1138. betweene pope Innocent and Anacletus the space of seuen yeares, the cardinals for money (saith Gernasius) sometime holding with the one, sometime with the other; at last the election was determined by a sore battell betweene Lotharius emperor and Rogerius duke of Apulia, Anno 1137. also betweene pope Innocent the fourth and Frederike emperor the second, betweene king Henrie the third and William Raimbard bishop of Winchester, when the king had the gates of Winchester towne to be shut against him, An. 1250. betweene Boniface archbishop of Canturburie, and canons of S. Paul; item betweene the said Boniface and monks of S. Bartholomew, who sat there in harnesse in his visitation, Anno 1250. betweene the abbat of Westminster and monks of the same house, Anno 1251. Item, betweene the foresaid William Rale bishop of Winchester and Boniface archbishop of Canturburie, for a priest of the hospitall in Southwarke, Anno 1252. betweene the said Boniface and canons of Lincolne after the death of Robert Grosshead, for giuing of prebends, Anno 1253. betweene the monks of Couentrie and canons of Lichfield, for chusing their bishop in the time of king Henrie the third.

And what should I speake of the discords, which ceased so much money betweene Edmund archbishop of Canturburie, and the monks of Rochester, for chusing Richard Wendor to bee their bishop. An. 1328. betweene Robert Grosshead bishop of Lincolne and canons of the same house, for which both here and there were driuen to trauell to Rome, An. 1244. betweene Gilbert bishop of Rochester, delegat to archbishop Baldwin, and Robert the popes legat for sitting on the right hand of the legat in his councell at Westminster, An. 1190. betweene the abbat of Bardeneie and the said Grosshead about the visitation of their abbey, An. 1243. item betweene the conent of Canturburie and the said Robert bishop of Lincolne, Anno 1243. betweene Hugo bishop of Durham and Hubert bishop of Saterum and Geffrete archbishop of Roüe, Anno 1189. betweene William bishop of Elie the kings chancellor and the canons of Roüe, for not receiuing him with procession, Anno 1190. betweene the abbat of Westminster and his conuent of blacke monks, whom king Henrie the third had much adoe to still and agree, Anno 1249. item betweene the foresaid bishop of Lincolne and the abbat of Westminster; likewise betweene Nicolas bishop of Durham and John abbat of S. Albons, Anno 1246. also betweene Hubert archbishop of Canturburie and the monks there for the house of Lambeth, An. 1146. And what a stir was betweene the preaching friers and the gray friers mentioned in Matthew Paris for superioritie, An. 1243. Also betweene the said grey friers, and the prelats and doctors of Paris about nine conclusions, condemned of the prelats to be erroneous:

1 Concerning the diuine essence, that it cannot be seene of the angels or men glorified.

2 Concerning the essence of the holy Ghost.

3 Touching the preceding of holy Ghost, as he is one.

4 Whether men glorified shall be In coelo empyreo, or In coelo crystallino.

5 That the euill angell at his first creation was euill and neuer good.

6 That there haue been many verities from the beginning which were not of God.

7 That an angell in one instant may be in diuers places.

8 That the euill angell neuer had iuserby he might stand, no more had Adam in his state of innocencie.

9 Which hath Mehora naturalis, that is to say, More perfect strength of nature working in him, shall haue more full measure of necessitie to obtein grace and glorie. To the which article the prelats answering, did excommunicate the same as erroneous, affirming that grace and glorie shall bee giuen according to that God hath elected and predestinate, &c. Ex Matth. Paris. fol. 167.

In like maner betweene the said Dominike friers, and the grey friers, what a brall and tumult was about the conception of our lady, whether she was without originall sin conceiued or not, in the reigne of king Henrie the seuenth and king Henrie the eight, in the yeare of our Lord 1509. Adde moreouer to these the 24 haynous scismes, I not so few, which happened betweene pope and pope in the church & see of Rome. But what doe I stand to recite the diuisions and dissentions of the popes church, which is as much almost as to reckon the sands of the sea? For what church, chapter, or conuent was in all that religion, which either had not some variance with themselues or with others? Vpon which continuall strife & variance among them, the readers hereof may iudge of them and their religion as pleaseth them: in the meane time, my iudgement is this: that where such dissention dwelleth, there dwelleth not the spirit of Christ.

These things thus discoursed touching the tragicall dissension betweene Baldwin the archbishop, and the monks of Canturburie; now let vs proceed, by the Lords assistance, in continuing of our storie. After king Richard had thus, as is declared, set the monks and the archbishop in some agreement, and had composed such things as were to bee redressed within the realme, he aduanced forward his iourney, and came into Turon, to meet with Philip the French king: and so after that went to Vizeliace, where the French king and he ioyning together, for the more continuance of their iourney, assured themselues by solemne oth, swearing fidelitie one vnto the other; the forme of whose oth was this: That either of them should defend and maintaine the honour of the other, and beare true fidelitie vnto him of life, members, and worldly honour, and that neither of them should faile one the other in their affaires: but the French king should aid the king of England in defending his land and dominions, as hee would himselfe defend his owne citie of Paris, if it were besieged: and that Richard king of England likewise should aid the French king in defending his land and dominions, no otherwise then hee would defend his owne citie of Rone, if it were besieged, &c. But holy Aedelbert by this oth did hold betweene these two kings, and by whose edicte accain in firft it fell asunder. the sequell of the historie (the Lord willing) shall declare hereafter.

Discipline and orders set by king Richard for malefactors.

Furthermore, touching the lawes and ordinances appointed by this king Richard for his nauie, the forme thereof was this.

T.y. 1 That

1 That who so killed any person on shipboord, should be tied with him that was slaine, and throwne into the sea.

2 And if he killed him on the land, he should in like maner be tied with the parte slaine, and bee buried with him in the earth.

3 He that shall be convicted by lawfull witnesse to draw out his knife or weapon, to the intent to strike any man, or that hath stricken any to the drawing of blod, shall lose his hand.

4 Also, he that striketh any person with his hand, without effusion of blod, shall be plunged thre times in the sea.

5 Item, who so speaketh any opprobrious or contumelious wordes, in reuiling or earling one an other, for so oftentimes as he hath so reuiled, shall pay so many ounces of siluer.

6 Item, a theefe, or felon that hath stolne, being lawfully conuicted, shall haue his head shorne, and boiling pich powred vpon his head, and feathers or downe strowed vpon the same, whereby he may be knowne, and so the first landing place they shall come to, there to be cast by, &c.

These things thus set in a readinesse, king Richard seruing his nauie by the Spanish seas, and by the straits of Iubaltaric betweene Spaine and Africa, to met him at Marsilia, he himselfe went (as is said) to Vizeliace, to the French king. Which two kings from thence went to Lions, where the bridge ouer the floud Rhodanus for presse of people brake, and many both men and women were drowned. The reason whereof the two kings (by the ordinances of their traines) were constrained to desseuer themselues for the time of their iourney, appointing both to met together in Sicilia, and so Philip the French king take his way to Genua, and king Richard to Marsilia, where he remained eight daies, appointing there his nauie to met him. From thence crossing ouer to Genua, where the French king was, he passed forward by the coast of Italie, and entred into Tyber not far from Rome, where meeting with Octomannus the cardinall and bishop of Hostia, hee did complaine greatly of the filthie simonie of the pope and the popes court, for receiuing seuen hundred markes for consecrating the bishop Cenomanensis: also a thousand and fiue hundred markes of William the bishop of Elie for his office legantine: and likewise an infinite summe of money of gratie, &c.

The seuenth day of August, in the yeare aforesaid, king Richard departed out of Marsilia, after he had there waited seuen daies for his nauie, which came not, and so hiring diuerse gallies, and ten great barkes, to ship ouer his men, sailed by the sea coast of Italie, and came to Naples, and so partly by horsse and waggon, partly by the sea sailing to Falernum, he came to Calabria, where after that hee had heard his ships were arriued at Messana in Sicilia, hee made the more speed; and so the three and twentith of September sent to Messana, with such a noise of trumpets and thalms, with such a rout and shew, that it was to the great wonderment and terror both of the Frenchmen, and all others that did heare and behold the sight.

To the said towne of Messana the French king was come before the fifteenth day of the same moneth of September, and had taken vp the palace of Tancredus king of Sicilia for his lodging. To whom king Richard after his arriuall citizenes resorted, and when the two kings had communed together, immediately the same day the French king tooke shipping and entred the seas, thinking to saile toward the land of Jerusalem. But after he was out of the hauen, the wind arising contrarie against him, returned him backe againe to Messana. Then king Richard (whose lodging was prepared in the suburbs without the citie, after he had resorted againe, and talked with the French king, and also had sent to Tancredus king of Sicilia for deliuerance of Joane his sister (who had ben sometimes queen of Sicilia) and had obteined her to be sent vnto him, the last day of September passed ouer the floud of Delfar, and there getting a strong hold called de la Bagmare, or le Bamre, and placing therein his sister with a sufficient garrison, he returned home againe to Messana. The second of October king Richard wan an other certaine strong hold called Monasterium Griffonum, situated in the midst of the riuer of Delfar, betweene Messana and Catalgirone: the inhabitants of the monks being expulsed, hee repoled there all his store and prouision of victuals, which came from England or other places.

The citizens of Messana, fearing that the king of England had won the castle and iland in de la Bagmare, and also the monasterie of the Griffons, and doubting lest the king would extend his power further to inuade their citie, and if he could all the whole ile of Sicilia, began to shew a fire against the kings armie, and to shut the Englishmen out of the gates, and keepe their wals against them. The Englishmen seeing that, made to the gates, and by force would haue broken them open, in so much that the king riding among them with his staffe, and breaking diuers of their heads, could not allwage their fiercenesse: such was the rage of the Englishmen against the citizens of Messana. The king seeing the furie of the people to bee such as he could not stay them, tooke bote, and went to the palace of king Tancred to talke of the matter with the French king. In which time the matter was so taken vp by the wise handling of the ancient of the citie, that both parties laying downe their armour went home in peace.

The fourth day of the said moneth of October came to king Richard the archbishop of Messana, with two other archbishops also with the French king, and sundry other earles, barons, and bishops, for intreatance of peace. Who as they were together consulting, and had almost concluded vpon the peace, the citizens of Messana issuing out of the towne, some went vp vpon the mountaines, some with open force inuaded the mansion or lodging of Hugh Bun an English captaine. The noise whereof comming to the eares of the king, hee suddenly breaking off talke with the French king and the rest, departed from them; and comming to his men, commanded them forthwith to arme themselues; who then with certaine of his souldiers making vp to the top of a mountaine (which seemed to passe their power to climbe) there put the citizens to flight, chasing them downe the mountaine, vnto the very gates of the citie, whom also certaine of the kings seruants pursued within the citie, of whom fiue valiant souldiers, and fiuerttie of the kings seruants were slaine, the French king looking vpon, and not once willing to relieue them, contrarie vnto his oth and leagne before made with the king of England. For the said French king with his men being there present, rode in the midst of them safely and without harme, to and fro, and might well haue eased the kings partie, more then hee, if it had liked him.

This being knowne to the English host, how their fellowes there slaine, and the Frenchmen permitted in the citie, and that they were excluded, and the gates barred against them, being also stopped from buying of victuals and other things, they vpon great indignation gathered themselues in armes, brast open the gates, and scaled the wals, and so winning the citie, set vp their flags with the English armes vpon the wals. Which when the French king did see, he was mightily offended, requiring the king of England, that the armes of France might also bee set vp and ioyned with his: But king Richard to that would in no case agree. Notwithstanding, to satisfie his mind, hee was well contented to take downe his armes, and commit the custodie of the citie to the Hospitalaries and Templaries of Jerusalem, till the time that Tancred king of Sicilia and hee should agree together vpon conditions.

This thing being done, the fifth and sixth day of October, it followed then vpon the eight day of the same moneth of October, that peace among the kings was concluded. In which peace first king Richard and Philip the French king renewed againe their oth and league before made concerning their mutuall aid and societie during all the time of their peregrination. Secondly, peace also was concluded betweene king Richard and Tancred king of Sicilia aforesaid with this condition, that the daughter of Tancred (in case king Richard should die without issue) should marrie to Arthur duke of Britaine the kings nephue and next heire to his crowne, &c: whereof a formall chart was drawen and letters sent thereof to pope Clement, being dated the ninth day of Nouember.

At this meane time as these two kings of France and England were thus wintering at Messana, Frederike emperor first of that name (the same on whose necke pope Alexander did tread in the church of Uenice, saying the verse of the psal. Super aspidem & basiliscum ambulabis, &c: whereof read he fore) and his sonne Conradus, with a mightie armie of Almans and others, were comming vp Hungarie towards the land of Jerusalem to the siege of Acon: where by the way the good emperour through a great mischance falling off his horse into a riuer called Salef, was therein droiwned. After whose decease Conradus his sonne taking the gouernment of his armie, came to the siege of Acon, in which siege also hee died. Vpon whose comming such a dearth followed in the campe which lasted two moneths, that a lese of bread, which before their comming was sold for one pennie, was afterward sold for three pounds: by reason whereof many christian souldiers did there perish through famine. The chiefest food which the princes there had to feed vpon was horse flesh. This famine being so terrable, some god bishops there were in the campe, namely Hubert bishop of Salisburie, with certaine other god bishops, who making a generall collection through the whole campe for the poore, made such a prouision, that in this penurie of all things, yet no man was to be destitute and needie, but somewhat he had for his relefe, till within a few daies after by the merciful prouidence of God (who is the feder of all creatures) ships came into them with abundance of corne, wine, and oyle.

The siege of this towne of Acharon indured a long season, which as it was mightily oppugned by the christians, so it was strongly defended by the Saracens, specially by the helpe of wild fire, which the Latins call Greeum ignem, so that great slaughter there was on both sides. During the time of which siege, many noble personages & also bishops died, among whom was

The time thus passing ouer in the moneth of Februarie, the next yeare following, which was of the Lord 1191, king Richard sent ouer his gallies to Naples, there to met his mother Elenor, and Berengaria the daughter of Sanctius king of Nauar, whom he was purposed to marrie. Who by that time were come to Brundusium, vnder the conduct of Philip earle of Flanders, and so proceeding vnto Naples, there found the kings ships, wherein they sailed to Messana. In this meane space king Richard shewed himselfe exceeding bounteous and liberall vnto all men. For the French king first hee gaue seuen ships: vpon others likewise hee bestowed rich rewards, and of his goods and treasure hee distributed largely vnto his souldiers and seruants about him. Of whom it was reported that hee distributed more in one moneth, then euer any of his predecessors did in a whole yeare: by reason whereof he purchased great loue and fauor, which not onely redounded to the aduancement of his fame, but also to his singular vse and profit, as the sequell afterward prooued.

To proceed then in the progresse of king Richard, it followeth: In the first day of the moneth of March, he leauing the citie of Messana, where the French king was, went to Cathinentium, a citie where Tancredus king of Sicilia then lay, where he was honorably receiued, and there remained with king Tancredus fiue daies and fiue nights. On the sixth day when hee should depart, the foresaid Tancredus offered him many rich presents in gold and siluer, and pyecious silks, wherof king Richard would receiue nothing, but one little ring for a token of his good will. For the which king Richard againe gaue him a rich sword. At length when king Richard should take his leaue, king Tancredus would not so let him part, but needs would giue him fourteene gallies, and fiftene galliss: and furthermore, hee himselfe would needs accompanie him the space of two daies iourney to a place called Taurentium.

And if the said Tancredus would war against him, or secretly by night would inuade him, hee with all his power would assist him, and ioyne with him to the destruction of him and all his armie, &c. To whom Richard the king protested againe, that he was no traitor, nor neuer was: and as touching the peace begun betweene them, the same should neuer be broken through him: neither could he beleeue, that the French king, beeing his good lord and his sworne compartner in that voyage, would utter any such words by him. Which when Tancredus heard, hee bringeth forth the letters of the French king sent to him by the duke of Burgundie, affirming moreouer, that if the duke of Burgundie would denie the bringing of the said letters, he was ready to trie with him by any of his dukes. King Richard receiuing the letters and reuiling not a little vpon the same, returneth againe to Messana. The pope ariseth off the emperors crowne with his foot. King Richards mockery from Messana to Achon.

whom he should marrie, who at length were found safe and merrie at the port of Limsem in the ile of Cyprus. Notwithstanding the two other ships, which were in their company before in the same haven, were drowned, with diuers of the kings seruants and men of worthy, amongst whom was S. Roger, called Malus Catulus, the kings vicechancellor, who was found hauing the kings seale hanging about his necke. The king of Cyprus was then Isakius (called also the emperor of the Griffons) who tooke and imprisoned all Englishmen which by shipwracke were cast vpon his land: also inueigled into his hands the goods and prises of them which were found drowned about his coasts, neither would suffer the ship where in the two ladies were to enter within the port.

Isakius king of Cyprus a cruell enemie to Englishmen.

The tidings of this being brought to king Richard, hee in his great wrath gathering his gallies and ships together, boarded the land of Cyprus, where hee first in gentle wise signified to king Isakius, how hee with his Englishmen, coming as strangers to the suppotation of the holy land, were by distresse of weather driuen vpon his bounds; and therefore with all humble petition besought him in Gods behalfe, and for reuerence of the holy crosse, to let goe such prisoners of his which he had in captiuitie, and to restore againe the goods of them which were drowned, &c. And this the king once, twice, and thrice, desired of the emperor. But he proudly answering againe, sent the king word, that hee would neither let the captiues goe, nor render the goods of them which were drowned, &c.

King Richard mindeth to make warre against the king of Cyprus for his soldiers in captiuitie.

The disdainfull and proud answer of Isakius to king Richard.

When king Richard heard this, how little the emperor Isakius made of his so humble and honest petition, and how nothing there could be gotten without violent force, assembled guiltie commandement through all his fleet, to put themselues in armour and to follow him, to reuenge such iniuries receiued of that proud and crouell king of Cyprus, willing them to put their trust in God, and not to mistrust but the Lord would stand with them, and giue them the full victorie. The emperor in the meane time with his people stood warding the sea coasts, where the Englishmen should arriue, with swords, bils, and lances, and such other weapons as they had, setting bands, rowles, and chests before them in stead of a wall. How beit but few of them were harnessed, and so the most part all vnexpert, and vnskilfull in the feats of war. Then king Richard with his soldiers issuing out of their ships, first set his bowmen before, who with their shot made a way for others to follow. The Englishmen thus winning the land vpon them, so fiercely pressed vpon the Griffons, that after long fighting and many blowes, at last the emperor was put to flight, whom king Richard valiantly pursued, and slue many, and diuers he tooke aliue, and had gone neere also to haue had the emperor, had not the night come on and parted the battell. And thus king Richard with much toile and great victorie returning to the port towne of Limsem, which the townesmen had left for feare, found there great abundance of corne, wine, oyle, and victuals.

King Richard setteth vpon Isakius king of Cyprus.

The same day after the victorie got, Ioane the kings sister, and Berengera the maiden, entered the port and towne of Limsem, with fiftie great ships, and fourteene galliots, so that all the whole nauie there meeting together, were two hundred fiftie foure tall ships, and aboue threescore galliots. Then Isakius the emperor seeing no way for him to escape by the sea, the same night pitched his tents fiue miles off from the English armie, swearing that the third day after hee would sure giue battell to king Richard. But hee preuenting him before, suddenly the same morning before the day of battell should bee, setteth vpon the tents of the Griffons early, they being vnwares and asleepe, and made of them a great slaughter, in so much that the emperor was faine naked to run away, leaning his tents and pauilions to the Englishmen, full of vasles and rich treasure, also with the imperiall standard, the lower part whereof with a coslly scraunce was couered and wrought all with gold. King Richard then returning with victorie and triumph to his sister, and Berengera, shortly after in the moneth of May next following, and the twelfth day of the same moneth, married the said Berengera daughter of Rancon king of Nauar, in the ile of Cyprus, at Limsem.

The king of Cyprus seeing himselfe ouermatched, was driuen at length to yeeld himselfe with conditions, to giue king Richard twentie thousand marks in gold, for amends of such spoiles as hee had gotten of them that were drowned, also to restore all his captiues againe to the king, and furthermore in his owne person to attend vpon the king to the land of Ierusalem, in Gods seruice and his, with foure hundred horsemen, and fiue hundred footmen: in pledge whereof he would giue to his hands his castles, and his onely daughter, and would hold his kingdome of him. This done, and the emperor swearing fidelitie to king Richard, before Guido king of Ierusalem, and the prince of Antioch (who were come thither to king Richard a little before) peace was taken, and Isakius was committed to the ward of certaine keepers. Notwithstanding shortly after he breaking from his keepers, was againe at defiance with the king. Whereupon king Richard besetting the iland of Cyprus round about with ships and gallies, did in such sort preuaile, that the subiects of the land were constrained to yeeld themselues to the king, and at length the daughter also of the emperour, and at last the emperor himselfe, whom king Richard caused to bee kept in fetters of siluer and gold, and to be sent to the citie of Tripolis.

These things thus done, and all set in order touching the possession of the ile of Cyprus, the keeping whereof hee committed vnto Raduiph sonne of Godfrey lord chamberlaine, being then the first day of Iune; vpon the fifth of the said moneth king Richard departed from the ile of Cyprus with his ships and gallies towards the siege of Achon, and on the next morrow came vnto Tyrus, where by procurement of the French king he was constrained by the citizens to enter. The next day after, which was the sixth day of Iune, crossing the seas he met with a great barke fraught with souldiers and men of war, to the number of one thousand and fiue hundred, which pretending to be Frenchmen, and setting forth their flag with the French armes, were indeed Sarazens, secretly sent with fresh fire and certaine barrels of inhumaine serpents, to the defence of the towne of Achon. Which king Richard at length perceiuing, et sonnes set vpon them and so vanquished them, of whom the most were drowned, and some taken aliue. Which being once knowne in the citie of Achon, as it was a great discomfort vnto them, so it was a great helpe vnto the christians for winning the citie. The next day after, which was the seuenth of Iune, king Richard came to Achon, which at that time had been long besieged of the christians; after whose comming it was not long, but the pagans within the citie seeing their hope taken to be vndermined, and towers ouerthrowne, were driuen by compolition to escape with life and linn, to surrender the citie vnto the two kings. Another great helpe to the christians in winning the citie was this: In the said citie of Achon where was a secret christian among the Sarazens, who in time of the siege there bled at sundrie times to call ouer the wals into the campe of the christians, certaine bils written in Hebrue, Greke, and Latine, wherein hee disclosed vnto the christians from time to time the doings and counsels of the enemies, aduertising them how and by what way they should worke, and what to beware: and also by his letters began thus, In nomine patris, & filij, & spiritus sancti, Amen. By reason whereof the christians were much aduantaged in their procedings. But this was a great heauinesse vnto them, that neither he would vtter his name, or when the citie was got they could euer vnderstand who he was. Ex chronico manuscripto, de gestis Richardi.

To make of a long siege a short narration, vpon the twelfth day of Iulie in the yeare aforesaid, the princes and captaines of the pagans vpon agreement reforted vnto the tent of the templarics, to common with the two kings touching peace and giuing vp of their citie; the some of which peace was thus: That the kings should haue the citie of Achon freely and fully deliuered vnto them, with all which was within, and fiue hundred captiues of the christians should bee restored vnto them, which were in Achon; also the holy crosse should bee to them rendred, and a thousand christian captiues, with two hundred horsemen, wholesome: they themselues would cause out of all them which were in the power of Saladine; and and besides they should giue to the kings two hundred thousand Bilants, so that they themselues would remaine as pledges in the kings hands for the performance hereof, that if in forme daies these foresaid couenants were not accomplished, they would abide the kings mercie touching life and linn. These couenants being agreed vpon, the kings sent their soldiers and seruants into the citie, to take one hundred of the richest of the best of the citie, and to bring them vp to the tents vnder strong keeping, and the residue they permitted to be kept in houses as pleasers, ministring vnto them according to their necessities: to whom notwithstanding this they permitted, that so many of them as would bee baptised and receiue the faith of Christ, should be free to go whither they would. Whereupon many there were of the pagans, which for feare of death pretended to bee baptised; but afterward so same as they could, reuolted againe to the Saladine. For the which it was afterwards commanded by the kings, that none of them should bee baptised against their liuste.

The thirteenth day of the said moneth of Iulie, king Philip of France, and king Richard, after they had obteined the possession of Achon, diuided betweene them all things therein conteined, as well the people as gold and siluer, with all other furniture whatsoeuer was remaining in the citie: who in dividing the spoile, were so gods caruers vnto themselues, that many knights and barrons with other souldiers, who had there suffered the whole trauell two yeares together, about the siege, seeing the kings to take all into themselues, and their part to be but little, retreated themselues without the vtter most trench, and there after consultation had together, sent word to the kings that they would leaue and forsake them, vnlesse they were made partakers also of the gaines for the which they had so long trauelled. To whom answere was sent againe by the kings, that their wils should be satisfied. Howbeit because King Richard requireth of the French king to remaine three yeeres with his army, but he would not.

The twentieth day of July king Richard speaking with the French king, desired him that they two with their armies would bind themselues by oth to remaine there full in the land of Hierusalem the space of three yeres, for the winning & recouering againe of those countries. But he would sweare (he said) no such oth: and so the next day after king Richard with his wife and sister entreth into the city of Achon, and placed there himselfe in the kings palace, the French king remaining in the houses of the templaries, where he continued till the end of the month. So about the beginning of the month of August, Philip the French king, after that he & king Richard had made agreement between Guido and Conradus the marques, about the kingdom of Hierusalem, went from Achon to Tyrus, notwithstanding king Richard and all the princes of the christian army with great intreaty desired him to tary, shewing what a shame it were for him to come so far, and now to leaue vndone that for which he came; and on the third of August from Tyrus departed, leauing his halfe part of the city of Achon in the hands of the foresaid Conradus marquis. After whose departure the pagans refused to keepe their couenants made, who neither would reliuer the holy crosse nor the money, nor their captiues, sending word to king Richard, that if he beheaded the pledges left with him at Achon, they would chop off the heads of such captiues of the christians, which were in their hands. Shortly after this, the Saladine sending great gifts to king Richard, requested the times limitted for beheading of the captiues to be prorogued: but the king refused to take his gifts, and to grant his request. Whereupon the Saladine caused all the christian captiues within his possession forthwith to be beheaded, which was the eighteenth day of August. Which albeit king Richard vnderstood, yet would not hee preuent the time afore limitted for the execution of his prisoners, being the twentith of August. Upon which day hee caused the prisoners of the Sarazens, openly in the sight of the Saladines army to lose their heads: the number of whom came to 2500, saue only that certaine of the principall of them he reserued for purposes and considerations, especially to make exchange for the holy crosse, and certaine others of the christian captiues.

After this, king Richard purposed to besiege the citie of Ioppe, where, by the way betweene Achon and Ioppe, neere to a towne called Assur, Saladine with a great multitude of his Sarazens came fiercely against the kings rearward: but through Gods mercifull grace, in the same battell the kings warriors acquitted them so well, that the Saladine was put to flight (whom the christians pursued the space of three miles) and left the same day many of his nobles and captaines in such sort (as it was thought) that the Saladine was not put to such confusion forty yeres before: and but one christian captaine, called Iames Auernus, in that conflict was ouerthrowne. From thence, king Richard proceeding further, went to Ioppe, and then to Ascalon, where he found first the citie of Ioppe forsaken of the Sarazens, who durst not abide the kings comming. Ascalon the Saladine threw downe to the ground, and likewise forsooke the whole land of Syria, through all which land the king had free passage without resistance, neither durst the Sarazen prince encounter after he met with king Richard. Of all which his architenances the said king Richard sent his letters of certificat as well into England, as also to the abbat of Clara Valle in France, well hoping that he (God willing) should bee able to make his repaire againe to them by Easter next.

A briefe story of William bishop of Ely the kings chancellor.

The story of William the proud bishop of Ely.

William Longchampe bishop of Ely, lord chancellor and the popes legat.

The church and bels of Poyke suspended, because the lord legat was not set in with procession.

Bishop of Ely setteth the castell of Lincolne for him the bishop of Durham.

Hugo bishop of Durham vexed by William bishop of Ely.

And now to leaue king Richard a while in the field, let vs make a step into England, and take a little what is done at home while the king was abrode, and so returne to the king againe. For heard before how king Richard at his setting forth, committed the gouernment of the realme to Hugo bishop of Durham, and to William bishop of Ely; so that to the bishop of Durham was committed the keeping of the castell of Windsor. The other, which was the bishop of Ely, had the keeping of the tower of London, about which hee caused a great ditch with a rampire to be cast. Which is yet remaining. Furthermore, to these two bishops the king assigned foure other chiefe iustices, which iointly with them should haue the hearing and ouerlight of all causes, as well to the clergy as the laitie appertaining: to wit, Hugh Bardolfe, William Marshall, Geffrey Peterson, and William Brwer. But the bishop of Ely was the principall, or at least he that tooke most vpon him, who both was the kings chancellor, and bought with his money to be the popes legat through England, Ireland and Scotland, as is before specified. Touching the excessiue pride and pompe of which bishop, his ruslings outragious, and all most shamefull, it would make a long tragedy to discourse the whole circumstances at full: onely to demonstrate certaine specialties thereof for our present purpole, it may suffice.

Vi iusti indicauerunt clerum & populum, verba Isa.

Foure chiefe iustices with two bishops appointed ouerseers of the realme in the kings absence.

First, this William called Longchampe, being thus aduanced by the king to be his high chancellor, and chiefe iustice of the realme, and also the popes legat, to shew abode the authority of his legatship, began to suspend the canons, clerks, and vicars of the church of S. Peter in Yorke, because they receiued him not with procession: vnder which interdiction hee held them, till they were faine at last both canons, clerks and vicars to fall downe at his feet, causing all their bels to be let downe out of the steeple. After this commeth Hugo bishop of Durham, whom the king sent home out of Normandy with his letters, who meeting with the foresaid William bishop of Ely in the towne of Yorke, shewed him the kings letters, wherein was granted to him the keeping of Windsor castell, & to be the kings iustice for the riuer of Humber, to the borders of Scotland. To the which letters the chancellor answered, that the Kings commandement should be done, and so brought him with him to Sudwell, where he take him and kept him fast, till he was forced at last to surrender to him the castell of Windsor, and other things which the king had committed to his custody: and moreouer was constrained to leaue with the said chancellor, Henry de Puteaco his own sonne, and Gilbert Lacie for pledges and hostages of his fidelity, to be true to the king and the realme. And thus the bishop of Durham being set at liberty, went to his towne of Houeden, where after he had made his abode a few daies, commeth thither Hubert Longchampe the chancellors brother, and William Stutuill, with a great company of armed men sent by the chancellor to apprehend him. But the said bishop of Durham putting in sureties not to depart that towne without licence of the king and of the chancellor, there still remained till hee got letters to be sent to the king, signifying how he was vsed. Whereupon the king writing his letters from Marsilia to the bishop of Ely, for the said bishop of Durham free, and confirmed to him all the possessions and grants that he before had giuen him.

William bishop of Ely granteth with Frenchmen and Flemmings.

It is almost incredible to thinke how intemperatly this bishop and chancellor misused himselfe, after the kings departure into Syria, in excesse of pride, and in cruel exactions and oppressions of the kings subiects. First his fellow iustices whom the king ioined with him for gouernment of the realme, he vtterly reiected and refused to heare their counsell, reputing none to be equall with him in all the realme. Neither was he contented with the authority of a prelat, but plaied both king and priest in the realme. All castels, lo: ships, abbies, churches, and all other appropriations belonging to the right of the king, he claimed to himselfe. And by vertue of his legatship when he came to any bishops house, abby, priory, or any other religious house, he brought with him such a superfluity of men, horses, dogs, and hawkes, that the house was worse for it three yeres after. For commonly he vsed euer vnder 1500 horses, of chaplens, pricks, and other seruing men waiting vpon him. From the clergy and laity he take away their churches, their bowsons, their linings and lands, to bestow vpon his nephewes and other waiting chaplens to serue his vain glory, or else conuerted them to his own vse, to maintaine his pompe and vanity. In getting and gathering of treasures hee had no measure, in misspending the same he kept no order. And that no vice should be wanting where such auarice taketh root, the money which he wrongfully got, he committed to the banke to be increased by vsury. What wantonnesse and lasciuiousnesse was vsed in that so riotous life, the stories doe shame to declare it. All craftsmen runnagates, idle bellies, and light persons where soeuer hee went, hanged vpon his court. To increase the vaine iollity of this roiall prelat, there was lacking no kind of musical instruments and melodious noise, to refresh belike his wearied senses, to much beaten and macerated with continuall labor and study of hunting, hawking, and gaming; of preaching and reading I should haue said.

Bishop of Ely neuer rode vnder 1500 horse.

His vanity.

His vsury.

His colorous and vnlitterall life.

Whereby, this foresaid prelat, bearing the authority both of the king and of the pope, kept such a fire in England, that the whole realme was at his beeke with cap and knee crouching to him: neither durst any man rich or poore displease him, yea none in all the realme so noble or worshipfull, but was glad to please him, accounting themselues happy if they might stand in his fauor. At his table all noblemens children did serue and wait vpon him, with whom hee coupled in marriages his neeces and kinswomen. And when any that stood waiting before him durst once call by his eies, or bid not demurely make downeward lyth & gent, he had a staffe in his hand with a pricke sharpe set with siluer bled to pricke them; learning to like by the carter his father, which bled at the plough or cart to driue his oxen. Furthermore, as kings vse to haue their gard about them, so he because he would not also be vngarded, refusing men of the English nation, had his waiters and warders most of Frenchmen and Flemmings.

The bishop of Ely granteth a generall commission to the king of Scots.

It happened after this, in the yere 1191, that a great discord rose between Iohn earle of Morton the kings brother, with other states of the realme, and the said William bishop of Ely; so that vniuersally they all wrote once to the king concerning the misgouernment and enormities of the said bishop. Who vnderstanding of the cale, sent from Pesiana into England, Walter archbishop of Rone, & William Marshall earle, vnto the bishop of Ely with letters, commanding him that in all his doings he should associat vnto him the said archbishop of Rone, William Sparhall, Geffrey Peterson, William Brwer,

Anno 1191.

A generall complaint to the king of Scots.

Buer, and Hugo Bardolse above mentioned. Who when they came into England, durst not deliuer their letters, dreading the displeasure of the chancellor; for he despised all the commandements of the king, nor would suffer any fellow to come with him in his kingdome.

Another difference betweene Iohn the kings brother, and Longchamp bishop of Ely.

Hitherto haue you heard of the glorious vanity of this lordly legat and chancellor of the realme: now yee shall heare of his shamefull fall, after his chancellerie exaltation. For shortly after this following another breach betweene the said earle Iohn the kings brother and him, about the besieging of the castell of Lincolne. Concerning the which castell the said Iohn sent him word, that vnlesse he raised his siege the sooner from thence, he would send him away by force of sword. The bishop either not able to make his party good, or not daring to resist, thought best to fall to some composition with the earle, and so did. In which composition, he was contented against his will, by mediation of diuers bishops and others, to make surrender not only of the castell of Lincolne, but also of Nottingham, of Tickhill, Wallingford, and many more, which were then committed to the custody of sundry men of worship and honour. And thus was that controuersie agreed, wherein the bishop of Ely began a little to be cut shorter.

It followed then not long after in the same yere, that another like businesse began to kindle betweene Geffrey the archbishop of Yorke the kings brother, and the forsaid glorious bishop of Ely vpon this occasion. He heard before how the king at his setting out, left order that earle Iohn and Geffrey his brethren should not enter into the realme the space of three yeres after his departure; howbeit his brother Iohn was shortly after released of that bond: and also after that, how king Richard being at Messana, sent his mother Elenor to the pope for his brother Geffrey (elected before to the sea of Yorke) to be consecrated archbishop. Whereupon the said Geffrey being consecrated through licence of pope Celestine, by the archbishop of Turon, the said Geffrey ensuing after his consecration desired rest time, but would needs come into England. Whereof the bishop of Ely hauing intelligence, sent him word being at Willand in Flanders, not to presume to aduenture into the realme, contrary to his oth made to king Richard before; commanding moreouer, that if he came, he should be apprehended. All which notwithstanding, the archbishop letted not for all that, but needs would repaire to his sea, and so arriued at Douer in the month of September, where the chancellors men stood on the sea side to apprehend him; but he by changing his apparel, & fashiues of his horse, escaped their hands, & came to the monks house of Douer. But the chancellors men whom he sent to take him, beset the church of the monks round about; so that in no wise he could auoid their hands.

Another battle betweene the chancellor and Geffrey archbishop of Yorke the kings brother.

To make the story short: As the archbishop on a day, when he had said masse, was standing at the alter with his garments vpon him, the rude souldiers hauing little god manners, & lesse deuotion, feared not boldly to rush into the church, and there laid hands vpon the archbishop as hee stood; take him, bound him, and dragged him through dirt and mire, and as we vse to say) through thicke and thin, and so committed him to Matthew Clerke their constable to be kept: whereat the people greatly disdained, seeing him that was a kings sonne, and the brother of a king so to be intreated. The hearing thereof, when it came to the eares of earle Iohn his brother, hee being not a little offended therewith, sent to know of the chancellor, whether this was his doing or not. To whom when the chancellor sent answer againe, and flatly confessed the fact to be his; then the earle sent commandement that his brother should be deliuered, and so he was. Which then comming to London, made his complaint to the earle his brother, and to other nobles of the realm, of the iniuries done to him by the chancellor. Whereupon the earle sent for the said chancellor, and appointed a day peremptory for him to appeare before the whole body of the counsell, to make answere to such iniuries as he had done, both to the archbishop of Yorke, and also to the bishop of Durham aboue mentioned. But the chancellor driuing off the time with delaies, would neither come nor send. Then the earle with the bishops about him, made their iourny towards London, to haue the matter there handled in great audience.

This cruell handling of Geffrey archbishop of Yorke, by the bishop of Ely the popes legat and chancellor of England.

Geffrey archbishop of Yorke deliuered out of prison by commandement of earle Iohn his brother.

The chancellor seeing that, withdrew himselfe from Windsor to the city of London, where by the way it happened that the seruants of the earle and of the chancellor meeting, did skirmish together. In which scrap one of the earles family was slain; but yet his men had the better, and the chancellor with his men were put to flight, and so fled to the tower, where they did hide themselues. The next day after (which was about the twelfth day of October) earle Iohn the kings brother, and the archbishop of Rone, with all the bishops, earles and barons, and citizens of London assembled together in Pauls church; where many and great accusations were laid against the said chancellor: so that in fine it was agreed in that assembly, that the said chancellor should be deposed, and in his place was substituted the archbishop of Rone, according to the tenor of the kings letters sent from Messana; which was, that certaine other persons should be associated with the chancellor for the gouernment of the realme; by whose counsell if he would not be directed, the archbishop of Rone should be set in his place, and he to be deposed. The third day after this, the chancellor finding promised not to depart out of the realme before hee had deliuered out of his hands all such castels, the keeping whereof he committed to certaine fozreners and strangers: and for assurance thereof, he gaue his two brethren and chamberlain for pledges, and so went to Canturbury, where he said he would take the crosse of a pilgrim, and leaue the crosse of his legatship.

The bishop of Ely resigneth his castels.

Now when he was come to the castell of Douer, and there had remained a few daies, contrary to his promise made, his purpose was to take ship, and to passe ouer the seas. And because he durst not doe it openly, he deuised a new kind of disguising, decking himselfe in the apparel of a woman, and so as goodly as he was, went to the sea side in his womans weed, hauing in his hand a metyard, and on his arme a piece of linnen cloth. And thus as he was sitting vpon a rocke waiting for his ship to come and conuey him ouer, a certaine fisherman espying him, and supposing him to be an harlot, came to him, and so with struggling with him, found him as hee was indeed to be a man in likenes of a woman: wherat he wondered and began to make an outcry vpon him. But the bishops seruants being not far off, came running and dilled him as well as they could.

The bishop of Ely disclosed himselfe in womans apparell.

A fisherman taketh the bishop of Ely to be a woman.

The fisherman then going to the next village, and there belike declaring what he had seene, to try out the matter further, came out certaine women, who seeing the linnen cloth hanging at his arme, began to question with him of the price of his cloth, and what he would take for it: but to this he would answer neuer a word, but smiled vpon them. Whereat they mouing with themselues, and whispering one with another, at last with their hands were so bold as to plucke downe his muffler, and then by his beard new found him indeed to be a man, and so with a loud exclamation, raised the village vpon him, and would haue fallen vpon him with stones. Then came running a great multitude both of men and women, who wondering at him as birds are wont at an owle, laid hands vpon him, and pluckt him downe to the ground, haling and drawing him by the sleeues and collar of his gowne through stones and rocks, whereby he was shrewdly hurt. His seruants once or twice made out to rescue their old maister, or new mistris, but could not for the preasse of the people, who beating him with their fists, and spitting at him, dyed him through the whole towne, and so with shame enough at length laid him in a darke cellar in stead of a prison, at whom all the country about wondered and cried out. In conclusion, earle Iohn hearing thereof, within eight daies after sent word, that they should deliuer him and let him goe.

Put into a darke cellar in stead of a prison.

Set at liberty by Iohn earle of Morton.

The bishop of Ely hauing intelligence, sailed ouer as he could to Flanders, where he had but cold welcomming: from thence he went to Paris, where he gaue Pantrinus their bishop three score marks of siluer to be receiued in with procession, & so he was. Then returned he into Normandie. But the archbishop of Rone there gaue commandement y the church doores should be locked, and no seruice said so long as he there remained. The bishop seeing that, directed his letters and messengers to pope Celestine, and also to king Richard into Syria, signifying to them how Iohn the earle of Morton and his complices had handled him, and expulsed him out of the realme, requiring that he might be restored againe to that was taken from him, and also offering himselfe to be tried by the law for that he had done; so that if he bring thould be found in any thing that he had done, he was readie to satisfie the kings contentation in all things wherein vnsitly he could be charged.

The bishop of Ely complaineth to the king and the pope.

Vpon this pope Celestine inflamed with an apostolicall zeale in the behalfe of the said bishop of Elie his legat, wrote a sharp and thundering letter to the archbishops, bishops, and priats of England, commanding them by his authozitie apostolicall, that for so much as the iniuries done to his legat, did redound to the contumelie of the whole mother church of Rome, they thould not faile therefore, but with seuere censures of the church, that is, with booke, bell, & candle, proceed as well against the said Iohn earle of Morton, as also all other by him to euer had, or should attempt any violence or iniurie against the said his legat bishop of Elie, with no lesse seueritie then if the said iniurie should be offered to the person of the pope himselfe, or any other of his brethren the cardinals, &c.

Benet and Steuen Ridle chancellor to earle Iohn the kings brother, to which earle he referred a further day of respit before he thould be excommunicat, with a number of other more beside these. Howbeit the said bishop of Elie could find none to execute this commandement of the pope. Then they with a generall consent incote againe to king Richard, complaining of the intollerable abuses of the said said bishop his chancellor. In like sort the said chancellor also complaining of them, wrote his letters to the king, signifying how earle Iohn his brother went about to vsurpe his kingdome, and would also shortly set the crowne vpon his owne head, vnlesse he made the more speed homeward. By hearing then was hasse in repulsing the Saladine, and prepared to lay siege against Hierusalem, and got Sclauonia, with diuers other townes from the Saracens, which was in the yere 1192, hauing diuers conflicts in the meane space with the Saladine, & euer put him to the worse. As the king was thus preparing to lay his siege against Hierusalem, the Saladine glad to fall to some composition with § king, sent vnto him, that if he would restore to him againe Sclauonia in as good state as it was when he tooke it, he would grant to him § to all christians in the land of Hierusalem truce for three yeres, and offered himselfe thereunto to be sworne. The king seeing the duke of Burgundie and the Frenchmen to shrinke from him, and his own men to decay, and also his money and health to diminish, but especiallie for that he vnderstood by the bishop of Elie his chancellor, the French king to set vp Iohn his brother to possesse his kingdome, being counselled thereto by the Templaries, take the truce offered of the Saracens, & so began to draw homeward.

In this meane while much grudge and strife increased more and more betweene the bishop of Elie and the archbishop of Rone aboue specified, insomuch that the archbishop being excommunicate, sent vp his clerks to pope Celestine to complaine of the bishop: but the pope euer fed the bishop in purgation. At last he sent two of his cardinals, to wit, Octauianus bishop of Hostia, and Iordanus de Fossa noua, to breake the strife betweene the bishop of Elie, and the archbishop of Rone.

Datum apud Ritheomtum 5. calendas Ianuar.

King Richard thus being traiterously taken and sold to the emperour by the duke of Austrige for 60000 markes, was there kept in captiuity a yere and three months. In some stories it is affirmed, that king Richard returning out of Asia, came to Italy with prosperous wind, where he desired of the pope to bee absolued from an oth made against his will, and could not obtain it. And so setting out from thence towards England, passing by the country of Conradus the marques, whose death (he being slaine a little before) was fainly imputed by the French king to the king of England, and there traiterously was taken, as is before said, by Limpolous duke of Austrige. Albert in another story I find the matter more credible set forth, which saith thus: That king Richard heing the brother of this Limpolous, playing with him at cheese in the French kings court. And Limpolous taking his aduantage, was more cruell against him, and deliuered him, as is said, to the emperor, in whose custody he was detained during the time aboue mentioned, a yere and three months. During the which time of the kings indurance, the French king in the meane season stirred war in Normandy. And earle Iohn the kings brother made stir and inuaded England; but the barons and bishops of the land mightily withstood him, and besieged him in the castell of Windsor, where they tooke from him all the castels and munitions which before he had got. Thus the earle seeing no hope to preuaile in England, and suspecting the deliuerance of the king his brother, made into France, and kept with the French king: at length it was so agreed & concluded with the emperor, that king Richard should be released for an hundred thousand pounds, of the which mony part should remaine to the duke of Austrige, the rest should be the emperors. The sum of which mony was here gathered and made in England of chalices, crosses, shrines, candlesticks, and other church plate, also with publike contribution of friers, abbies, and other subiects of the realme. Whereof part was presently paid, and for the residue remaining hostages and pledges were taken, which was about the fifth yere of his raigne. And then it was obtained of the pope, that priests might celebrate with chalices of latin and tin, and so was granted and continued long after, which mine author in his chronicle intituled Eulogium, doth testifie himselfe to haue seene. At what time this foresaid mony was paid, and the hostages giuen for the ransome of this king. I haue an old scrap that saith, how the foresaid duke of Austrige shortly after was plagued by God with sine sundry plagues: first, with burning of his chiefe townes: secondly, with the destroying of ten thousand of his men in a great flouid, happening no man could tell how: thirdly, by turning all the eares of his corne-field into worines: fourthly, by taking away almost all the nobles of his land by death: fifthly, by breaking his owne leg falling from his horse, whicheg he was compelled to cut off with his own hands, and after died vpon the same: who then is said at his death to forgiue king Richard fifte thousand marks, and sent home the hostages that were with him. Ex variis locis. The book intituled Eulogium before mentioned, saieth thus: that the said Limpolous duke of Austrige fell in displeasure with the bishop of Rome, and died excommunicat the next yere after, being the yere one thousand one hundred ninety six.

The iust punishment of God vpon the duke of Austrige.

Thus the said king Richard being ransomed, as hath been declared, from the couetous captiuity of the emperor, was restored againe, and made his repaire into England. At whose turne, earle Iohn his brother resorting vnto him with humble submission, desired to be pardoned of his trangressions. To whom king Richard answering againe; Would God (saith he) this your trespasse as it dieth with me in obliuion, so it may rest remaine with you in remembrance, and so gently forgaue him. And after he had again recouered his holds and castles, caused himselfe to be crowned again. Which done, he made his power against the French king, and draue him out of Normandy. After that, he turned his voiage against the Welshmen, and subdued them.

The cruell dealing of God vpon the duke of Austrige.

Anno 1196

The nert yere following, which was the yere 1197, Philip the French king brake the truce made betweene him and king Richard, whereupon the king was compelled to saile ouer againe to Normandy to withstand the malice of his enemie. About which time, my story recordeth of one called of some Fulco; some say he was the archbishop of Rone called Gualter. This Fulco being then in England, and comming to the kings presence, said vnto him with great courage and boldnesse, Thou hast, O mighty king, three daughters very vicious and of euil disposition; take good heed of them, and bestowe them vnto for them good husbands, lest by vntimely bestowing of the same, thou shalt not onely incur great hurt and damage, but also vtter ruine and destruction to thy selfe. To whom the king in a rage said: Thou lying and mocking hypocrit, thou knowest not where thou art: so what thou saiest: I thanke thou art mad, or not well in thy wits; for I haue neuer a daughter, as all the world knoweth, and therefore thou open lier get thee out of our presence. To whom Fulco answered, No, and like your grace, I lie not, but say truth: for you haue three daughters which continually frequent your court, and wholly possesse your person, and such three whores and naughty packs as neuer the like hath been heard of: I meane, mischieuous pride, greedy couetousnesse, and filthy luxurity; and therfore againe I say, O king, beware of them, and out of hand prouide marriages for them, lest in not so doing, they vtterly vndo both thy selfe and all the whole realme.

The which his words the King take in good part, with confession of himselfe, and confession of the same. Whereupon incontinently hee calleth his lords and barons before him, vnto whom hee declared the communing and monition of Fulco, who had willed him to beware of his three daughters, pride, auarice, and luxurity, with counsell out of hand to marry them, least further discommodity should ensue both to him and to the whole realme; whose god counsell, my lords, I intend to follow, not doubting of all your consents thereunto. Wherefore here before you all, I giue my daughter Sicelling pride to wife vnto the proud Templars; my greedy daughter auarice to the couetous order of the Cistercian monks; and last of all, my filthy daughter luxurity to the riotous prelates of the church, whom I thinke to be very meete men for her; and so seuerally well agreeing to all their natures, that the like matches in this our realme are not to bee found for them. And thus much concerning Fulco.

Not long after this, it befell that a certaine noble personage (lord of Limosine in little Britaine, Widomarus by name) found a great substance of treasure both of gold and siluer hid in the ground, whereof a great part he sent to King Richard, as their lord and prince ouer the whole country. Which the King refused, saying; he would either haue all, or none, for that he was the principal chieftain ouer the land. But the finder would not condiscend to that. Wherefore the King laid siege to a castell of his called Galuz, thinking the treasure to lie there. But the keepers and warders of the castell, seeing themselues not sufficient to withstand the King, offered to him the castell, desiring to depart with life and armor. To this the King would in no wise grant, but bid them to auenter the castell against, and to defend it in all the forcible wise they could. It to befell, that as the King with the duke of Babant went about the castel, viewing the places thereof, a soudiar within, named Bertandus Gordoun, shrouche the King with an arrow in the arme, whereupon the yron remaining and festering in the wound, the King within nine daies after died; who because he was not content with the halfe of the treasure that another man found, lost all his owne treasure that he had. The King being thus wounded, caused the man that stroke him to be brought vnto him, and alled the cause of him why he so wounded him. Who answered him again, as the story saith, that he thought to kill rather then to be killed: and what punishment soeuer he should sustaine, he was content, so that he might kill him which had before killed his father and brethren. The King hearing his words, freely forgaue him, and caused an hundred shillings to be giuen him. Albricus (as the story addeth) after the death of the King, the duke of Babant, after great torments, caused him to bee hanged. Ex hist. Albrici Trium Fontium.

Another story affirmeth, and Gisburne partly doth testifie the same, that a little before the death of king Richard, three abbats of the order Cisterciam came to him, to whom he was confessed. And when he saw them come what they at his absolution, had these words: that he did willingly commit his body to the earth to be eaten of wormes, and his soule to the fire of purgatorie, there to be tormented till the iudgement, in the hope of God his mercy. Ex Iornalensi, Gisburn. & alijs.

About the raigne of this King, the said Ioualensis maketh mention of Roger archbishop of Yorke, which put out of his church the monks, and placed for them secular priests, saying, that he would rather vse such clericall shauelings to be guiders to women in beds, then to abominable monks; and that Thurstinus did fiue times worse in all his life, then in building that house for monks, &c. Another story I haue which saith, that this was the bishop not of Yorke, but of Couentrie.

The King not long after departed without issue, and John his brother raigned after him: in whom, although some vices may worthily be reprehended, especially for his incontinent and too much licentious life, yet was he farre from that deseruing, for the which hee hath been so ill reported of diuers writers: who being led more with affection of popery, then with true iudgement and due consideration, depraued his doings more then the sincere truth of the history will beare them. Concerning which history, after so many writers, we thought also to bestow a little labor, although in this matter we cannot be so long as I would, and as the matter requireth.

King John.

King Iohn.

After the death of king Richard, called Cœur de lion, raigned his brother John earle of Morton. Afterward the archbishop put the crowne on his head, and sware him to defend the church, and to maintaine the same in her good lawes, and to destroy the ill. And except he thought not in his mind to doe this, the archbishop charged him not to presume to take on him this dignity. And on S. Iohn Baptists day next following, King John sailed into Normandy and came to Rone, where he was royally receiued, and truce concluded betweene him and the French King for a time. And thither came to him the earle of Flanders, and all other lords of France that were of King Richards band and friendship, and were sworne vnto him.

Not long after this, Philip the French King made Arthur knight, and tooke his homage for Normandy, Britaine, and all other his possessions beyond the sea, and promised him helpe against King John. After this, King John and the French King talked together with their lords about one houres space, and the French King asked so much land for himselfe and knight Arthur, that King John would grant him none; and so departed in wrath.

The same yere a legat came into France, and commanded the King in paine of interdiction to deliuer one Peter out of prison, that was elected a bishoppicke, and thereupon he was deliuered.

And after that the legat came into England, and commanded King John vnder paine of interdiction, to deliuer the archbishop whom he had kept as prisoner two yeres; which the king denied to do, till he had paid him fiue thousand marks, because he tooke him in harnesse in a field against him, and sware him vpon his deliuerance, that hee should neuer weare harnesse against any christian man.

This time diuorce was made betweene King John and his wife, daughter of the earle of Glocester, because they were in the third degree of kinred. And after, by the counsell of the French King, King John wedded Isabel, daughter of the earle of Angoulisme: and then Arthur of Britaine did homage to King John for Britaine and others.

At this time fell strife betweene King John and Geffrey the archbishop of Yorke for diuers causes: first, because he would not suffer a permit the shiriffe of Yorke in such affaires as hee had to do for the King within his diocesse: secondly, because he did also excommunicat the said shriffe: thirdly, because he would not saile with him into Normandy, to make the marriage betweene Lewis the French Kings sonne, and his niece, &c.

After this, in the yere of our Lord 1202, Philip the French King (in a communication betweene King John and him) required that the said King John should part with all his lands in Normandy and Britaine which he had beyond the sea, vnto Arthur his nephew, and that incontinent, or else he would war against him, and so did. For when King John denied that request, the next day following the French King with the said Arthur set vpon certain of his townes and castels in Normandie, and put him to much disquietnesse. But he the Lord so prouiding, which is the giuer of all victory, had such repulse at the Englishmens hands, that they pursuing the Frenchmen in their flight, did so follow them to their hold, and so inforced vpon them, that not only they lost the said Arthur prisoner with many other of the Frenchmen, but also gaue such an ouerthrow to the rest, that none was there left to beare tidings home. This Arthur was nephew to King John, and son to Geffrey which was the elder son to John. For King Henry the second (to make the matter more euident) had eight children, one William, which died in his childhood: the second, Henry, which died also his father being yet aliue: the third Geffrey earle of Britaine, which likewise deceased in his fathers daies, leauing behind him two children, Arthur and Becca: the fourth, Richard Cœur de lion: the fift John now raigning, and three other daughters besides. The same Arthur being thus taken in war, was brought before the King at the castell of Falaise in Normandy, who being erhorted with many gentle words to leaue the French King, and to incline to his vncle, answered againe stoutly and with great indignation, requiring the kingdome of England with all the other dominions thereto belonging, to be restored to him, as to the lawfull heire of the crowne. By reason whereof, he (prouoking the Kings displeasure against him) was put to the tower of Rone, where at length (whether by leaping into the ditch, thinking to make his escape, or whether by some other prouy hand, or by what chance, it is not yet agreed vpon in stories) hee finished his life. By occasion whereof, the foresaid King John was had after in great suspition, whether iustly or iniustly, the Lord knoweth.

The yere following, histriographers write, that King John for lacke of rescue, lost all his holds and possessions in Normandy, through the force of the French King.

After these losses, came other troubles vpon him, with other as great or more great enemies (that is, with the pope and his popelings) by occasion of chusing of the archbishop of Canturbury, as in this history following by Gods grace is to be declared.

The yere of our Lord 1205, about the month of July, Hubert the archbishop of Canturbury deceased: whose decease after it was in Canturbury to the monks knowne, and afore his body was yet committed to the earth: the younger sort of the monks there gathered themselues togither at midnight, and elected their superior Reignold, without the kings licence, or yet knowledge priuily placed him in the metropolitical seat, singing Te Deū at midnight. And because the king should not make their election void, they charged him by vertue of his oth to kepe all secret by the way, and to shew nothing what was done before he came to the pope: but he contrary to his oth, so soone as he came into Flanders opened al abrode all the matter, and vttered their counsell: thereupon the monks being not a little grieued with him, sent him priuily vnto the court of Rome out of hand. The next day the elder monks sent to the king, desiring him of his gracious licence canonically to chuse their archbishop. The king most gently and fauourably granted their petition, requiring them instantly, and desiring that for his sake they would chuse Iauoz to John Gray, then bishop of Norwich, as they did indeed, erecting him into that seat of their high primacy. Moreouer, because the authority of kings and princes was then but small in their owne dominion, without the popes consent and confirmation to the same: he sent also to Rome of his owne charges to haue the foresaid election ratified by the pope. The suffragans of Canturbury then (being not a little offended at these two elections) sent speedily to Rome to haue them both stopped, for that they had not been of counsell with them. And hereupon at the last grew a most prodigious tumult.

* In this yere the clergy grew so vnruly, that they neglected their charge, and thereby incensed the kings displeasure so sore against them, that he take order about their goods of such as in that case were faulty: as shall appeare more manifestly by that which followeth.

A letter of king John touching the lands and goods of such clerks as refuse to celebrat diuine seruice.

R Ex omnibus de episcopatu Lincolnie clericis & laicis salutem. Sciatis quod a die festa proxime ante Floridum pascha tis commisimus, &c.

In English.

The king to all clerks and lay people within the bishoprick of Lincolne, greeting. Know ye that from monday next before the feast of Easter, we haue committed to William of Cornehill archdeacon of Huntington, & to Ioseline of Canuil all the lands and goods of the abbats and priors, and of all the religious persons, and also of all clerks within the bishoprick of Lincolne, which will not from that time celebrat diuine seruice. And we command you, that from thence you assist them in our bailiffes, and beleiue them in those things which they shall tell you priuately on our behalfe. Witnesse our selfe at Clarendon the eighteenth day of March, in the ninth yeere of our raigne.

The like was written to all within the bishoprick of Ely. So that hereby we see the dissolutenes and wilfulnes of those popish churchmen, whom conscience of discharging their duty did so little moue, as that they thought vpon nothing lesse, sith the king was driuen to vse such assaults and baynes against them. But to proceed in this troublesome election: you shall vnderstand, that the next yeere after, the suffragans of the prouince of Canturburyon the one side, and the monks of Canturbury on the other side, came afore the pope with their brawling matter. First the monks presenting Reginald their superiod, desired that their election might be confirmed. The suffragans likewise complained that the monks would presume to chuse the archbishop without their consent, and therefore desired by diuers reasons the first election to be of none effect. The pope deeding the matter betweene both, pronounced with the monks, charging the suffragans and bishops to meddle no more with that election, but to let the monks alone. The monks of Canturbury now hauing the whole election in their owne hands, sell also at square among themselues, the younger sort with the elder. The younger sort which had chosen Reginald their superiod, would that election to stand. The elder sort of the monks replied againe, saying: That the first election was done by stealth, and by night, and by the younger part; also without the counsell of other monks. Duer and besides, it was done without the kings licence or appointment, and without the due solemnity thereunto belonging.

And as concerning our election (said they) it was done in the cleere light of the day, by which it had authority in presence of our liege lord the king, and his counsell being willing to the same.

This allegation thus proponed, the suffragans procter or man of law stood forth, and proued the former election to be good, and this latter to be void and of no value, for this cast. Wherefore the first election (saith he) were it of vnlaw, ye ought first by the law to haue condemned it afore ye should haue presumed to the second; but thus ye did not: therefore is this your latter doing no election at al, and the first therefore is rather to be ratified then yours. When they had thus multiplied talk on both sides, with many friuolous allegations a long time, and could not agree vpon one person, pope Innocent condemned both their elections, commanding them to chuse Stephan Langton, then cardinall of S. Chrysogon for their archbishop. The monks then answered, that they durst not so doe without consent of their king, and for that it was preiudiciall to their ancient liberties. The pope by and by (saith the text) as one in a furie, taking the words out of their mouthes, said thus vnto them: We will ye to know, that we haue full power and authority ouer the church of Canturbury; neither are we wont to take the consent of princes: therfore we command you in paine of our great curse, that ye chuse him only whom we haue appointed.

The monks at these words abashed and terrified, though they much murmured in their hearts, yet consented they all vt one, and thereupon sang Te Deum. Only doctor Helias Brantfield withdrew himselfe from that election, whom the king had sent for the admission of the bishop of Norwich.

Thus was Stephan Langton (in the high church of Vlcester, by the popes hand) made archbishop of Canturbury. * This election thus past with the popes grace & fauor, the said Stephan had in England, amongst others that solicited his cause to the king, a brother named Master Simon Langton, who in tract of time also became archbishop of Yorke, as appereth in the course of this story, in the raigne of Henry the third, An. 1228. In this behalfe the king seemed tractable, so he might haue his soueraignty entire. Against the which, because the said Stephan had vowed to oppose himselfe, and the king mislliking of such demeanor, he sent abrode his letters certificatory about the realme, therein giuing intimation to all people of proud Stephan Langtons contumacie: the forme of the said letters followeth.

Letters certificatory of king John, touching the contumacie of Stephan Langton archbishop of Canturbury by the popes election.

R Ex omnibus hominibus, &c. Sciatis quod magister Simon de Langton venit ad nos apud Winton die Mercurij proxime ante medium quadragesime, &c.

In English.

The king to all men, &c. Know ye that Master Simon Langton came to vs at Winchester, on the wednesday next before midlent, and in presence of our bishops besought vs that we would receiue his brother Master Stephan Langton to be archbishop of Canturbury. And when we spake vnto him touching the reseruation & fauing of our dignity vnto vs, he told vs that he would do no such thing for vs, vnlesse we would wholly relieue our bishops his courtesie and gentlenes. This therefore we command, that you know euill and wrong to be done vnto vs in this behalf: and we charge you, that you beleiue those things which Reginald of Cornhill shall tel you on our part, touching the foresaid deed betweene vs and the bishops aboue named, &c. Witnesse the king at Winchester the fourteenth day of March, in the ninth yeere of his raigne.

Now, albeit the king take indignation at this proceeding in the election of Stephan, yet from thence forth (saith Matthew Paris) the pope could do no lesse but mightily defend him from all vexation and danger, considering that hee was his owne deare darling, and a child of his owne creation.

Furthermore, vpon this occasion king John conceiued an exceeding displeasure against the clergy and monks of Canturbury (as he had good cause) they doing so many cuils against his princely prerogatiue. Without his licence they elected their archbishop, and put by the bishop of Norwich, whom he had appointed. They wasted a great part of his treasure by the seas, and to tying all to the diuell they made Stephan Langton their high metropolitan, whom he take for a grieuous enemy to the whole realme, being alwaies so familiar with the French king. Wherefore in his anger he banished them out of the land, to the number of three score and foure, for this their contumacie and contempt of his regall power.

The monks of Canturbury thus being expulsed, the king forthwith sendeth messengers to the pope with his letters, wherein he doth sharply and expedly expostulat with the pope, that whereas he (vncertainly) he repulsed the election of the bishop of Norwich, and set vp one Stephan Langton, a man vnknowne to him, and brought vp amongst his enemies a long time in the kingdome of France, consecrating him archbishop of Canturbury, and letting the other goe. Also (which is more) it redoundeth to the subuersion and derogation of the liberties appertaining to his crowne: for notwithstanding his consent past (being before of the monks not made priuie, which should so haue done) yet he rashly presumed to promote and prefer another. Wherefore he cannot marueil (he saith) enough, that neither the said pope nor the court of Rome doth consider and reuolue with themselues, how necessary his loue and fauor hath been alwaies hitherto to the sea of Rome, and that they consider not what great profit and reuenewes haue proceeded hitherto to them out of the realme of England: the like whereof hath not been receiued out of any other country besides on this side the Alps. He addeth moreouer and saith, that for his liberties he will stand (if need be) vnto death, neither can he be so remoued and shaken off from the election of the bishop of Norwich, which he saith to be so commodious to him and profitable. Finally, hee thus concludeth, saying: that in case in this his request he be not heard, he will so prouide by the seas, that there shall be no such gadding and coursing any more ouer to Rome, suffering the riches of the land no more to be transported ouer, whereby he should be himselfe the lesse able to resist his enemies. And seeing he hath of his owne at home, archbiarchbishops, bishops, and other prelats of the church (both of Englishmen and of others) sufficiently prouided and instructed in all kind of knowledge: therefore he shall not need greatly to seke for iudgement and iustice further abrode.

When these came to the popes intelligence, he directly letters against the king in this sorte.

The popes letters against king Iohn.

INocentius pope, seruant of the seruants of God, to our well beloued sonne in Christ the king of England, health, and apostolical blessing. Whereas we haue written to you heretofore, exhorting and intreating you after an humble, diligent, & gentle sort (concerning the Church of Canturbury) you haue written to vs against after a threatning sort and vp braiding manner: both spitefully and also rowardly. And whereas we more and about that our right and duty required, haue borne and giuen to you you against for your part haue giuen to vs not so much as by right & duty you are bound to do. And though your deuotion, as you say, hath bin to vs very necessary, yet consider against that ours also is not a little opportune and expedient for you. And whereas we in such like cases haue not shewed at any time the like honour to any prince as we haue vsed to you, against haue so much derogated our honor, as no prince else hath redimed to doe besides you alone, pretending certaine friuolous causes & occasions I cannot tell what, why you would not condescend to the election of Stephan Langton, cardinall of S. Chrysogono, chosen by the monks of Canturbury, for that the said Stephan (as you say) hath been conuersant and brought vp amongst your enemies, and his person to you vnknown. But you know what is the meruell of Salomon: The nest is cast, but in vaine in the sight of the flying birdes, &c.

This is plaine but fals paper-ch. with hollow sin. of kings & princes.

A spitefull cause that a king cannot constitute an archbishop without his own consent, after it be made knowen.

With much other matter in the same epistle, wherein he talketh into the conniendation of Stephan Langton his cardinall, declaring how learned he was in the liberall arts; and in diuinity, insomuch that he was preferred to a part also in canon of all honest sorte, and an Englishman borne, and not vnknowne to the king, seeing the king had written his letters thrice to him before. Declaring moreouer in the said letter, how the messengers of the king had sacrificed to him another cause; which was, for that the monks of Canturbury which had to do in the election, came not to him before for his consent. Declaring moreouer in the said letter, how the said messengers of the king had excated in the kings behalfe, that forsomuch as the popes letters (wherein the king was commanded to send his procters to Rome for the same matter) came not to the kings hand, neither did the monks direct any such letters or message to the king to haue his consent: therfore the pope considering the same, would grant so much for the regard of the kings honor, that the monks of Canturbury should not proceed without the kings assent therein. And forsomuch as that hath not bin done as yet, therefore they desired some delay therein to be graunted, sufficient for the doing thereof. Whereunto he said, that he had granted and fulfilled their request, in sending his letters and messengers once or twice to the king for the same purpose, although he said it was not the maner of the sea apostolike (who had the fulnesse of power ouer the church of Canturbury) to wait for princes consents in such elections, who there could not be suffered to do that which they came for. Wherefore in knitting vp his letter, he thus concludeth in these words.

And therefore seeing the matter so standeth, we see no cause why we should require or tary for the kings fauour or consent any more therin, but intend so to proceed in this matter, neither inclining on the right hand, nor on the left, according as the canonicall ordinances of the holy fathers shall direct vs, that is, (that all impediments and delaies set aside) so to prouide that the church of Canturbury be not any longer destitute of her pastor. Wherefore be it known to your discretion or kingly prudence, that forsomuch as this election of Stephan Langton hath orderly & concordly thus proceeded without fraud or deceit, vpō a person meet for the same; therefore we will not for no mans pleasure, neither may we, without danger of same and of conscience differ or protract any longer the consummation of the said election. Wherefore my welbeloued sonne, seeing we haue had respect to your honour, aboue that our right and duty required: study to honor vs so much as your duty requireth againe, so that you may the more plentifully deserue fauor, both at Gods hand and ours, left that by doing the contrary, you bring your selfe into such a peck of troubles, as neither you shall, nor all earth vpon your selfe of againe. For this know for a certaine, in the end it must needs fall out, that he shal haue the better, vnto who euery knee (of heauenly, earthly, and infernall creatures) doth bow, whose turne I serue in earth, though I be vnworthy. Therefore settle not your selfe to obey their perswasions, which alwaies desire your vnquietnesse, whereby they may fish the better in the water: which it is troubled: but commit your selfe to our pleasure, which vndoubtedly shall turne to your praise, glory, and honor. For it should not be much for your safetie in this cause to resist God and the church, in whose quarrel that blessed martyr and glorious bishop Thomas hath of late shed his bloud, especially seeing your father and your brother of famous memory, then kings of England, did giue ouer those three wicked customes into the hands of the legats of the sea apostolike. But if you yeeld your selfe humbly into our hands, wee will looke that you and yours shall bee sufficiently prouided for, that no preiudice may arise hereupon to you ward. Giuen at Lateran the tenth yeere of our popedome.

Princes must be subiect to the pope.

Thus hast thou (gentle reader) the glorious letter of the proud pope; I beseech the marke it well. Now to the storp.

After this letter was sent out, not long after proceedeth a charge and commandement sent into England into certaine bishops there, requiring them by authority apostolicall, that if the said king would not receiue the said prior of Canturbury, and his monks, then they should interdict him throughout all his realme. For the executing whereof, foure bishops were appointed by the usurped power of the popes bulls: namely, William bishop of London, Gustace bishop of Ely, Walter bishop of Winchester, and Giles bishop of Hereford. Which said foure bishops went vnto the king, and shewed their commission from the pope as is aforesaid, willing him to content thereto, &c. But the said king refused the same, and would by no meanes grant to their requeste. Whereupon they departing from his grace, went the morrow after the Annunciation of our lady, and pronounced the said general interdiction throughout all England, so that the church doores were shut vp with keies, and other fastenings, and with wals, &c.

Foure bishops appointed to interdict the realme.

England interdicted by the pope.

Now when the king heard of this, he began to be moued against them, and tooke all the possessions of the foure bishops into his hands, appointing certaine men to keep the liuings of the clergy throughout the realme, and that they should intop no part thereof. Which being done, the bishops (seeing the same) cursed all them that kept, or should meddle with church goods, against the will of them that ought them: and vnderstanding for all that, that the king nothing regarded their doings, they went ouer sea to the bishop of Canturbury, and informed him what had happened: who hearing the same, willed them againe to returne to Canturbury, and he would come thither to them, or else send certaine persons thither in his stead that should do as much as if he were there himself. Then when the bishops heard this, they returned againe to England, to Canturbury, which tidings came shortly to the king that they were come againe thither. And he caused the night himselfe trauell to them, he sent thither bishops, earles and abbots to intreat them. But the archbishop Stephan, whom he had chosen, might be admitted; promising the prior and all the monks of Canturbury in his behalfe, that he should neuer take any thing of the church goods against the will of them that owe them; but would make amends to them of whom he had taken any such goods, and that the church should haue all her franchises in as ample maner as in S. Edwards time the Confessor it had.

Sentence of the popes curse pronounces against the king.

When the forme of agreement was thus concluded, it was ingrossed in a paire of indentures, which the foresaid foure bishops to the one part thereof set their seales, and the other part the said bishops, earles, & abbats caried to shew the king. When the king saw the order thereof, he liked it well; sauing he would not agree to make restitution of the church goods. So he sent to the foure bishops againe that they should put out that point of restitution. But they answered stoutly that they would not put out one word. Then the king sent word to the archbishop by the foure bishops, that he should come to Canturbury to speake with him, and for his safe conduct to come and go againe at his will, he sent his writtes as pledges. Gilbert Peiteuin, William de la Wereuar, and John Letsly. Which thing thus done, the archbishop Stephan came to Canturbury, and the king (hearing thereof) came to Chilham: from whence he sent his treasurer the bishop of Winchester to him, to haue him put out of the indentures the clause of restitution aforesaid: who demanding to alter any word of the same, moued the king in such sort, that immediatly it was proclained throughout England at the kings commandement, that all those that had any church liuings, and went ouer sea, should come againe into England by a certaine day, or else lose their liuings for euer more. And further in that proclamation, hee charged all shirriffes within the realme, to inquire if any bishops, abbats, priors, or any other churchman (from that day forward) receiued any commandement that came from the pope, and that they should take his or their body and bring it before him: and also that they should take into their hands for the kings vse, all the church lands that were giuen to any man throughout the archbishop Stephens, or by the priors of Canturbury from the time of the election of the archbishop: and further charged that al the woods that were the archbishops, should be cut downe and sold.

The inconsiderate stoutnesse of the prelats against the king.

Stephan Langton stout against his king.

The king moued against the archbishop Langton.

When tidings came to the pope that the king had thus done, being moued thereby with fiery wrath, he sent to the king two legats (the one called Pandulph, and the other Durant) to warne him in the popes name that he should cease his doings to the holy church, and amend the wrong hee had done to the archbishop of Canturbury, to the priors and the monks of Canturbury, and to all the clergy of England. And further, that he should restore the goods againe that hee had taken of them against their will, or else they should curse the king by name: and to doe this, the pope toke them his letters in bulls patent. These two legats comming into England, resorted to to the king to Northampton, where he held his parliament, and saluting him, said they came from the pope of Rome, to reforme the peace of holy church. And first, said they, we admonish you in the popes behalfe, that ye make full restitution of the goods and of the lands that ye haue rauished holy church of: and that ye receiue Stephan the archbishop of Canturbirie into his dignitie, and the prior of Canturburie and his monks; and that ye yeeld againe vnto the archbishop all his lands and rents without any withholding. And sir, yet moreouer that ye shall make such restitution to them, as the church shall thinke sufficient.

Then answered the king: As touching the prior and his monkes of Canturburie, all that ye haue said I would gladly do, and all things else that you would o2daine; but as touching the archbishop, I shall tell you as it lieth in my heart. Let the archbishop leaue his bishoprike, and if the pope then shall intreat for him, peraduenture I may like to giue him some other bishoprike in England: and vpon this condition I will receiue and admit him.

Then said Pandulph vnto the king; Holy church was wont neuer to disgrade archbishop without cause reasonable: but euer the woes was wont to correct princes that were disobedient to her.

What? How now, quoth the king, threaten ye me? Nay, said Pandulph, but ye haue now openly told vs as it standeth in your heart: and now we will tell you that is the popes will, and thus it standeth: He hath wholy interdicted and cursed you, for the wrongs you haue done vnto the holy church and vnto the clergie. And for so much as ye will dwell still in your malice, and will come to no amendment, you shall vnderstand, that from this time forward the sentences vpon you giuen haue force and strength. And all those that with you haue continued before this time, whether that they be earles, barons, or knights, or any other what soeuer they be) we assoile them safely from their sinnes vnto this day. And from this time forwards (of what condition soeuer they be) we accurse them openly: and specially by this our sentence that we do commune with you. And we assoile moreouer earles, barons, knights, and all other manner of men of their homages, seruices, and fealties that they should do vnto you. And this thing to confirme, we giue plaine power vnto the bishop of Winchester, and to the bishop of Norwich, and the same power we giue against Scotland vnto the bishop of Rochester and of Salisbury: and in Wales we giue the same power to the bishops of Saint Dauid and of Landaffe, and of S. Asse.

The pope authoriseth rebellion and disobedience of subiects towards their prince.

Also sir king (quoth Pandulph) all the kings, princes, and the great dukes christened, haue laboured to the pope to haue licence to crosse themselues, and to warre against thee, as vpon Gods enemie, and winne thy land, and to make king whom it pleaseth the pope. And we here now assoile all those of their sinnes, that will rise against the here in thine owne land.

Then the king hearing this, answered: What shame may ye do more to me then this?

Pandulph againe: We say to you in Verbo Dei, that neither you nor any here that you haue, after this day shall be crowned. So the king said; By him that is almightie God, if I had knowne of this thing before ye came into this land, and that ye had brought me such newes, I should haue made you tarrie out these twelue moneths.

Then answered Pandulph; Full well we thought, at our first comming, that ye would haue been obedient to God and to holy church, and haue fulfilled the popes commandement, which we haue shewed and pronounced to you, as we were charged therewith. And now ye say, that if ye had wist the cause of our comming, ye would haue made vs tarrie out a whole yeare: who might as well say, that ye would haue taken a whole yeares respit without the popes leaue: but for to suffer what death that ye can o2daine, we shall not spare to tell you all the popes message and will that he giue vs in charge.

Like matter, Likeman.

In another chronicle I find the words betweene the king and Pandulph something otherwise described, as though the king should first threaten him with hanging if he had foreknowne of his comming. To whom Pandulph againe should answere, that he asked for nothing else at his hand, but to suffer for the churches right. Whereupon the king being mightily inensed, he said: The king the same time being at Northampton willed the shirriffes and bailiffes to bring forth all the prisoners there, that such as had deserued should be put to death: to the intent (as some thinke) to make Pandulphus afraid. Among whom was a certaine clerke, who for counterfeiting the kings coine, was also condemned to be hanged, drawne, and quartered; and moreouer, by the king was commanded (that by to anger Pandulphus the more, as may be thought) to be hanged himselfe yet with such courage as he had, he went to the church to set out booke, bell, and candle, charging that no man vnder paine of accursing, should lay hands vpon the clerke. Upon this the king and the cardinall departed in no little anger. And Pandulph went to Rome, and reported to the pope and the cardinals what had been done.

Pandulph made afraid vpon him.

Then the pope summoned all the bishops, abbats, and clerkes of England to come and repaire vnto Rome, to consult what was to be done therein. This councell began the first day of October. In the which councel it was decreed by the pope and his assembly, that John king of England should be accursed with all such as held with him, euery day so long as that councell endured. Albeit this was not yet granted, that the people should be crossed to fight against him, because as yet he had shed no blood. But afterwards the said pope Innocent, seeing that king John by no meanes would stoope vnder his subiection, nor vnder the rule of his popish see, he sent into the French king, vpon remission of all his sins, and of all that went with him, that he should take with him all the power he might, and so to inuade the realme of England to destroy king John.

The popes great curse.

This occasion giuen, pope Innocent yet once againe commanded in paine of his great curse, that no man should obey king John, neither yet keepe company with him: he forbad all persons to eat and drinke with him, to talke with him, to commune o2 counsell with him; yea, his owne familiar houshold to do him any kind of seruice, either at bed o2 at boord, in church, hall o2 stable. And what followed thereof? The greater part of them, which after such sort fled from him (by the ordinance of God) of diuers and sundrie diseases the same yeare died. And betweene both nations (English and French) fell that yeare great amitie; but secret, subtill, and false, to the bitter betraying of England. Neither was the pope content only with this, but moreouer the said pope Innocent gaue sentence definitiue (by counsell of his cardinals) that king John should be put from his seat regall and deposed, and another put in his roome. And to the speedie execution thereof he appointed the French king Philip, promising to giue him full remission of all his sins, and the cleare possession of all the realme of England, to him and his heires, if he did either kill him o2 expell him.

The full pursuit of God vpon disobedient subiects.

The pope feigneth a miracle.

The next yeare the French king began his attempt in hope of the crowne of England; being well manned with bishops, monkes, priests, and priests, and their seruants to maintaine the same; bragging of the letters which he had received from the great men there. But behold the worke of God; the English haule tooke three hundred of the French kings ships well laden with wheat, wine, meale, flesh, armour, and such other like, meet for the war: and one hundred they burnt within the hauen, taking the spoiles with them. In the meane time the priests within England had pounded them a certain false counterfeit prophet called Peter of Wakefield of Pois; who was an idle good for nought, and a pratling merchant. This Peter they made to prophecy lies, rumoring his prophecies abroad, to bring the king out of all credit with his people. They noised it daily among the commons of the realme, that Christ had twice appeared to this prophet of theirs in shape of a child betweene the priests hands, once at Poyse, another time at Pomfret; and that he had breathed on him thrice, saying: Peace, peace, peace, and teaching many things which he anon after declared to the bishops; and bid the people amend their naughty liuing. Being rapt also in spirit (they said) he beheld the ioyes of heauen, and sorrowes of hell. For sometimes there three (saith the chronicle) among a thousand that liued christianly. This counterfet soothsaier prophesied of king John, that he should raigne no longer then the Ascension day, within the yeare of our Lord 1213, which was the fourteenth from his coronation; and this (he said) he had by reuelation. Then was it of him demanded whether he should be slaine o2 expelled, o2 should of himselfe giue ouer the crowne? He answered, that he could not tell. But of this he was sure (he said) that neither he, nor any of his stocke o2 linage should raigne, that day once finished. The king hearing of this, laughed much at it, and made but a scoffe thereof. Well (saith he) it is but an idiot knaue, and such a one as luckily his right vnto. But when this foolish prophet had so escaped the danger of the kings displeasure, and that he made no moze of it, he gat him abroad and prated thereof at large (as he was a verie idle vagabond) and vsed to tattle and talke more then enough; so that they which loued the king, caused him anon after to be apprehended as a malefactor, and to be thrown into prison, the king not knowing thereof.

Peter the false prophet.

The false prophet found a liar.

Anon after, the fame of this phantasticall prophet went all the realme ouer, and his name was knowne euery where (as foolishnesse is much regarded of people, where wisedome is not in place) specially because he was then imprisoned for the matter, the rumor was the larger, their wondrings were the wantoner, their practising the swifter, their base talkes and other idle occuppings the greater. Continually from thence (as the rude manner of people is) old gossips tales went abroad, new tales were inuented, fables were added to fables, and lies grew vpon lies: so that euerie day new slanders were raised on the king, and not one of them true; rumors arose blasphemies were spread, the enemies reioyced, and treasons by the priests were maintained, and that likewise was surmised, o2 other subtilties practised, all was then fathered vpon this foolish prophet. As thus saith Peter Wakefield, Thus hath he prophecied, and This shall come to passe: yea many times when he thought no bodie paine of accursing, should lay hands vpon the clerke. thing lesse. When the Ascension day was come, which was prophesied of before, king John commanded his regall tent to be spread abroad in the open field, passing that day with his noble counsell and men of honor, in the greatest solemnitie that euer he did afore, solacing himselfe with musicall instruments and songs, most in sight amongst his truelie friends. When that day was past in all prosperitie and mirth, his enemies being confounded, turned all to an allegoricall vnderstanding, to make the prophecie good, and said; He is no longer king, for the pope raigneth, and not he: yet raigned he still and bin sume after hun, to proue that prophet a liar. Then was the king by his counsell perswaded that this false prophet had troubled all the realme, peruerted the hearts of the people, and raised the commons against him. For his words went ouer the sea by the helpe of his prelats, and came to the French kings care, and gaue vnto him a great incouragement to inuade the land, he had not else done it so suddenly. But he was most foully deceiued, as all they are and shall be that put their trust in such darke browsie dreames of hypocrites. The king therefore commanded that he should be drawne and hanged like a traytor.

The false prophet hanged.

After that the wicked prelats, monkes, canons, priests, &c. saw this their craft e inuyling by their sained prophet would not speed, notwithstanding they had done no little harme thereby; to helpe the matter more forward, they began to trauell and practise with pope Innocent of the one side, and also with the French king on the other side, besides subtill treasons which they wrought within the realme, and by their confessions in the eare, whereby they both blinded the nobilitie and commons.

King John submitteth himselfe to the pope.

The king thus compassed about on euery side with enemies, and fearing the sequell thereof, hnolving the conspiracies that were in working against him, as well by the pope (in all that euer he might) as also by Philip the French king by his procurement: and moreouer his owne people, specially his lords and barons being rebellionsly incited against him, as by the popes curses and interdictions against such as tooke his part, and by his absolutions and dispensations with all those that would rebell against him, commanding them to detaine from him such homage, seruice, duties, debts, and all other allegeance that godly subiects owe and are bound to yeeld and giue to their liege lord and prince. All which things considered, the king in the thirteenth yeare of his raigne, for that the French king began to make sharpe inuasion vpon him within his owne realme, sent speedie ambassadors to the pope (as to the fountaine of all this his mischiefe pretended) to worke and intreat his peace and reconciliation with him, promising to do whatsoeuer the pope should will him, and commaund him in the reformation of himselfe, and restitution of all wrongs done to holy church and to make due satisfaction therefore vnto all men that could complaine.

King John intreateth for peace with the pope.

Then sent the pope againe into England his legat Pandulph with other ambassadors: the king also at Canturburie (by letters, as it should seeme, certified from his owne ambassadors) waited their comming. Where the thirteenth day of May the king receiued them, making vnto them an oth, that of and for all things wherein he stod accursed, he would make ample restitution and satisfaction. Vnto them also all the lords and barons of England (many of them there were with the king attending the legats comming) sware in like manner, that if the king would not accomplish in euery thing the oth which he had taken, that then they would cause him to hold and confirme the same whether he would or not (or by strength) to vse the authors words.

King John submitteth himselfe and resigneth his crowne.

Then submitted the king himselfe vnto the court of Rome, and to the pope, and resigning gaue vp his dominions and realmes of England and Ireland from him and from his heirs for euermore that should come of him. With this condition, that the king and his heires should take again these two dominions of the pope to farme, paying yearely therefore to the court of Rome 1000 markes of siluer. Then take the king the crowne from his head, kneeling vpon his knees in the presence of all his lords and barons of England, to Pandulph the popes chiefe legat, saying in this wise: Here I resigne vp the crowne of the realme of England to the popes hands, Innocent the third, and put me wholly in his mercie and ordinance. Then tooke Pandulph the crowne of king John, and kept it fine daies as a possession and seisen taking of these two realmes of England and Ireland: confirming also all things promised by his charter obligatorie as followeth.

The tenure of an instrument of bonds wherewith king John bound himselfe and his heires to the popes hand.

TO all christian people throughout the world dwelling, John by the grace of God king of England, greeting. To your vniuersities know ye be it, that for so much as we haue grieued and offended God and our mother church of Rome, and for so much as we haue need of the mercie of our Lord Iesus Christ: and vs e may nothing so worthy offer, and competent satisfaction make to God and to holy church (but if it were our owne body) as with our realms of England and of Ireland, then by the grace of the holy Ghost we desire for to meeke vs for the loue of him, that meeked him to the death vpon the crosse. And through counsell of the nobles, earles, and barons, we offer and freely grant to God, and to the Apostles S. Peter and Paul, and to our mother church of Rome, and to our holy father pope Innocent the third, and to all the popes that come after him, all the realme, patronages of churches of England and of Ireland, with all the appurtenances, for remission of sins, and helpe and health of our kings soules, and of all christian soules. So that from this time afterward, we will receiue and hold of our mother church of Rome as in farme, doing fealtie to our holy father the pope, Innocent the third, and to all the popes that come after him, in the maner aboue said. And in the presence of the wiseman Pandulph the popes subdeacon, we make liege homage, as it were in the popes presence and we before him were, and that he himselfe should haue done all manner of things aboue said, and thereto we bind vs, and all that come after vs, and our heires for euermore, without any gain-saying to the pope, and eke the ward of the church vacant. And in token of this thing euer for to last, we will, confirme, and ordaine, that he be our special renter of the foresaid realmes (sauing S. Peter pence) in all things. To the mother church of Rome paying by a yeare 1000 marks of siluer at two times of the yeare for all maner customes that we should do for the said realmes that is to say, at Michaelmas and at Easter, that is, for England 700 markes, and 300 marks for Ireland: sauing to vs and to our heires, our iustices and our other franchises. And all these things that before been said, we will that it be firme and stable without end: and to that obligation, we and all our successors, and our heires in this manner, been bound, that if we or any of our heires through any presumption fall in any point against these things aboue said (and hee been warned and will not right amend him) he shall then leese the foresaid realmes for euermore: and this charter of obligation and our warrant for euermore be firme and stable without gain-saying. We shall from this day afterward be true to God and to the mother church of Rome, and to thee Innocent the third, and to all that commen after thee, and the realmes of England and of Ireland we shall maintaine truelich in all maner points, against al maner me by our power through Gods helpe.

Upon this obligation the king was discharged the second day of July, from that tyrannical interdiction, vnder which he continued fiue yeares and three months. But before the releasement thereof, first he was miserably compelled (as hath been declared) to giue ouer both his crowne and scepter to that antichrist of Rome for the space of fiue daies, and as his client, vassall, feudary, and tenant to receiue it againe of him at the hands of another cardinall, being bound obligatorie, both for himselfe and for his successors to pay yearely (for a knowledge thereof) 1000 marks for England and Ireland. Thencame they thither from all parts of the realme, so many as had their consciences wounded for obeying their liege king, as blind idiots, and there they were absolued, euery one of his owne bishop, except the spirituall fathers and ecclesiasticall soudiers, for they were compelled to seeke to Rome, as captiues restored to the popes owne fatherhood. In this new rustling the king easily granted, that abbats, deanes, and curats should be elected freely euerie where, so that the iudges of the realme were truly obserued. But against that were the bishops, alleaging their canonicall decrees and rules synodall, determining the king therein to haue nothing to do, but only to giue his consent after they had once elected. But among this shamen rabble, some there were which consented not to this wicked error: a sect also there were of the prelats at that time, which were not pleased that the lands in verdition should cease, till the king had paid all that which their clergie in all quarters of the realme had demanded, without reason: yea, that euery saucie sir John for his part demanded, euen to the very breaking of their hedges, the stealing of their apples, and their other occasionall damages, which grew to an intolerable summe, and impossible to be answered. Such was the outragious cruell noise of that mischieuous progenie antichrist, against their naturall king.

The vnreasonable diligence of the clergie against their naturall prince.

Notwithstanding that which is vttered afore, concerning the bitter malice of the clergie against their prince, yet did the popes legat and cardinall Nicolaus Tusculanus much further his doings, and allow of his proceedings. Wherefore they reported of him that he was ouerdeep partiall, and regarded not their matters ecclesiasticall, as he should haue done. For leauing the account of their restitutions, he went with the kings officers, as the kings pleasure was, to the cathedrall minsters, abbeyes, priories, deanries and great churches vacant; and there for the next incumbent alwaies he appointed two, one for the king, another for the parties. But vpon him only whom the king nominated, he compelled most commonly the election to passe: which vered them wonderfully. Vpon this therefore they raised a new conspiracie against the kings person by helpe of their bishops, seditious prelats, and such noble men as they had drawne to their parties. Wherebeld (saith Houeden) about the same time many noble houses and assemblies diuided in many places. The fathers and the aged men stod vpon the kings part, but the yonger sort contrarie. And some there were that for the loue of their kindred, and in other sundrie respects forsooke the king againe. Yea the same went that time, saith he, that they were confederated with Alexander the the Scotish king and Lewlin the prince of Wales to worke himan vtter mischiefe. A councell at Orford the archbishop called; whereat some would not tarrie, considering the contention thereof: the other sort hauing verie obstinat hearts, reuiled the king most spitefully behind his backe, and said that from thenceforth he ought to be taken for no gouernour of theirs. Their outragious and frantike clamours so much preuailed in those daies, that it grew to a grieuous tumult, and a most perilous commotion.

{Anno 1215}

In the yeare of our Lord 1215, as witnesseth Paulus Aemilius and other histories, pope Innocent the third held a generall synod at Rome, called the councell Lateran. The chiefe causes of that councell were these: In the daies of this Innocent, heresie (as he called the truth of God, or the doctrine that rebuketh sinne) began to rise vp verie high, and to spread with his branches abroad, by reason whereof many princes were excommunicated, as also the emperour, John the king of England, Peter king of Aragon, Raimund the earle of Tholouse, Aquitania, Sataloni, and such other like, as is aforsaid. So that it could be no otherwise, saith Houeden, but with the sharpe arre of the Gospell (so called the pope his excommunications) they ought of necessitie to haue been cut off from the church. Therefore it was this councell prouided, proclamed, and prelats from all nations thereunto called. And to colour those mischiefes which he then went about, he caused it by his legats and cardinals (verie craftie merchants) to be noised abroad, that his intent therein was only to haue the church wisely reformed, and the holie land from the Turkes hands recouered. But all this was craft and falsehood, as the sequell thereof hath manifestly declared. For his purpose thereby was to subdue all princes, and to make himselfe rich and wealthie. For there he made this antichristian act, and established it by publike decree, that the pope should haue from thenceforth the correction of all christian princes, and that no emperor should be admitted, except he were sworne before, and were also crowned of him. He obtained moreouer, that whosoeuer he were that should speake euill of the pope, he should be punished in hell with eternall damnation: Conradus, Vespergensis, Hieronymus, Marius. He prouided confession to helpe these matters, he allowed their bread a pit to couer him, and a bell when he goeth abroad, and made the masse equall with Christs Gospell.

The councell of Lateran holden by pope Innocent.

The pope to haue the correction of all christians.

In this councell was first inuented and brought in transubstantiation, of which Ioannes Scotus, whom we call Duns, maketh mention in his fourth booke, writing in these words: The words of the Scripture might be expounded more easilie and more plainly without transubstantiation. But the church did chuse this sense, which is more hard; being moued thereunto, as it seemeth, chiefly, because that of the sacraments, men ought to hold as the holy church of Rome holdeth, &c. And in the same place maketh mention of Innocentius the third.

Moreouer, in the said councell was established and ratified the wretched and impious act, compelling priests to abiure lawfull matrimonie. Wherevpon these meeters or verses were made the same time against him which here follow vnder written.

Much better and more comely eke it seemed vnto me,
That each should haue his own alone, & not his neighbors wife,
Lest with his neighbour he doe fall in hate and wrathfull strife.

Haue thou thine own true wedded wife, delite in her alway,
With faser mind that thou maist looke to see the latter day.

Now let vs returne to king John againe, and marke how the priests and their adherents were plagued for their humble handlings of his maiesties will. In the foresaid councell of Lateran, and the same yeare, was Stephan Langton archbishop of Canturburie excommunicated of pope Innocent, with all those bishops, prelats, priests, barons, and commons, which had bin of counsell with him in the former rebellion. And when the said archbishop had made instant sute of him to be absolued, anon he made him this answere with great indignation: I sware thee mine, I sweare by saint Peter thou shalt not so come at my hand obtaine the benefit of absolution: for why? thou hast not only done harme to the king of England, but also thou hast in a great many of things intured the church of Rome here, and therefore thou shalt tarie my leasure. The archbishop was also at that time suspended out of the church, and commanded to say no masse at all, neither yet to execute any other ecclesiasticall office, because he would not at time conuenient execute the popes curse vpon the rebellious barons. With them the said pope had bin so deepely offended and angred a little before, that the great charter of the liberties of England (with great indignation and countenance most terrible) he rent and destroied, by sentence definitiue condemning it for euer; and by and by thereupon cursed all the other rebels, with bake, bell, and candle. The greater captaines of them (with the citizens of London) for that allay were pronounced excommunicat by name, and remained still interdicted. They appealed then to the councell generall.

Stephan Langton disherited out of the church.

Appeale to the generall councell.

In the same yeare 1215, were those great men also summoned to appeare at Rome in that generall synod: which would not consent to their kings expulsion, nor yet tyrannicall deposing. Though they were called (they said) thereunto by the archbishop of Canturburie and others, and required by oth to subscribe vnto the same: yet could they not of their conscience doe it, because he had humbled himselfe, and also granted to haue peace with all men. Thus was the whole realme miserable then diuided into two factions through malice of the clergie, so theires increased in the land euery where. Yet were there of the lords and gentlemen a great number at that time, that followed the king and allowed his doings. But they which were on the other side (not a little suspecting the state that they were in) fled speedily to the French king Philip: desiring him that he would grant to them his eldest son Ludouike, and they would elect him to be their king, and that without much tarriance. They beseught him moreouer, that he would send with him a strong and mightie power, as were able to subdue him vtterly, that the realme might (they said) be deliuered of such a wicked tyrant. Such was the report that those most wicked papists gaue their christian gouernour, appointed to them of God: whom they ought to haue obeyed, though he had been cruell, euen for verie conscience sake: Rom. 13. And as certeine of the lords and barons were busie to chuse the said Ludouike for their king, the pope sent thither one Gualo the cardinall of S. Martin to stay those rash and cruell attempts; charging the French king vpon his allegeance, that he with all power possible should succour, maintaine, and defend king John of England, his seruant, and tenant. The French king therto made answere, as one not content with that arrogant precept: The realme of England, said he, was neuer yet any part of S. Peters patrimonie, neither is it now, nor yet any time shall be hereafter. Thus spake he, for that he was in hope to obtaine it for his sonne by treason of the barons.

The discord betweene the nobles and the king.

Gualo cardinall sent into England.

No prince or potentat (said Philip the French king) may pledge or giue away his kingdome, which is beside the realme) the gouernment of his whole common wealth, without the lawfull consent of his barons, which are bound to defend the same. If the pope (he vil introduce or set vp such a president in christendome, he shall at his pleasure bring all christian kings, and their kingdomes to nought. I like not this example in these daies begun. I cannot therefore allow this fact of king John of England: though he be my vtter aduersarie, yet I much lament that he hath so endamaged his realme, and hath brought that noble ground and queene of prouinces vnder miserable tribute. The chiefe lords and men of his nobilitie standing by, when he vttered these words (bring as it were in a furie) cried with one voice: By the blood of God, in whom we trust to be saued, we will sticke in this article to the losing of our heads. Let the king of England do therein what him liketh: no king may put his land vnder tribute, and so make his nobilitie captiue seruants. With that came in Ludouike the kings eldest sonne, and so said vnto them all there present: I beseech you, let not my purposed iourney: the barons of England haue elected me for their lord and king, and I will not sure lie lose my right, but I will fight for it euen to the verie death, yea so long as heart shall stirre within my breast: and I doubt not but I shall well obtaine it, so: I haue friends among them. His father the king stood dull as if he had been in a dumpe, and answered neuer a word, but fared as though he had dissembled the matter. Belike he mistrusted something therein, as hee might well enough, for all was procured by the priests, that they might liue licentiously in all wealth and freedome from the kings yoke.

Dictate and pur to confusion a saint the king.

About the same time were such treasons and conspiracies wrought by the bishops, priests, and monkes, throughout all the realme, that the king knew not where to become: for euen those friends; he was then compelled by the uncertaintie of his subiects to trauell from place to place, but not without a great armie of men, looking euery day when his barons and their confederats would cruelly set vpon him. At last he came to Douer, and there looked for aid from other quarters, which loued him better then did his owne people. And thither to him resorted from Flanders, Brabant, and Holland, on the one side, and from Guian, Gascoine, and Poitiers on the other side, and from other countries more, a wonderfull number of men. The report then went, that the pope had written vnto those countries mightily to assist him for diuers considerations: one was, for that he had both submitted himselfe and his dominions vnto his protection; another was, because he had taken vpon him a little before, the liuery of the crosse, to win againe Hierusalem; the third was, for that he had gotten by him the dominion of England and Ireland, and feared to lose both, if he should chance to decay. For the space of three moneths he remained in the ile of Wight, abroad in the aire to quiet himselfe for a time from all manner of tumults, and led there a solitarie life among feares and waterrunnes, whereas he rather counted to die then to liue, being so traytorously handled of his bishops and barons, and not knowing how to be iustly auenged of them. Vpon the Purification day of our ladie therefore, he take vp on him the crosse of voyage against the Turkes, for recouerie of Hierusalem, moued thereto rather for the doubts which he had of his people, then for any other deuotion else. And thus he said to his familiar seruants: Since I submitted my selfe and my lands (England and Ireland) to the church of Rome (sorow come to it) neuer thing prospered with me, but all hath gone against me.

§ Anno § 1216

In the next yeare after 1216, was Simon Langton chosen archbishop of Yorke; but that election anon after was dissolued, for information was giuen to the pope, that the said Simon was brother to Stephan Langton the archbishop of Canterburie, which had been the occasion of all the tumults which were at that time in England. And the pope had the more hate vnto him, for that he had brought him vp of nought, and did find him at that time so stubborne: wherefore he placed in his bishoprike Walter Gray, the bishop of Winchester.

Walter Gray archbishop of Yorke. Simil. the popes legat.

In the same yeare Simil the popes legat renued his great curse vpon Lewis the French kings sonne, for usurping vpon king John; likewise vpon Simon Langton, and Seruais Hobruge, for prouoking him to the same, and that with a wonderfull solemnitie: for in that doing he made all the bels to be rung, the candles to be light, the doores to be opened, and the booke of excommunications or interdictions publikely to be read, committing them wholly to the diuell for their contumacie and contempt. He also commanded the bishops and curats to publish it abroad ouer all the whole realme, to the terrour of all his subiects. The said Simon and Seruais laughed him to scorne, and derided much his doings in that behalfe, saying, that for the iuft title of Ludouike, they had appealed to the generall councell at Rome.

Ex Matth. Nigr. cap. 43. 44.

The magistrates of London and citizens of the same did likewise vilipend and disdainfullie mocke all that the pope had there commanded and done. And in spight both of him and his legat, they kept companie with them that were excommunicated, both at table and at church, shewing themselues thereby as open contemners both of him and his latines. Ludouike at London taking himselfe for king, constituted Simon Langton for his high chancellour, and Seruais Hobruge for his chiefe preacher; by whose daily preachings, as well the barons and the citizens themselues being both excommunicated, caused all the church doores to be opened, and the seruice to be sung, and the said Ludouike was in all points fit for their hands. About this time was Pandulphus (then cardinall) collecting the Peter pence, an old pillage of the pope, taking great paines therein. And for his great labours in those the affaires of holy church, and for other great miracles he shewed, he was then made bishop of Norwich, to the augmenting of his dignitie and expences.

Mat. Paris. Rad. Niger. cap. 47.

It chanced about this time, that the vicount of Melun (a verie noble man of the realme of France, which came thither with the prince Ludouike to fall deadly sicke at London, and also moued in conscience to call certaine of the English barons vnto him, such as were there appointed to the custodie of that citie, said vnto them: I lament your sorowfull case, and pitie with my heart the destruction that is comming towards you and your countrie. The dangerous snares which are prepared for your vtter confusion are hidden from you, you do not behold them, but take you heed of them in time. Prince Ludouike hath sworne a great oth, and sixteene of his earles and noble men are of counsell with him, that if he obtaine the crowne of England, hee will banish all them from seruice, and depriue them of lands and goods, as manie as he findeth now to go against their liege king, and are traytors to his noble person. And because you shall not take this tale for a fable, I assure you on my faith, lying now at the mercie of God, that I was one of them which was sworne to the same. I haue great conscience thereof, and therefore I giue you this warning. I pitie poore England which hath been so noble a region, that now it is come to so extreame miserie. And when he with teares had lamented it a space, he returned againe vnto them and said: My friends I counsell you earnestly to looke to your selues, and to prouide the remedie in time, lest it come vpon you vnwares. Your king for a season hath kept you vnder, but if Ludouike preuaile, he will put you from all; of two extreame euils chuse the more easie, and keepe that secret which I haue told you of good will. With that he gaue ouer and departed this life.

When this was once noised among the barons, they were in great heauinesse, for they saw themselues betrapped euerie way, and to be in exceeding great danger. And this daily augmented that feare which then came vpon the barons. They were extreamely hated of the pope and his legats, and euery weeke came vpon them new excommunications. Daily detriments they had besides in their possessions and goods, in their lands and houses, come and cattell, wiues and children: so that some of them were driuen to such need, that they were inforced to seeke prayes and bootes for sustaining their miserable liues. For loke what soeuer prince Ludouike obtained by his wars, either territories or castles, he gaue them all to his Frenchmen in spight of their heads, and said that they were but traptours, like as they had warning afore, which grieued them woorse of all. At the last they perceiuing that they in seking to auoid one mischiefe, were readie to fall into another much woorse: they began to lay their heads together, consenting to submit themselues wholly with all humilitie vnto the mercie of their late souereigne and naturall liege lord king John. And so for that they were sumwhat in doubt of their liues for the treason afore committed; manie of the friends of them which were of most credit with him, made suite for them. So were a great number of them pardoned, after instant and great suite made for them. I here omit his recouerie of Rochester castle and citie, with many other dangerous aduentures against the foresaid Ludouike, both at London, Yorke, Lincolne, Winchester, Norwich, and other places else, as things not pertaining to my purpose. And now I returne to my matter againe.

Into Suffolke and Norfolke he consequently iourneyed, with a verie strong armie of men, and there with great mischiefe he afflicted them, because they had giuen place and were sworne to his enemies. After that, he destroyed the abbeyes of Peterborough and Crowland, for the great treasons which they also had wrought against him, and so he departed from thence into Lincolnshire.

In this yeare, about the seuenteenth day of Iulie, died pope Innocent the third, and was buried in a citie called Perusium in Italie: whereas he had trauelled to make a peace betweene the Guelphonates and Gibins, for his owne commoditie and aduantage. After him anon succeeded one Cintius, otherwise called Honorius tertius, a man of very great age: yet liued he in the papacie ten yeares and an halfe, and more. When this was once knowne in England, greatly reioyced all they which were king Johns enemies, specially the priests; yet had they small cause, as will appeare hereafter. They noised it all the realme ouer, that this new pope would set a new order, and not rule all things as the other pope did; thinking thereby that he would haue done all things to their commoditie: but they found it otherwise. For he made all them which were excommunicat, to pay double and treble, ere they could be restored againe to their former liuings.

Pope Innocent the third dieth.

And in the selfe same yeare, as king John was come to Swinstead abbey, not far from Lincolne, he rested there two daies: where (as most writers testifie) he was most traytorouslie poysoned by a monke of that abbey, of the sect of the Cistercians or S. Bernards brethren, called Simon of Swinstead. As concerning the noble personage of this prince, this witnesse giueth Roger Houeden therein: Princeps quidem magnus erat, sed minus felix, atque vt Marius vtraque fortuna expertus. Doubtlesse (saith he) king John was a mightie prince, but not so fortunat as many were; not altogether vnlike to Marius the noble Roman, he tasted of fortune both waies, bountifull in mercie: in warres sometime he wan, sometime againe he loft. Munificus ac liberalis in exteros fuit, sed proditionis causa suorum depraedator, plus aduenis quam suis confidens. Hee was also verie bounteous and liberall vnto strangers, but of his owne people (for their daily treasons sake) he was a great oppressor, so that he trusted more to forreners then to them.

King John poysoned by a monke.

Among other diuers and sundrie conditions belonging to this king, one there was which is not in him to be reprehended but commended rather: for that being far from the superstition which kings at that time were commonly subiect to, he regarded regarded not the popish masse, as in certaine chronicles writing of him may be collected: for so I find testified of him by Matth. Parisien. that the king vpon a time in his hunting, comming where a weet fat stag was cut vp and opened (or how the hunters termde it I cannot tell) the king beholding the fat, neese and the lifting of the stag: See, saith hee, how easily and happily he hath liued, and yet for all that he neuer heard anie masse.

The saying of king John deriding the masse.

It is recorded and found in the chronicle of William Caxton called Fructus temporum, and in the seuenth booke. The foresaid monke Simon being much offended with certaine talke that the king had at his table, concerning Ludouike the French kings sonne (which then had entred and vsurped vpon him) did call in his wicked heart how he most speedily might bring him to his end. And first of all he counselled with his abbat, shewing him the whole matter, and what he was minded to do. He alleaged for himselfe the prophecie of Caiphas, Joh. 11. saying: It is better that one man die, then all the people should perish. I am well contented (saith he) to lose my life, and so become a martyr, that I may vtterly destroy this tyrant. With that the abbat did weepe for gladnesse, and much commended his feruent zeale, as he tolde it. The monke then being absolued of his abbat for doing this act (aforehand) went secretly into a garden vpon the backeside, and finding there a most venemous tode, he so pricked him and pressed him with his penknife, that he made him vomit all the poyson that was within him. This done, he conueyed it into a cup of wine, and with a smiling and flattering countenance he laid thus to the king: If it shall like your princely maiestie, here is such a cup of wine as ye neuer dranke a better before in all your life time, I trust this vassall shall make all England glad: and with that he pranke a great draught thereof, the king pledging him. The monke anon after went to the sacrarie, and there died (his guts gushing out of his belly) and had continually from thenceforth thee monkes to sing masse for his soule, confirmed by their generall chapter. What became after that of king John, ye shall know right well in the processe following. I would ye did marke well the wholesome proceedings of these holy votaries, how vertuously they obey their kings, whom God hath appointed, and how religiously they bestow their confessions, absolutions and masses.

The king within a short space after (feeling great griefe in his bodie) asked for Simon the monke, and answere was made that he was departed this life. Then God haue mercie vpon me (said he) I suspected as much, after he had said that all England should thereof be glad; he ment now I perceiue then of his owne generation. With that he commanded his chariot to be prepared, for he was not able to ride. So went he from thence to Slaford castle, and from thence to Newarke on Trent, and there within lesse then three daies he died. Vpon his death bed he much repented his former life, forgaue all them with a pitifull heart that had done him iniurie, desiring that his elder son Henrie might be admonished by his example, and to learne by his misfortunes to be naturall, fauourable, gentle, and louing to his naturall people. When his bodie was imbalmed and spiced (as the maner is of kings) his bowels or intrails were buried at Croxton abbey, which was of the sect of Premonstratenses or canons of S. Norbert. His hired souldiers both Englishmen and strangers were still about him, and followed his corps triumphantly in their armour, till they came to the cathedrall church of Worcester, and there honorablie was he buried by Siluester the bishop, betwixt S. Oswald and S. Wolstan, two bishops of that church. Hee died in the yeare of our Lord 1216, the nineteenth day of October, after he had reigned in such calamitie, by the subtill conuiance of his clergie, eighteene yeares and fiue moneths and odde daies. Now so soone as king John was dead and buried (as is said before) the princes, lords and barons, so many as were of his part (as well of strangers as of them that were borne here) by counsell of the legat Gualo, gathered themselues together, and all with one consent proclamed Henrie his sonne for their king. Of whom more shall follow (the Lord willing) hereafter.

§ Anno § 1216

Many opinions are among the chronielers of the death of king John. Some of them do write that he died of sorow and heauinesse of heart, as Polydorus: some of surfetting in the night, as Radulphus Niger: some of a bloudie flix, as Roger

The description of the poisoning of king John by a monke of Swinstead abbey in Lincolnshire.

M. iij. Houeden,

Houeden, some of a burning ague, some of a cold sweat, some of eating apples, some of eating peares, some plums, &c.

This you see what variete is among the writers concerning the death of this king John. Of which writers, although the most agree in this, that he was poisoned by the monke aboue named, yet Matthew Paris (something differing from the others) writeth thus concerning his death, that he going from Lin to Lincolnshire, and there hearing of the losse of his carriage and of his treasures vpon the washes, fell in great heauinesse of mind, in so much that he fell thereby into a feruent feuer, being at the abbey of Swinsted. This ague he also increased through euill forbearing and naughtie diet, by eating peaches and drinking of new cider, or as we call it sider. Thus being sicke, he was caried from thence to the castle of Lafford, and from thence to the castle of Newarke, where calling for Henrie his sonne, gaue to him the succession of his crowne and kingdome, writing to all his lords and nobles to receiue him for their king, and shortly after vpon S. Lucies euen departed this life, being buried at Worcester, &c.

Death. Paris in vita Iohannis regis.

In Gilbertie I find otherwise, who dissenting from others, saith; that he was poysoned with a dish of peares, which the monke had prepared for the king therwith to poison him. Who hearing the king whether he would taste of his fruit, and being bid to bring them in: according to the kings bidding, so did. At the bringing in whereof (saith the storie) the pretious stones about the king began to sweat, in so much that the king misdoubting same poison, demanded of the monke what he had brought. He said, of his fruit, and that were good, the best that euer he did taste. Sat, said the king. And he take one of the peares which he did bring, and did eat. Also being bid to take another, did eate likewise thereof, and so likewise the third. Then the king reframing no longer, take one of the poisoned peares, and was therewith poisoned, as is before, &c.

King Henrie the third.

King Henrie the third.

AFter this king John had raigned (as some say) fourteene yeares, or as some say, though falsely, nineteene yeares, was (as is aboue said) poisoned and died. This king left behind him foure sons and three daughters, first Henrie, second Richard, and he was earle of Cornwall, third William of Valentia, fourth Guido Oisenate: he had also another sonne who after ward was made bishop. Of his daughters first was Isabell, married afterward to Frederike the emperour; the second named Elenor, married to William earle marshall; the third to Mountfort the earle of Leicester, &c. Another storie saith that he had but two daughters, Isabell and Elenor, or as another calleth her Ione, which was after queene of Scotland. Ex chronico vetusto Angliæ.

The issue of king Iohn.

This king John being deceased, which had many enemies both of earles, barons, and especially of the popish clergie, Henrie his eldest sonne was then of the age of nine yeares, at what time the most of the lords of England did adhere to Lodouike or Lewis the French kings son, whom they had sent for before in displeasure of king John to be their king, and had swone to him their allegeance. Then William earle marshall a noble man, and of great authoritie, and a graue and sound counsellor, friendly & quietly called vnto him diuers earles and barons, and taking this Henrie the yong prince, son of king John, setteth him before them, vttring these words. Behold (saith he) right honorable and well beloued, although we haue persecuted the father of this yong prince for his euill demeanour, and working; yet this yong child whom here ye see before you, as he is in yeares tender, so is he pure and innocent from those his fathers doings: wherefore in as much as euery man is charged only with the burthen of his owne workes and transgressions, neither shall the child as the scripture teacheth vs) beare the iniquitie of his father: we ought therefore of dutie and conscience to pardon this yong and tender prince, and take compassion of his age as ye se. And now for so much as he is the kings naturall and eldest sonne, and must be our soueraigne and king, and successor of this kingdome, come and let vs appoint him our king and gouernour, and let vs remoue from vs this Lewis the French kings sonne, and suppresse his people, which is a contusion and a disease to our nation, and the yoke of our seruitude let vs cast off from our shoulders. To these words spake and answered the earle of Glocester; And by what reason or right (said he) can we so do, seeing we haue called him hither, and haue swone to him our fealtie?

An example of a wordie and faithfull counsellour. The oration of the earle marshall for king Henrie.

Whereunto the earle marshall inferred againe and said: God right and reason we haue, and ought of duty to do no lesse, for that he contrarie to our mind and calling hath abused our affiance and fealties. Truth it is we called him, and meant to prefer him to be our chieftaine and gouernour; but he estsones purposed in pride, hath contemned and despised vs: and if we shall so suffer him, he will subuert and ouerthrow both vs and our nation, and so shall we remaine a spectacle of shame to all men, and be as outcasts of all the world.

At these words all they, as inspired from aboue, cried all together with one voice, We it so, he shall be our king. And so the day was appointed for his coronation, which was the day of Simon and Jude. This coronation was kept, not at Westminster, for so much as Westminster the same time was holden of the Frenchmen, but at Glocester, the safest place (as was thought) at that time in the realme, An. 1216, by Gwalo the popes legat, through counsell of all the lords and barons that held with his father king John, to wit, the bishop of Winchester, bishop of Bathe, bishop of Chester, bishop of Worcester, the earle Randulph of Chester, William earle marshall, William earle of Denbroke, William Dren earle of Feres, William de Bues, Serle or Samarike de Mal baron. These were at the crowning of the king at Glocester. Many other lords and barons there were, which as yet held with Lewis the French kings sonne, to whom they had done their homage before. And immediatly after the crowning of this king he held his counsell at Bittolu at S. Martins seast, where were assembled eleuen bishops of England and Wales, with diuers earles and barons and knights of England, all which did sware fealtie to the king. After which homage thus done to the king, the legat Gwalo interdicted Wales, because they held with the foresaid Lewis, and also the barons and all others as many as gaue helpe or counsell to Lewis, or any other that moued or stirred any warre against king Henrie the new king, he accursed them. All which notwithstanding, the said Lewis did not cease, but first laid siege to the castle of Douer fifteene daies. When he could not preuaile there, he take the castle of Berkhamsted, and also the castle of Hertford, doing much harme in the countries, in spoiling & robbing the people where they went: by reason whereof the lords and commons which held with the king, assembled themselues together to driue Lewis and his men out of the land. But some of the barons with the Frenchmen in the mean season went to Lincolne and take the citie, and held it to the vse of Lewis. Which being knowne, it comes a great power of the kings part made thither, as earle Randulph of Chester, William earle marshall, and William de Bues earle of Feres, with many other lords, and gaue battell vnto Lewis and his partie, so that in conclusion Lewis left the field, and of his side were slaine the earle of Parchis, Saer de Quincie earle of Winchester, Henrie de la Bohan earle of Hertford, and sir Robert le Fitzwater, with diuers others more. Whereupon Lewis for succor fled to London, causing the gates there to be shut and kept, waiting there for more succour out of France. Which as soone as the king had knowledge of, immediatly sent to the maior and burgesse of the citie, willing them to render them and their citie to him as their chiefe lord and king, promising to grant to them against all their franchises and liberties as in times past, and to confirme the same by his great charter and seale. In this meane time one Bartholomew Iuen, Eustace a French lord accompanied with many other lords and nobles of France, came with a great power, to the number of 100 ships to aid and assist the said Lewis, who before they arriued, were encountred vpon the seas by Richard, king Johns bastard sonne, who hauing no more but eighteene ships to keep the cinque ports, set eagerly vpon them, and through Gods grace ouercame them, where presently he smote off the head of Eustace: the rest of the French lords to the number of ten, he brought with him to the land, where he imprisoned them in the castle of Douer, and slew almost all their men that came with them, and sunke their ships in the sea, only fifteene ships (saith some of my stories) escaped away. Ludouike or Lewis hearing this losse of his ships and men, and misdoubting his owne life for the great mischiefe he had done to the realme, sought means by Gwalo and the archbishop of Canturburie, and by other lords, to be at accord with the king. With whom at length it was fore concluded and agreed, that for his costs and expenses, he to haue a thousand pounds of siluer giuen. Parisiensis speaketh of fifteene thousand markes (which he borrowed of the Londoners) that he should depart the realme neuer to returne into England againe, neither he nor none of his.

And thus peace being confirmed at Merton, Lewis toke his leaue, and being brought honorable to the sea with the bishop of Canturburie and other bishops, earles and barons, returned home into France.

And here, saith Gilburne, it was truly verified that was before spoken of the French king father of Lewis. At what time the said Lewis was in England, his father the French king demanded of his messengers comming into France, where his sonne was. And they said at Stamford. And he asking againe whether he had got the castle of Douer? And they said, no. Then the father swearing by the arme of S. James: My sonne (quoth he) hath not one foot in England, as afterwards well proued true. Ex Gisburn.

But the chiefest helpe that repelled Lewis and the French men out of the realme, and that most preserred king Johns sonne to the crowne, was the singular working of Gods hand, whereof mention was made before: which was through the confession confession of a certaine gentleman of the French host (as Florilegus doth testifie, who lying sore sicke at the point of death, and seeing no hope to escape, was touched in conscience for danger of his soules health, openly to confesse and vtter to the barons of England, what was the purpole of the Frenchmen to doe; who were conspired and swone together among themselues, with a priuie compaction, that so soone as they subdued the land, they should thrust all the chiefe and nobles thereof into perpetuall exile out of the realme, wherevot they should neuer returne againe. This comming to the eares of the barons, as is said, gaue them to consider more with themselues, whereby many of them were the more willing to leaue Lewis, and applie to their naturall king and prince. Which no lesse may also bee an admonition to all times and ages for Englishmen to take heed, not to admit or to place forren rulers vnto the realme, lest perhaps it follow that they be displaced themselues.

After the happie departure of this Lewis and his Frenchmen out of the land, whereby the state of this realme long vexed before, was now somwhat more quieted; immediatly Gwalo the legat looking to his harnell, directly forth inquisitors through euery shire, to search out all such bishops, abbats, priors, canons, and secular priests, of what order or degree soeuer they were, that with any succour or counsell did either helpe, or els consented to Lewis. For all these were exempted out of the charter of pardon and absolution made before, betweene the king and Lewis. By reason whereof no small gaine grew to the pope and the cardinall; for all such were either put out of their liuings and sent vp to the pope; or else were faine to fine sweetly for them. Among whom, besides a great number of other clerks, both religious and secular, was Hugo bishop of Lincolne, who for the recouerie of his bishoprike, disbursed 1000. marks to the pope, and 100. marks to the foresaid Gwalo the legat, who now (as Paris recordeth) by this time had gathered in a faire crop of that which he did neuer sow. Hugo bishop of Lincolne redeemeth his bishoprike for 1000. marks. Ex Math. Paris in vita reg. Henr. 3. Pope Innocent the third.

About this season, or not much before, died pope Innocent the third, in the nineteenth yeere of his popedome, to whose custodie, Fredericus the nephue of Frederike Barbarolla, being yet young was committed by the empresse his mother, of whom more shall follow (the Lord willing) hereafter. After this Innocent, next succeeded pope Honorius the third, who writing to young King Henry in a special letter, exhorteth him to the loue of vertue, and to the feare of God, namely to be circumspect with what familiars and retort he acquainted himself; but principally aboue all others to minde him to reuerence the church which is the spouse of Christ, and to honor the ministers there of, in whom Christ himselfe (saith hee) is both honored or despised. And this seemeth the chiefest article of that his writing to him.

Pope Honorius the third. The effect of the letter of pope Honorius the third to king Henrie the third. Ex Parisiens.

Of this pope Honorius, Abbas Vrspergensis (who liued in the same time) reporteth a strange wonder, more strange peraduenture then credible, which is this. Honorius being priest in Rome (whose name was then Centius) and procurator to Iacinthus a cardinall: so it befell, that his master sent him abroad about Rome, to borrow and procure monie for him against his iourney into Spaine: for pope Clement then intended to send the said Iacinthus his legat into Spaine. As this Centius was walking by himselfe all sad and sollicitous to speed his masters message, commeth to him a certaine aged and reuerend father, and asketh him what cause he had to walke so heauie and carefull. To whom he answered againe, and signified the occasion of his businesse that then he had to do. Then the old father said to him: Go and returne home againe, for thy master (saith he) shall not at this time go to Spaine. How so (quoth the other) how is that true? As true (saith he) as it is certaine that the pope shall die, and thy said master shall be pope after him. Centius thinking that to be vnlikely, said he could not be: for then Math. Paris reporteth being sicke of a spirituall hope, thought this Gwalo (hauing so large occupying in England) to be able enough for to cure his disease. And so that legat returned with all his bags well stuffed, leauing Pandulph behind him to supplie that bailiwike of his great grandfather the pope.

A strange tale of pope Honorius, as it is ment.

Ex Abbate Vrsperg. in chronico.

The life and acts of pope Innocentius the third are partly described before, how he intruded Stephan Langton against the kings will into the archbishopzike of Canturburie, stirring vp also sittie and foure monks of the same church of Canturburie partlie to withstand against the king. Moreover how he did excommunicat the said king as a publike enemie of the church, so long as the said king withstood his tyrannicall doings, putting him and his whole kingdome vnder interdiction, for the space of fiue yeres and three moneths; and at length depoled & deprined him from his scepter, keeping it in his owne hands for fiue daies. How he absolued his subiects from their one obedience and subiection vnto him. How he gaue away his kingdoms and possessions to Lewis the French kings sonne, commanding the said Lewis to spoile him both of lands and life. Whereupon the king (being forsaken of his nobles, prelats and commons) was inforced against his will to submit himselfe, and sware obedience vnto the pope, paying vnto him a perelle tribute of 1000. marks by yeere, for receiuing his kingdome againe, against, wherebi both he and his successors after him were bassales afterwards vnto the pope. And thus were the apostolicall seas of this holy vicar in the realme of England. Moreouer, he condemned Almericus a worthie learned man and a bishop, for an heretike, for teaching and holding against images. Also he condemned the doctrine of Joachim Abbas (whom we spake of before) for heresie all. This pope brought first into the church the paying of priuat tithes. He obteined the receiuing once a yere at Easter. Vnto the pryall decreetals he added the decree, Omnes vtriusque sexus, &c. Also the reseruation of the sacrament, and the going with the bel and light before the sacrament was by him appointed. In the said councell of Lateran he also ordained that the canon of the masse should be receiued with equall authoritie as though it had proceeded from the apostles themselues. He brought in transubstantiation. Loke in the decretals, Titulo 1. De summa Trinit. & fide catholica, cap. firmiter credimus.

Item, the said Innocentius the third ordained that none should marrie in the third degree, but only in the fourth degree, and so vnder.

The said pope stirred vp Otho against Philip the emperor, because the said Philip was elected emperor against his will; vpon the occasion whereof followed much war and slaughter in Germany. And afterward against the said Otho, whom he had made emperor, he set vp Frederike king of Cicile, and caused the archbishop of Maience to pronounce him excommunicat in all his titles, and to bee deposed of his empire. For the which cause the princes of Germanie did vnnaile his bishoprike, spoiling and burning his possessions. Therewith vp the pope so did accurse and depose him, was, for that the said Otho did take and occupie cities, townes, and castels, which the pope said appertained to him.

Item, the said pope ordained, that if any prince offended one another, the correction thou appertaine vnto the pope. In this councell of Lateran were archbishops and primats 61. Bishops 400. abbats 12. priors and conuentuals 800. besides other ambassadors, legats, doctors, and lawyers an innumerable sort, &c.

In the historie of Hermanus Mutius, we read how in the yere of our Lord 1212. in this popes time diuers noble men, and others in the countrie of Alsatia, contrary to the tradition of the Romish popes, did hold that euery day was free for eating of flesh, so it be done soberly. Also that they did wickedlie, which restrained priests and ministers from their lawful wiues, for the which cause, as is in the forsaid author, by this pope Innocentius the third and his bishops, an hundred of them in one day were burned and martyred.

Some other historie (as Naucleras) recordeth also, that at the same time many were in the citie of Millaine of the said countrie, which vsed to send collects vnto the forsaid saints of Alsatia. Ex Nauclero.

In the chronicle of Gualter Heminsford, otherwise called Gisburnensis, it is recorded that in the daies of this king John, and pope Innocent, began the two seas and orders of friers, one called the preachers order, or blacke friers of S. Dominike: the other called the minorites of S. Francis. The preachers or blacke friers order began of one Dominike a Spaniard, about the parts of Thelouse, who after he had laboured ten yeres in preaching against the Albingenses, and such other as did hold against the church of Rome, afterward comming vp to the councell of Lateran with Fulco bishop of Thelouse, desired of the forsaid Innocent the third, to haue his order of preaching friers confirmed, which the pope a great while refused to graunt: at length he had a dreame, that the church of Lateran was readie to fal. Which when he beheld, fearing and much sorrowing therat, commeth in this Dominik, who with his shoulders vnderpropped the church, and so preserued the building therefrom falling, &c. And right well this dreame may seeme verified, for the friers haue been alwaies the chiefe pillers and vpholders of the popes church. Vpon this the pope (waking out of his dreame) called Dominike to him, and granted his petition: and so came vp this wolfish order of the Dominikes. I call it wolfish, for that his mother when she was great with this Dominike, dreamed that she had in her woombe a wolfe, which had a burning torch in his mouth. The which dreame, the preachers of that order doe greatlie aduance, and expound to their orders glorie, as well as they can. Neuertheless, howsoeuer they expound it, they can make a wolfe but a wolfe, and this a wolfish order. The rule which they follow seemeth to be taken out of S. Augustine, as who should say, that Christs rule were not enough to make a christian man. Their profession standeth vpon these principall points, as thus described: Charitatem habentes, humilitatem seruantes, & paupertatem voluntariam possidentes. That is: Hauing charitie, holding humilitie, and possessing wilfull pouertie. Their habit and clothing is blacke.

Friers vpholders of the popes church.

The order of the minors or minosit friers descended from one Francis an Italian of the citie of Assisium. This Assisian alle, whom I suppose was some simple and rude idiot, hearing vpon a time how Christ sent forth his disciples to preach, thought to imitat the same in himselfe and his disciples, and so left off his shoes (he had but one cote, and that of course cloth. In stead of a latchet to his shoe, and of a girdle, he tooke about him an hempen cord, and so he apparelled his disciples, teaching them to fulfill (so he speaketh) the perfectio. Gospel, to apprehend pouertie, and to walke in the way o. simplicitie. He left in writing to his disciples and followers, his rule, which he called Regulam euangelicam, The rule of the gospel. As though the gospell of Christ were not sufficient rule to all christian men, but it must take his perfection of humilitie Francis. And yet for all that great presumption of this Francis, and notwithstanding this his rule, sounding to y derogation of Christs gospell, he was confirmed by this pope Innocent. Pea and such soules this Francis found abroad, that not onelie hee had followers of his vnlith religion (both of the nobles and wincles of Rome) but also some there were, which builded mansions for him and his friers. This Francis, as he was superstitious in calling all things from him, as his girdle, giuing a cord about him, so in outward chastising of himselfe, so feare he was to his flesh (leauing the ordinarie remedie appointed by God) that in winter season, he couered his bodie with ice and snow. He called pouertie his ladie, he kept nothing ouer night. So desirous he was of martyrdome, that he went to Syria, to the Soldan, which received him honorable. Wherby it may be thought, that (surely) he told not the truth, as S. Joan Baptist did in Herods house. For truth is seldome welcome in courts and in the world. But it is hard to make a martyr of him which is no true confessor. I will here passe ouer the fable, how Christ and his saints did marie him with fiue wounds. These Franciscan or begging friers, although they were all vnder one rule and clothing of S. Francis, yet they be diuided into many sects and orders, some go on tréen shoes or pattins, some barefooted, some regular Franciscans or obseruants, some minors or minosits, others bee called Minimi, others of the gospell, others De caputio. They all differ in many things, but accord in superstition and hypocrisie. And for somuch as we haue heere entred into the matter of these two orders of friers, by the occasion hereof, I thought a title by the way to digresse from our storie, in reciting the whole catalogue or rabblement of monks, friers and nuns of all sects, rules and orders, set vp and confirmed by the pope. The names of whom heere in order of the alphabet follow vnder written.

Thus haue you (if thou please (gentle reader) to know what orders and what sects of religion haue been set vp by the pope, the catalogue and number of them all, so far as we could search them out, not onelie in bookes printed of late in Germany, namely by the reuerend father Martin Luther: but also conferred with another English booke which came to our hands, containing the same like notes of ancient antiquitie, the number of which rabblement of religious persons came to 101. Now as I haue reckoned vp the names and varieties of these prodigious sects, it commeth to mind consequently to infer the prophecie of Hildegardis, as well against the whole rout of Romish prelats, and the fall of that church, as especially against the begging friers and such other vnprofitable bellies of the church. This Hildegardis is holden of the papists themselues to be a great prophetisse: whose prophecie proceedeth in this manner, first against the priests and prelats of the Romish church, as followeth.

Hildegardis prophesieng of frer. & and monks.

The prophecie of Hildegardis of the ruine of Rome, and against the Begging friers.

Hildegardis a nun, and (as many iudged) a prophetisse, lined in the yere 1146. In hir prophecies she doth most grieuously reprehend not only the wicked and abominable life of the spirituall papists, but also the contempt of the ecclesiastic call office, and also the horrible destruction of the church of Rome. In a certaine place she hath these words: And now is the law neglected among the spirituall people, which neglect to teach and to doe good things; the master likewise and the prelats doe sléepe, despising iustice and laying it aside. In a certaine vision the church appeared to her in the shape of a woman, complaining that the priests had beraied her face with dust, and rent her cote, &c: and that they did not thine ouer the people, neither in doctrine, neither in example of life; but rather contrariwise, that they haue polluted the innocent lambe from them. She said moreouer, that all ecclesiastic call order did euery day become woorse and woorse, and that priests did not teach but destroy the law of God: and for these horrible crimes and impieties, the threatneth and prophesieth vnto them Gods most heauie wrath and displeasure, and doleful punishments. There is no cause why the spirituall papists should flatter themselues vpon this, that the promised against to the ministers of the church those good things to follow, like as Ioannes de rupe scisa doth, and other such like prophets: for they say it will come to passe, that they must repent before the times be amended. By which thing (vndoubtedly) they meane the godly ministers in the reformed churches, which for the most part were of the spirituall number, and yet did forsake the dishonest life & those wicked idolatries. Now, whereas the priests and monks, that is, the whole rabble and spiritualtie do account Hildegard for a true prophetisse; now they ought to consider that by hir they are more seuerely accused, not as by a woman, but as by God himselfe. And I pray you, what abomination, impietie, and idolatrie hath been committed since that time by the spiritualtie? I will note heere a certaine prophecie of hirs, taken out of the common places of Henrie Toben, because we see it manifestly fulfilled in our time. She prophecieth of the reformation of religion, and saith that it shall be most godly.

A prophecie for the decay of the Romish church.

Then shall the crowne of apostolicall honor be diuided, because there shall bee found no religion among the apostolicall order, and for that cause shall they despise the dignitie of that name, and shall set ouer them other men and other archbishops. In so much that the apostolike see of that time (by the diminution of his honour) shall haue scarse Rome, and a few other countries thereabout vnder his crowne. And these things shall partlie come to passe by incursion of wars, and partly also by a common councell and consent of the spirituall & secular persons. Then shall iustice flourish, so that in those daies men shal honestlie applie themselues to the ancient customs and discipline of ancient men, and shall obserue them as ancient men did. The glosse agreeth, &c.

These things thus premised, now will we come to the prophecie of the forsaid Hildegard, concerning the forsaid begging friers aboue mentioned, reciting hir words, not only as they are printed in a booke, printed of late in Germany, but also as my selfe haue séene and read, agréeing to the same booke word for word, and yet haue the same to shew, written in old parchment leaues, in such sort as the thing it selfe most euidently declareth a great iniquitie of time: The words of hir prophecie be these.

Hildegardis prophesieng of frer. & and monks.

In those daies shall arise a senseless people, proud, gréedie, without faith, and subtill, the which shall eat the sinnes of the people, holding a certaine order of foolish deuotion vnder the fained cloke of beggerie, preferring themselues aboue all others by their fained deuotion, arrogant in vnderstanding, and pretending holinesse, walking without shamefastnesse of the feare of God, in inuenting many new mischiefes strong and stout. But this order shall be accursed of al wise men and faithfull christians. They shall cease from all labor, and giue themselues ouer vnto idlenesse, chosing rather to line through flatterie and begging. Moreouer, they shall together studie how they may peruertlie resist the teachers of the truth, and stay them together with the noble men; how to seduce and deceiue the nobilitie, for the necessitie of their liuing, and pleasures of this world: for the deuell will graft in them foure principall vices, (that is to say) flatterie, enuie, hypocrisie, and slander. Flatterie, that they may haue large gifts giuen them. Enuie, when they see gifts giuen to others, and not to them. Hypocrisie, that by false dissimulation they may please men. Detraction, that they may extoll and commend themselues and backebite others, for the praise of men, and seducing of the simple. Also, they shall instantly preach, but without deuotion or example of the martyrs, and shall detract the secular princes, taking away the sacraments of the church from the true pastors, receiuing almes of the poore, diseased, and miserable, and also associating themselues with the common people, hauing familiaritie with women, instructing them how they shall deceiue their husbands and friends by their flatterie and deceitfull words, and to rob their husbands to giue it vnto them, for they will take all these faire and euill gotten goods, and say: Giue it vnto vs, and we will pray for you: so that they being curious to hide other mens faults, do vtterlie forget their owne. And alas, they will receiue all things of rouers, pickers, spoilers, theeues and robbers, of sacrilegious persons, vsurers and adulterers, heretiks, schismatiks, apostataes, whores and bawds, of noble men, periurers, merchants, false iudges, soudiers, tyrants, princes, of such as liue contrarie to the law, and of many peruerse and wicked men, following the perswasion of the diuell, the sweetnesse of sinne, a delicat and transitorie life, and finallie; euen vnto eternall damnation.

All these things shall manifestlie appeare in them vnto all people, and they (day by day) shall wax more wicked and hard hearted: and when as their wickednesse and deceits shall be found out, then shall their gifts cease, and then shall they goe about their houses hungry, and as mad dogs lacking bréed vp on the earth, and drawing in their necks as doues, that they might be satisfied with bread. Then shal the people crie out vpon them: Woe be vnto you pe miserable children of sorrow, the world hath seduced you, & the diuel hath bridled your mouthes, your flesh is fraile, and your hearts without sauor, your minds haue been vnstedfast, and your eies delighted in much banitie and follie, your daintie bellies desire delicat meats, your feet are swift to run vnto mischiefe. Remember when you were apparantlie blessed, yet enuious; pore in sight, but rich; simple to see to, but mightie flatterers, vnfaithfull betrairs, peruerse detractors; tractes, holy hypocrits, subuerters of the truth, ouermuch vpright, proud, vnthankefull, vnstedfast teachers, delicate martyrs, counfellors to gaine; mæke, but slanderers; religious, but coductors; hymnie, but proud; pitifull, but hard hearted liars; pleasant flatterers, persecutors, oppressors of ryghteousnesse, vnpleasers of God, seruers newly inuented of your selues; mercifull thought, but found worke, plaurers of the world, sellers of pardons, spoylers of bonefices, vnprofitable orators, seditious conspirators, drunkards, deuisers of honours, maintainers of mischiefe, robbers of the world, vnsatiable preachers, menpleasers, slanderers of women, and sowers of discord, of whom Moses the glorious prophet spake very well in his song, A people without counsell or vnderstanding: would to God they did know and vnderstand and foresee the end. You haue builded vp on high, and when you could ascend no higher, then did you fall euen as Simon Magus whom God confounded, and did strike with cruel plagues so you like wise through your false doctrin, naughtines lechetrousnes and wickednes, are come to ruine. And the people that saw vnto them, Go ye teachers of wickednesse, subuerters of the truth, brethren of the Sunamit, fathers of heresies, false apostles, which haue fained your selues to follow the life of the apostles, and yet haue not fulfilled it in part: ye soules of iniquitie were ye ill not followe the knowledge of your wayes, for pride and presumption hath deceiued you, and inflamable conceipt hath subuerted your erroneous hartes. And when as you would ascend higher then was meet or conuely for you (by the iust iudgement of God) you are fallen backe into perpetuall opprobrie and shame.

This Hildegardis (those prophecie we haue mentioned) lieued about the yere of our Lord 1146. as we read in Chronico Martini.

Crossebearers sisters.

About the same time that these Franciscans and Dominike friers began (which are aboue mentioned, hpang vp also the Crossbearers or Crouched friers, taking their originall and occasion of Innocent the third, which Innocent raised vp an armie (signed with a crosse on their brest) to fight against the Albingenses, whom the pope and his sect accounted for heretikes about the parts of Tholouse. What these Albingenses were, it cannot be well gathered by the old popish historics: for if there were any that did hold, teach or maintaine against the pope or his papall pride, or withstand and gainesay his beggerly traditions, rites, and religions, &c: the historeians of that time (for the most part in writing them) doe so depraue and misreport them (suppressing the truth of their articles) that they make them and paint them forth to be worse then Turkes and infidels. And that, as I suppose, caused Matth. Parisiensis and others of that sort, to write so of them as they did: otherwise it is to be thought (as so I find in some records) that the opinions of the said Albingenses were sound enough, holding and professing nothing else but onely against the wanton wealth, pride, and tyrannie of the prelats, denying the popes authoritie to haue ground of the scriptures: neither could they away with their ceremonies and traditions, as images, pardons, purgatorie of the Romish church, calling them (as some say) blasphemous incompings, &c. Of these Albingenses were slaine (at times and burned a great multitude by the means of the pope, and Simon Cele flatticus, with others more. It seemeth that these Albigenses were chiefly abhorred of the pope, because they set vp a contrarie pope against him about the coasts of Bugarorum: for the which cause the bishop called Portuensis being the popes legat in those quarters, writeth to the archbishop of Rome and other bishops in this wise.

For so much as mention is here made of these superstitious sects of these friers, and such other beggerlie religions, it might seeme not much impertinent, being moued by the occasion hereof, as I haue done in Hildegardis before: to now to annex also to the same a certaine other ancient treatise compiled by Geffrie Chaucer by the way of a dialogue or questions, moued in the person of a certaine vplantish and simple ploughman of the countrie. Which treatise for the same, the author intituled Jacke Upland, wherein is to be seene and noted to all the world, the blind ignorance and bardable discord of these irreligious religions, how rude and vnskilfull they are in matters and principles of cat chistian institution, as by the contents of this present dialogue appeareth, the words whereof in the same old English wherein first it was set forth in this wise doe proceed. Wherein also thou maiest see, that it is no new thing that their blasphemous doings haue by diuers good men in old time been detected, as there are many and diuers other old books to shew.

The blind ignorance of friers detected.

A treatise of Geffrey Chaucer intituled Jacke Vpland.

The feates of antichrist.

IJacke Upland make my mone to yerie God and to all true in Christ, that antichrist and his disciples (by colour of holinesse, walking and decerning Christs church by many false figures, where through (by antichrist and his) many vertues been transposed to vices.

Antichrists hypocrisie.

But the feliest folke that euer antichrist found, been last brought into the church and in a wonder wise, for they been of diuers sects of antichrist, some of diuers countries and kindreds. And all men knowne well, that they be not obedient to bishops, no beregeant to kinges: neither they tillen, ne sowen, tyden, ne repen, wode, coine, ne grasse, neither nothing that man should helpe: but only themselues their liues to sustaine. And these men han all maner power of God as they seien in heauen and in yearth, to sell heauin and hell to whom that them liketh, and these wretches sweet neuer where to been themselues.

Patience prouoketh master friers.

And therefore (freer) if thine order and rules been grounden on Goddis law, tell thou me Jacke Upland, that I aske of thee, and if thou bee so thinkest to be on Christs side keepe thy patens.

The frier must answer according to Gods word.

Saint Paul teacheth, that all our deeds should be doo in charitie, and else it is nought worth, but displeasing to God and harme to our owne soules. And for that freers challenge to bee greatest clerks of the church, and next following Christ in liuing: men should for charitie ar them some questions, and pray them to ground their answers in reason and holie writ, for else their answer would nought be worth, be it florished neuer so faire and as me thinke men might skilfully aske thus of a freer.

Friers may better breake Gods law then mans law.

1 Q. Freer, how many orders be in earth, and which is the perfectest order? Of what order art thou? Who made thine order? What is thy rule? Is there any perfecter rule then Christ himselfe made? If Christs rule bee most perfect, why rulest thou not thereafter? Without more why, shalt a frier be more punished if he breake the rule that his patron made, then if he breake the hests that God himselfe made?

There is but one religion.

2 Approoueth Christ any more religions then one, that S. James speaketh of? If he approoueth no more, why hast thou left his rule and takest another? Why is a frier apostata that leaueth his order and taketh another set, sith there is but one religion of Christ?

The frier more bounde to his habit then the man to his wife.

3 Why be ye wedded faster to your habits then a man is to his wife? For a man may leaue his wife for a yere or two as manie men done: and if you leaue your habit a quarter of a yere, ye should be holden apostatas.

If the habit make the frier religious as his habit weareth, so doth his religion.

4 Maketh your habit you men of religion or no? If it doo, then euer as it weareth, your religion weareth, and after that your hat it is better, your religion is better, and when yee haue liggen it before, then lig ye your religion beside you, and bin as effectas: why bie ye you so precious clothes? sith no man seketh such but for vainegloria, as S. Gregorie saith.

Judas for thieuerie put in the purse, but the priest and frier for foure pence selleth Christ.

What betokeneth your great hod, your scaplerie, your knotted girdle, and your wide cope?

5 Why vse ye all one colour, more then other christian men doo? What betokeneth that ye been clothed all in one manner clothing?

Holinesse of all hypocrits consisteth in clothing and outward appearance.

If ye say, it betokeneth loue and charitie, certes then yee be oft hypocrits, when any of you hateth another, and in that that ye weell be said holy by your clothing.

Why may not a freer weare clothing of another sect of freers sith holinesse standeth not in the clothes?

All friers found liers.

6 Why hold ye silence in one house more then another, sith men ought ouer all to speake the good and leaue the euill?

Why eat you flesh in one house more then in another, if your rule's your order be perfect, and the patron that made it?

7 Why get ye your dispensations to haue it more easie? Certes, either it seemeth that ye be imperfect, or be that made it so hard, that ye may not hold it. And after, if ye hold not the rule of your patrons, ye be not then her freers, and so ye lie vpon your selues.

8 Why

Friers be dead men, and quick beggers.

8 Why make you as dede men when ye be professed, and yet ye be not dede, but more quick beggers then ye were before? and it seemeth euill a dead man to go about and beg.

9 Why will ye not suffer your noinses heare your councels in your chapter house ere that they haue bin professed, if your councels bin true and after Gods law?

Graues best dead men and not sturrily boules.

10 Why make ye you so clothy boules to diuel in? sith Christ did not so, and dede men should haue but graues, as falleth it to dede men, and yet ye haue more courts then many lords of England: for ye nolo worden through the realme, yech night willing in your owne courts, and so mow but few right lordes doe.

11 Why heire you to ferme your limitors, giuing therfore eth yere a certen rent, and will not suffer one in anothers limitation, right as ye were your selues lords of countries?

Friers not the kings liege men.

Why be ye not vnder your bishops visitations, and liege men to our king?

Friers needye no more prayers.

Why are ye no letters of brotherheds of other mens prayers, as ye desire that other men should are letters of you?

If your letters be good, why grant ye them not generallie to all manner of men for the more charitie?

Friers greater and better then God.

12 Why ye make any man more perfect brother for your prayers then God hath by our beleeue by our baptisme and his owne grant? if ye mow, certes then ye be aboue God.

Why make ye men beleeue that your golden trentall song of you, to take therfore ten thillings, or at least fiue thillings, wold bring soules out of hell, or out of purgatorie? if this bee soth, certes ye might bring all soules out of paine, and that wold ye nought, and then ye be out of charitie.

Vncharitable friers.

13 Why make ye men beleeue that he that is buried in your habit shall neuer come in hell, and ye weet not of your selfe whether ye shall to hell or no? and if this were sooth, ye should sell your high houses to make many habits for to saue many mens soules.

Friers stealers of mens children.

14 Why steale ye mens children for to make hem of your sect, sith that of theft is against Gods hests, and sith your sect is not perfect? ye know not whether the rule that ye bind him to, be best for him or worst.

15 Why vnderwrene ye not your brethren for their trespasse after the lawe of the gospell, sith that vnderwrening is the best that may be? but ye put them in prison oft when they doe after Gods law, and by S. Augustines rule, Many doe amisse and would not amend him, ye should put him from you.

Christ and his rules were more gainesaid then the ministering of the sacraments.

16 Why counet you christ and burying of other mens parishens, and none other sacrament that falleth to christian folke?

Why busse ye not to heare to christ of poore folke as well as of rich lords and ladies, sith they mow haue more plentie of christ fathers then yone folke mow?

Poore men haue no soules, saith no fellow frier.

Why say ye not the gospell in houses of bedred men, as ye doe in rich men's that mow go to church and heare the gospell?

Why counet you not to burie poore folke among you? sith ih it they but most holy (as ye sain that ye bin so) your portertie.)

These be they that will not enter themselues, nor suffer other men that would.

17 Why will ye not bee at hir diriges as ye haue bin at rich mens? sith God praiseth him more then he doth other men.

What is thy prayer worth? sith thou wilt take ther for, for all chapmen ye need be most wise for dread of simonie.

What caule hast thou that thou houldest? sith it is the best loze and also our beleeue.

The frier guileth by In principio, and yet lieth the gospell.

Why be ye euill apaid that secular priests should preach the gospell? sith God himselfe hath bodden hem.

18 Why hate ye the gospell to bee preached, sith ye bee so much hold thereto? for ye win more by peere with In Principio, then with all the rules that euer your patrons made, and in this minstrels bin better then ye, for they contrarien not to the mirths that they maken, but ye contraien the gospell both in word and deed.

Judas for thieuerie put in the purse, but the priest and frier selleth Christ.

19 Freer, when thou receiuest a penne for to say a masse, whether selleth thou Gods bodie for that pennie, or thy prayer, or elis thy trauell? if thou saiest thou wolt not trauell for to say the masse, but for the penne, that certes if this be sooth, then thou lanell to little meed for thy soule: and if thou sellest Gods bodie, other thy praier, then it is very simony, and art become a chapman worse then Judas that sold it for thirtie pence.

20 Why wiltest thou hir names in thy tables that yeueth the monie: sith God wot weth all thing: for it seemeth by thy writing that God would not reward him, but thou wiltest in thy tables, God would els forgetten it.

The frier wilfully breaketh God his garnement.

Why bearest thou God in hand and slanderest him that he begged for his meat: sith he was Lord ouer all, for then had he bin bwise to haue begged, and haue no ned thereto.

Freer after what law rulest thou thee? where findest thou in Gods law that thou houldest thus beg?

21 What maner men nedeth for to beg?

For whom oweth such men to beg?

Why beggest thou so for thy brethren?

If thou saiest, for they haue ned, then thou doest it for the more perfection, or elis for the least, or elis for the meane. If it be the most perfection of all, then should all thy brethren doe so, and then no man nedeed to beg but for himselfe, for so should no man beg but him needed. And if it be the least perfection, why louest thou then other men more then thy selfe? For so thou art not well in charitie, sith thou shouldst seeke the more perfection after thy power, liuing thy selfe most after God. And thus leaping that imperfection thou shouldest not to beg for them. And if it is a good meane thus to beg as thou doest, then should no man doe so, but they bin in this good mean, and per such a mean granted to you may never be greunded on Gods law, for then both lerid and leand that bin in meane degree of this world should go about and beg as ye do. And if all should do so, certes well nigh all the world should go about and beg as ye done, and so should there be ten beggers against one ye ner.

It is better to labour with grace, then to loiter and beg, wicked friers.

Why procurest thou men to yeue thee their almes, and saiest it is so needfull, and thou wilt not thy selfe win thee that need?

22 Why wilt not thou beg for poore bedred men that bin poorer then any of your sect, that liggen and mow not go about to helpe himselfe, sith we be all brethren in God, and that brotherhed paseth any other that ye or any man could make, if there most need were, there were most perfection, either else ye hold them not your pure brethren, but worse, but then ye be vnperfect in your begging?

Why make ye so many maisters among you? sith it is against the teaching of Christ and his apostles?

23 Whose been all your rich courts that ye han, if all your rich iewels? sith ye seine that ye han nought nie in proper nie in common. If ye laine they beene the popes, why gether ye them of poore men and lordes so much out of the kings hand to make your pope rich? And sith ye saine that it is great perfection to haue nought in proper nie in common, why be ye so fast about to make the pope that is your father rich, and put on him imperfection? sithen ye saine that your goods been all his, and he should by reason be the most perfect man, it seemeth openlich that ye breene cursed children so to slander your father and make him imperfect. And if ye saine that the goods be yours, then be ye sicerlie your owne rule, and if it be not sicerlie your rule, then might ye haue both plough, cart, and labor as other good men done, and not so to beg by lose gnerie, and idle as ye done. If ye say that it is more perfection to beg then to trauell or to worch with your hand, why preach ye not openly, and teach all men to doe so? sith it is the best and most perfect life to the helpe of their soules, as ye make children to beg that might haue been rich heires.

Friers beg from all states to make the pope rich.

If it be imperfection to be rich, why doe the friers better to make the pope vnperfect?

Why make ye not your feasts to poore men and yeueth him pelts, as ye done to the rich? sith poore men han more need then the rich.

Why betokeneth that ye go twaine and twaine together? if ye be out of charitie, ye accord not in soule.

Why beg yee and take salaries therto more then other priests? sith he that most taketh, most charge hath.

If Francis order be contrarie to Christ his testament, then is Francis accused.

24 Why hold ye not S. Francis rule and his testament? sith Francis saith, that God shewed him this liuing and this rule: and certes if it were Gods will the pope might not for do it; or elis Francis was a lier that said on this wise. And but this testament that he made, accord with Gods will, or elis erred: he is a lier that leere out of charitie: and as the law saith, he is accused that letteth the rightfull iudge will of a dead man. And this testament is the last will of Francis that is a dead man; it seemeth therefore that all his freers been cursed.

He that is more holy in hand then in heart, is false to God.

25 Why will ye not touch no coined money with the croffe, ne with the kings head, as ye done other iewels both of gold and siluer? Certes if ye despise the croffe or the kings head, then ye be worthy to be despised of God and the king: and sith ye will receiue monie in your hearts, and not with your hands, and it seemeth that ye hold more holinesse in your hands then in your hearts, and then ye false to God.

A frier to exempt himselfe from the lawes of his prince is guiltie of treason.

26 Why haue ye exempt you from our kings lawes, and bissting of our bishops more then other christen men that liuen in this realme, if ye be not guiltie of traitorie to our realme, or trespassers to our bishops? But ye will haue the kings lawes for the trespasse do to you, and ye will haue power of other bishops more then other priests, and also haue leaue to palon your brethren as lords in your courts more then other folkes han that been the kings leege men.

Friers are forbidden to be theeues.

27 Why shall some sect of your freers pap ch a yere a certaine to her general prouincial or minister, or elis to her soueraigne? but if he scale a certaine number of children (as some men saine) and certaine if this been soth, then ye be constrained vpon certaine paine to do theft against Gods commandement, Non furtum facies.

Works of supererogation.

28 Why be ye so hardie to grant by letters of fraternity to men and women, that they shall haue part and merit of all your good deeds, if ye weeten neuer whether God be apaid with your deeds because of your sinne? Also ye witten neuer whether that man or woman be in state to be saued or damned, then shall he haue no merit in heauin for his owne deeds ne for none other mans. And all were it so, that he should haue part of your good deeds: yet should he haue no more then God would giue him after that he were worthie, and so much shall eech man haue of Gods yeft without your limitation. But if ye will say that ye been Gods fellowes, and that he may not doe without your assent, then be ye blasphemers to God.

God is the limiter of merit and reward, and not the frier.

29 What betokeneth that ye haue ordaines, that when such one

Friers will not pray, but for their gain. Or of their scatterpence.

one as ye haue made your brother or sister, and hath a letter of your seale, that letter ought be brought in your holy chapter, and there be read, or else ye will not pray for him. And but ye will pray especially for al other that were not made your brethren or sisteren, then were ye not in right charite, for that ought to be common, and namely in ghostly things.

30 Frere, what charitie is this, to ouercharge the people by mightie begging vnder colour of preaching or praying, or masses singing? lith holy writ biddeth not thus, but euen the contrarie: for all such ghostlie deeds should be done freely, as God teacheth them freely?

Friers do make ydolatrie.

31 Frere, what charitie is this, to beguile children or they commen to discretion, and bind hem to your orders that bin not grounded in Godslaw against hir friends will? sithen by this follie bin many apostat as both in will and deed, and many bin apostat as in hir will during al hir life, that would gladly be discharged if they will how, and so many bin apostates that shulden in other states haue bin true men.

The number of friers are sixty, fifty thousand and as many as ben fingers on one hand.

32 Frere, what charitie is this, to make so many freres in euery countrie to the charge of the people? sixty persons and vi cares alone, ye secular priests alone, ye monks and canons alone, with bishops aboue them, were inough to the church to doe the priests office. And to adde more then inough is a foule error, and great charge to the people, and this openly against Gods will that ordained all things to be done in weight, number and measure. And Christ himself was apaid with twelue apostles and a few disciples, to preach and do priests office to all the whole world, then was it better do then is now at this time by a thousand dele. And right so as foure fingers saith a thombe in a mans hand helpeth a man to wosh, and double number of fingers in one hand should let him more, and so the more number that there were passing the measure of Gods ordinance, the more were a man letted to wosh: right so (as it semeth) it is of these new orders that bin added to the church without ground of holie writ and Gods ordinance.

Ser, so saith the friar followeth Christ in his pouerte.

33 Frere, what charitie is this, to the people to lie, and say that ye follow Christ in pouerte more then other men done? and yet in curious and costlie housing, and fine and precious clothing, and delicious and liking feeding, and in treasure and iewels, and rich ornaments, feers pallen lodes and other rich worldlie men, and themself they bring hir cause about (be it neuer so costly) though Gods law be put abacke.

Friers are the letters of preaching the gospell.

34 Frere, what charity is this, to gather vp the boks of holy writ, and put hem in treasonie, and so empoison them from secular priests and curats, and by this cautell let hem to preach the gospell fraelie to the people without wouldlie meed, and also to defame good priests of heresie, and lien on hem openly for to let hem to shew Gods law by the holy gospell to the christian people?

What holinesse is in a friers coat.

35 Frere, what charitie is this, to faine so much holinesse in your habite clothing (that ye clepe your habit) that many blind soles desiren to be therein more then in another? and also that a frere that leaueth his habit late founder of men, may not be assoiled till he take againe his apostats as ye sain, and curssed of God and man both? The frere beleeueth truth, and patience, chastitie, meknesse and sobrietie, yet for the more part of his life hee may soone be assoiled of his pine, and if he bring home to his house much good by the yere (be it neuer so filthie begged and pilled of the poor and needie people in countries about) hee shall beyold a noble frere. O Lord whether this be charitie?

The frere so much desire to haue rich men buried in their friteries.

36 Frere, what charitie is this, to preise vpon a rich man, & to intice him to be buried among you from his parish church, and to such rich men giue letters of fraternitie confirmed by your generall seale, and thereby to beare him in hand that hee shall haue part of all your masses, matens, preachings, fastings, wakings, and all other good deeds done by your brethren of your order (both whiles hee liueth, and after that he is dead) and yet ye witten neuer whether your deeds be acceptable to God, ne whether that man that hath that letter be able by gods liuing to receiue any part of your deeds, and yet a poore man (that ye write well of: supposen incerten to haue no good of ye ne queen to such letters, though he be a better man to God then such a rich man: neuertheleſſe, this poore man doth not reech thereof. For as men supposen, such letters and many other that freers beholten to men, be full false deceits of freers, out of all reason, and Gods law and christian mens faith.

Friers beheld are false be times.

37 Frere, what charitie is this, to be confessors of lords and ladies, and to other mightie men, and not aneed hem in hir living: but rather as it semeth, to be the better to pill hir poore tenants and to liue in lecherie, and there to dwell in your office of confessor for winning of worldly goods, and to be bold great by colour of such ghostlie offices? this semeth rather pride of freers, then charitie of God.

Friers desire to be lords and ladies confessors.

38 Frere, what charitie is this, to sain that who so liueth after your order, liueth more perfectly, and nert followeth the state of apostles in poueny and penance, and yet the wisest and greatest clerks of you werld or send, or procure to the court of Rome to be made cardinals or bishops of the poores chaplens, and to be assoiled of the pow of poueric and obedience to your ministers, in the which (as ye sain) standeth most perfection and merit of your orders, and thus ye farren as Pharisees that sain

Friers and ydolatrers fey eue thing and doe another.

one and doe another to the contrarie.

Why name ye more the patron of your order in your Confessor when ye begin masse, then other saints, apostles, or martyrs, that holy church hold more glorious then hem, and clepe hem your patrons and your auowries?

Dilemma.

Frere, whether was S. Francis in making of his rule that he set three order in, a foule and a liar, or else wise and true? If ye sain that he was not a foole, but wise; ne a liar but true: why shew you contrarie by your doing, when by your suggestion to the pope ye said; that your rule that Francis made was so hard, that ye mow not like to hold it without declaration and dispensation of the pope, and so by your deed? Ne let your patron a foole that made a rule so hard that no man may well keepe, and eke your deed proueth him a liar, where he saith in his rule, that he toke and learned it of the holy ghost. For how might ye for shame pray the pope to mow that the holy ghost hit, as when ye prayed him to dispence with the hardnesse of your order?

Wisheth to be best order of freers.

Frere, which of the foure orders of friers is best? to a man that knoweth not which is the best, but would faine enter into the best, and none other? If thou saiest that thine is the best, then saiest thou that none of the other is as good as thine, & in this each frere in the three other orders will say that thou liest, for in the selfe manner ech other frere will say that his order is best. And thus to ech of the foure orders bin the other three contrarie in this point: in the which I may say soth, that is one alone, for there may but one be the best of foure. So followeth it that if each of these orders answered to this question as thou doest, three were false, and but one true, and yet no man should wite who that were. And thus if seemeth, that the most part of freers bin or should be liars in this point, and they should answer thereto. If you say that another order of the freers is better then thine, or as good; why take ye not rather thereto as to the better, when thou mightst haue chose at the beginning? And eke why should st thou be an apostat to leaue thine order and take thee to that is better, and so why goest thou not from thine order into that?

Friers neuer agree one with another.

Frere, is there any perfecter rule of religion then Christ Gods sonne gaue in his gospell to his brethren? Or then that religion that S. James in his epistle maketh mention of? If you say yes, then puttest thou on Christ (that is the wisdome of God the father) vnknowing, vnpower, or euil will: for then he could not make his rule so good as another did his. And so he had be vnknowing, that he might not to make his rule so good as another man might, and so were he vnmighte, not God, as he would not make his rule so perfect as another did his, and so he had bin euil willed, namely to himselfe.

The frere thinketh his rule perfecter then Christs, because he taught the one and followeth the other.

For he might and could, & would haue made a rule perfect without default, and did not, bee was not Gods sonne almightie. For if any other rule be perfecter then Christs, then must Christs rule lacke of that perfection by as much as the other weren more perfecter, and so were default, and Christ had failed in making of his rule: but to put any default or failing in God is blasphemie. If thou say that Christs rule, and that religion which S. James maketh mention of, is perfectest, why holdest thou not thilke rule without more? And why clepest thou the rather of S. Francis or S. Dominicks rule or religion or order, then of Christs rule or Christs order?

Dilemma.

Freer, canst thou any default or asligne in Christs rule of the gospell (with the which he taught al men silerlie to be saued) if they kept it to her ending? If thou say it was too hard, then saist thou Christ lied; for he said of his rule: My yoke is soft, and my burthen light. If thou say Christs rule was to light, that may bee aligned for no default, for the better it may bee kept. If thou saist that there is no default in Christs rule of the gospell, sith Christ himselfe saith it is light and easie: what need was it to patrons of freers to ad more thereto and so to make an harder religion to saue freers, then was he religion of Christs apostles and his disciples helden and were saued by. But if they wouldest that her freers sated aboue the apostles in heauen for the harder religion that they kepent here, so would they sitten in heauen aboue Christ himselfe, for their mo and strit obseruations, then so should they be better then Christ himselfe with mischance.

Friers would sit in heauen aboue the apostles.

So now forth and fraine your clerks, and ground ye vpon in Gods law, and gif I acke an answer, and then ye han assoiled me that I haue laid lasly in truth, I shall soile thee of thine orders, and saue thee to heauen.

Of frees him not or mow not excuse hem of these questions asked of hem, it semeth that they be horrible giltie against God, and hir euen christian; for which gilts and defaults it were worthie that the order that they call their order were for done. And it is wonder that men sustaine hem or suffer hir liue in such manor. For holy write biddeth that thou do well to thine, & giue not to the wicked, but for bed to giue hem bread, least they be made thereby mightier through you.

Otho the emperor set by and deposed against by the pope.

After these digressions now to returne to the course of our storie againe. As Henrie this king succeeded king John his father, to after Innocent the pope, came Honorius the third, then Gregorie the ninth, &c. And after Otho the emperor (whom the pope had once set vp, and after deposed againe) succeeded Frederike Frederike the second, as is partly before touched. In the daies of these kings, popes and emperours, it were too long to recite all that happened in England, but especially in Germanie, betwixt pope Honosius, Gregorius and Frederike the emperor: the horrible tragedie whereof were enough to fill a whole booke by it selfe. But yet we meane (God willing) somewhat to touch concerning these ecclesiastical matters, first beginning with this realme of England.

After that the kingdome of England had been subiected by king John (as hath been said) and made tributarie to the pope and the Romish church, it is incredible how the vnstanchable auarice and greedinesse of the Romans did oppresse and wring the commons and all estates and degrees of the realme, especially beneficed men, and such as had any thing of the church. Who, what for their domesticall charges within the realme, what for the pope, what for the legats, what for contributing to the holie land, what for relaxations and other subtill sleights to get away their money, were brought into such slauerie, captiuitie, and penurie, that whereas the king neither durst nor might remedie their exclamations by himselfe: yet notwithstanding by his aduice, Simon Montfort and the earle of Leicester, with other noble men (not forgetting what great grieuances and dissolutions the realme was brought into by the Romans) thought to worke some way how to bridle and restraine the insatiable rauening of these greedie wolues. Wherefore they deuised their letter, giuing strait commandement to the religious men, and to such as had their churches to farme, that henceforth they should not answere the Romans of such farmes and rents any more, but should pay the said farmes or rents vnto their owne proctors appointed for the same purpose, as by their writings sent abroad to bishops or chapters, and other ecclesiastical houses may appeare, in this forme and effect as followeth.

Cardinall Otho legat.

The pope requireth two prebendships in euery cathedrall church.

Note the cause why the pope is compelled to craue money of other countreis.

A complaint of the nobles of England against the intollerable couetousnesse of the pope and prelats of Rome.

A complaint of the nobles of England against the couetousnesse of Rome.

TO such and such a bishop, and such a chapter; all the vniuersitie and companie of them, that had rather die then to be confounded of the Romans, wisheth health. How the Romans and their legats haue hitherto behaued themselues toward you and other ecclesiasticall persons of this realme of England, it is not vnknowne to your discretions, in disposing and giuing awaie the benefices of the realme after their owne lust, to the intollerable preiudice and grieuance both of you and all other Englishmen. For whereas the collation of benefices should and doe properlie belong to you and other your fellow bishops (ecclesiasticall persons) they thundering against you the sentence of excommunication, that you should not bestow them vpon anie person of this realme, vntill in euerie diocesse and cathedrall church within the realme, fiue Romans (such as the pope shall name) bee prouided for, to the value of euerie man an hundred pounds by yeare. Besides these, many other grieuances the said Romanists do inflict and inferre, both to the laitie and nobles of the realme for the patronages and almes bestowed by them and their ancestors, for the sustentation of the poore of the realme, and also to the clergie and ecclesiasticall persons of the realme touching their liuings and benefices. And yet the said Romanists not contented with the premisses, doe also take from the clergie of this realme the benefices which they haue, to bestow them on men of their owne countrie, &c.

Wherefore, we considering the rigorous austeritie of these foresaid Romanists, which once comming in but as strangers hither, now take vpon them not only to iudge, but also to condemne vs, laying vpon vs importable burthens, whereunto they will not put to one of their owne fingers to moue: Laying therefore our heads togither vpon a generall and full aduice had among our selues concerning the same, wee haue thought good (although verie late) to withstand them, rather then to be subiect to their intollerable oppressions, and greater slauerie more hereafter to be looked for. For the which cause wee straitlie charge and command you (as your friends going about to deliuer you, the church, the king, and the kingdome from that miserable yoke of seruitude) that you do not intermeddle or take any part concerning such exactions or rents to be required or giuen to the said Romans. Letting you to vnderstand for truth, that in case you shall (which God forbid) be found culpable herein, not only your goods and possessions shall be in danger of burning, but also in your persons shall incurre the same perill and punishment as shall the said Romish oppressors themselues.

Example teaching neuer to take part against them with forren power.

THus much I thought here to insert and notifie concerning this matter, for that not only the foule and auaricious greedinesse of the Romish church might the more euidentlie vnto all English men appeare: but that they may learne by this example how vnwoithie they be so to be serued and plagued with their owne rod, which before would take no part with their naturall king against forren power, of whom now they are scourged.

To make the storie more plaine: In the raigne of this Henrie the third (who succeeding (as is said) after king John his father raigned fiue and fiftie yeares) came diuers legats from Rome to England. First cardinall Otho sent from the pope with letters to the king, like as other letters also were sent to other places for exactions of money.

The king opening the letters, and perceiuing the contents; answered, that he alone could say nothing in the matter which concerned all the clergie and commons of the whole realme. Not long after a councell was called at Westminster, where the letters being opened, the same was this: Primus inprimis ab omnibus ecclesijs cathedralibus duas nobis prebendas exhiberi, vnam de pontone episcopi, & alteram de capitulo: & similiter de canonicis vbi diuersa sunt portiones abbatis & conuentus. & consuetudinis quantum pertinet ad vnum monachum, aquali facta distributione honorum suorum, & ab abbate tantundem. That is; We require to be giuen vnto vs, first, of all cathedrall churches two prebends, one for the bishops part, the other for the chapter: and likewise of monasteries where be diuers portions, one for the abbat, another for the conent; of the conent so much as appertaineth to one monke, the portion of the goods being proportionally diuided; of the abbat likewise as much. The cause why he required these prebends was this: It hath been (saith he) an old slander, and a great complaint against the church of Rome, to be noted of inflatible couetousnes, which as we know is the rot of all mischiefe, and all by reason that causes be wont commonly not to be hanled, nor to proceed in the church of Rome without great gifts and expence of money. Whereof seeing the pouertie of the church is the cause, and why it is so slandered and euill spoken of: it is therfore conuenient that pon (as naturall children) should succor your mother. For vnlesse we should haue some of you and of other good men as your are, we should then lacke necessaries for our life, which were a great dishonor to our dignitie, &c.

A councell at London called.

When those petitions and causes of the legat were propounded in the foresaid assemblie at Westminster on the popes behalfe (the bishops and prelats of the realme being present) answere was made by the mouth of maister John Wexford on this wise: that the matter there propouned by the lord legat, in especiall concerned the king of England, but in generall it touched all the archbishops with their suffragans, the bishops, and all the prelats of the realme. Wherefore, seeing both the king by reason of his seignorie is absent, and the archbishop of Canturburie with diuers other bishops also were not there, therefore in the absence of them they had nothing to say in the matter, neither could they so doe without preiudice of them which were lacking. And so the assemblie for that time brake vp.

Not long after the said Otho cardinall De carcere Tullianno, comming againe from Rome Cum auctentico plenaria potestate, inuited another councell at London, caused all prelats, archbishops, bishops, abbats, priors, and other of the clergie to be warned vnto the same councell, to be had in the church of S. Paule at London about the feast of S. Martin. The pretence of which councell was for redresse of matters concerning benefices and religion; but the chiefe and principall was to hunt for money: for putting them in feare and in hope, some to lose, some to obtaine spirituall promotions at his hand, he thought gaine would rise thereby, and so it did. For in the meane time (as Parisiensis in vita Henrici tertij witneth) diuers pretious rewards were offered him in palfries, in rich plate and iewels, in costlie and sumptuous garments richly furred, in coine, in victuals, and such like things of value inel worthy of acceptation. Wherin one indeuoured to go beyond another in munificence (not considering by meanes of the seruilitie wherewith they were oppressed of those popish thawelings and shameleſſe shifters, that all was meere pillage and extortion.) In so much that only the bishop of Winchester (as the storie reporteth) hearing that he would winter at London, sent him fiftie fat oxen, an hundred coine of wine, & eight tun of chosen wine toward his house keeping. Likewise other bishops also for their part offered vnto the cardinals bor after their abilitie.

Greter rewards graunted to the cardinall.

The time of the councell drawing nigh, the cardinall commanded at the west end of Pauls church an high and solemne throne to be prepared, rising by with a glorious scaffold vpon mightie and substantiall stages strongly builded, and of great height. Thus against the day assigned, came the said archbishops, bishops, abbats and other of the prelacie, both farre and nere throughout al England, wearied and vered with the winters iourney, bringing their letters procuratorie. Who being together assembled, the cardinall begunneth his sermon. But before we come to the sermon, there hapned a great discord betweene the two archbishops of Canturburie and Yorke, for sitting at the right hand and left hand of the glorious cardinall; for the which the one appealed against the other. The cardinall to pacifie the strife betweene them both, (to that he would not deragat from either of them, brought forth a certaine bull of the pope: in the middest of which bull was pictured the figure of the crosse. On the right side of the crosse stod the image of S. Paul, and on the left side S. Peter: Lo (saith the cardinall, Contention for sitting on the right hand of the cardinall.

(holding open the bull with the crosse) here you se S. Peter on the left hand of the crosse and S. Paul on the right side, and yet is there betweene these two no contention, for both are of equal glorie. And yet S. Peter for the preeminence of his apostleship and cathedrall dignitie, feareth most worthie to be placed on the right side. But yet because S. Paul beleeued on Christ when he saw him not, therefore hath he the right hand of the crosse: For blessed be they (saith Christ) which beleeue and see not, &c. And from that time forth the archbishop of Canturburie moued the right hands, and the archbishop of Yorke, the left. Wherein yet this cardinall is more to be commended then the other cardinall Hugo mentioned a little before, which in the like contention betweene these archbishops ran his way.

Thus the controuersie ceased and composed betweene these two, Otho the cardinall sitting aloft betweene these two archbishops, beginneth his sermon, taking this theme of the prophet; In medio sedis & in circuitu eius quatuor animalia plena oculis ante & retro, &c. that is: In the midst of the seat, and in the circuit about the seat, were foure beasts full of eyes before and behind, &c. Upon this theme the cardinall proceeded in his sermon, sitting like a god in the midst. Hee compared them about him to the foure beasts about the seat, declaring how they ought to haue eyes both before and behind (that is) that they must be prouident in disposing of secular things, and circumspect in spirituall matters, continuing and ioyning twixte things past with things to come; and this was the greatest effect of his clerkely sermon. That done, he giueth forth certaine statutes for ordering of churches, as for the deuotion of temples, for seuen sacraments, for giuing of orders, for farming of benefices, collations and resignations of benefices and vicaradges, priests apparell, and single life, for casting of sloth in religious houses, for archdeacons, bishops, prodors, and such other like matters. But the chiefest intent of all his proceeding was this, that they should be vigilant, prouident, and circumspect, with all their eyes (both before and behind) to fill the popes pouch, as appeared not only by this, but all their other trauels besides. In so much that the king hearing the displeasures of his commons for the doings of the legat, willed him to repaire home to Rome againe; but yet could not be rid of him for 40 he receiuing new commandements from the pope, applied his harnesse still, gleaning and raking what soeuer he might scrape, hunting and sending to bishops and archdeacons in this forme and tenor.

A letter of the cardinall to bishops and archdeacons. Censure of the church will apply.

Fredericke the emperour married to king Johns daughter.

The fift part of cuerie spirituall mans liuing giuen to the pope.

The cause why the pope was so greedie and nedie of money, was this: because he had mortall hatred, and waged continuall battell the same time against the good emperour Frederike the second, who had to wife king Johns daughter, and sister to king Henrie the third, whose name was Isabell. And therefore because the popes war could not be sustained without charges, that made the pope the more importunat to take vp money in all places, but specially in England. In so much that money in all places, but specially in England. In so much that money in all places, but specially in England. And not only that, but also the said pope Gregorie (consenting with the citizens of Rome) so agreed with them, that if they would ioyne with him in vanquishing the foresaid Frederike, he would (and so did) grant vnto them, that all the benefices in England, which were or should be vacant (namely pertaining to religious houses) should be bestowed at their owne will and commandement to their children and kinsfolkes. Whereupon it followeth in the forenamed historie, Vnde infra paucos dies misit D. papa sacra præcepta sua domino Cant. archiep. Elienſi & Lincol. & Salisb. episcopis, vt tercentis Romanis, in primis beneficijs vacantibus prouideri, scientes se suspensos à beneficiorum collatione donec ita competenter prouiderentur: that is: The pope sent in commandement to the archbishop of Canturburie and foure other bishops, that prouision should be made for three hundred Romans in the chiefest and best benefices in all England at the next voidance: so that the foresaid archbishop and bishops should be suspended in the meane time from all collation or gift of benefices, vntill these foresaid three hundred were prouided for. Whereupon the archbishop the same time seeing the vnreasonable oppression of the church of England, left the realme and went into France.

Three hundred Romans to be placed in the best benefices of England.

Againe, marke another as much or more easie sleight of the pope in procuring money. He sent one Petrus Rubeus the same time with a new deuice, which was this: not to worke anie thing openly, but priuilie to go betwixt bishop and bishop, abbat and abbat, &c: telling in their eares, such a bishop, such an abbat hath giuen so much and so much vnto the popes holinesse, trusting that you also will not be behind for your part, &c. By the meanes hereof it is so incredible to thinke what a masse of money was made out of the realme vnto the pope.

Petrus Rubeus the popes agent.

At length the foresaid bishops, abbats, and archdeacons seeling their owne smart, came to the king (whose father before they did resist) with their humble sute lamentable complaining of the vnmeasurable exactions of the pope, and especially against Petrus Rubeus and his fellow Otto the legat, desiring the king, that seeing the matter toucheth not themselues alone, but the whole church, and seeing the saluation of churches was knowen better to their archdeacons then to themselues, therefore they desired a generall calling and talke to be had in the matter. In the octaues of S. John the baptist, the day and place was assigned where they should talke, at which day and place the prelats of England conuenting together, durst not giue anie direct denial of that contribution, but after a modest sort did insinuat certaine exceptions against the same.

Exceptions alleaged for not contributing to the pope.

1 First they say, that for so much as the contribution is demanded to warr against him, who was ioyned in matrimonie with their prince, they were not bound to do so.

2 Secondly, for that the said contribution tended to the shedding of christian blood: for so the forme of the bill pretended to fight against the emperour.

3 Thirdly because it was against the liberty of the church: for so it is in the bill, that they that would not should be excommunicat.

4 Fourthly, because that when of late they gaue the tenth part of their goods, it was with this protestation, that they should contribute to the pope no more hereafter.

5 Item, because they had contributed before, if they should now contribute againe, it were to be feared lest an action like done should grow into a custome, as is in the law, Legemo, &c.

6 Item, for so much as they shall haue causes continually to sende to Rome through the emperours land: it were to be feared lest the said emperour by the way would worke their annoiance.

7 Item, because the king hath many enemies abroad, and for his warrs hath need of much money at home, it is not conuenient that the goods of the realme should be alienated out of the realme.

8 Item, because that could not be done without preiudice to the patrons of their churches, not knowing whether their patrons did or would agree vnto the same.

9 Lastly, because they heare say that the generall state of the church is in danger, for the which they vnderstand there shall be shortly a generall councell, wherein such matters shall be determined: and therefore if they should contribute now, it should be to the hinderance and damage of the church.

The legat and his fellowes hearing these allegations, seeing their owne confusion, were the lesse importunat.

Not long after this followed a generall councell at Lions, called by pope Innocentius the fourth, in the which councell the English nation did exhibit certaine articles of their grieuances not vnworthie to be knowne. Grauatur regnum Angliæ, eo quòd D. papa non est contentus subsidio illo, quod vocatur denarius beati Petri, &c.

Articles exhibited in the councell of Lugdune by the prelates of England.

1 The kingdome of England is grieued that the pope hauing not contented with his Peter pence, requireth and exacteth from the clergie great exactions (and more is like) without the consent both of the king and against the customes of the realme.

2 Item, the church and kingdome of England is grieued, that the patrons of the same cannot present as they were wont into their churches for the popes letters: but the churches are giuen to Romans, which know neither the realme nor the tongue therof, both to the great perill of soules and robbing away away the money out of the realme.

The third.

3 Item, it is grieued, that the pope promising by the tenor of his letters, that in requiring of pensions and prouisions in the realme of England, he would require but only twelue benefices, now contrarie to the tenor thereof many more benefices and prouisions are bestowed away by him.

The fourth.

4 Item, the realme is grieued and complained, that in the benefices in England, one Italian succeedeth another, the Englishmen being not only excluded, but also compelled (for the determining of their matters) to seeke to Rome, contrarie both to the customes of the realme, and also to the priuiledges granted by the popes predecessors to the king and kingdome of England.

The fift. He meaneth perchance Otho of matter Pattenne.

5 The fift grieuance is for the oft recourse of that infamous legat, by whom both faith and fidelitie, the ancient customes of the realme, the authoritie of old grants, statutes, lawes and priuiledges, are inbecilled and abragat, whereby an infinit number in England be grieuously afflicted & oppressed.

The sixt.

6 The said realme is also grieued in generall tallages, collections, and assises, made without the kings consent, the appellation and contradiction of the kings prodors to the contrarie notwithstanding.

7 Seuenthly, the foresaid realme complaineth and is grieued, that in the benefices giuen to Italians, neither the old ordinances, nor relefe of the poor, nor hospitalitie, nor any preaching of Gods word, nor care of mens soules, nor seruice in the church, nor yet the walls of the churches be kept vp and maintained, as the manner and custome of the same realme requireth. Diuer and aboue these foresaid grieuances, there came moreouer from the pope other freely letters, charging and commanding the prelats of England to find of their proper costs and charges for one whole yeare, some ten armed souldiers, some fiue, some fiftene, to be readie at the popes commandement there where he should appoint.

After these and other grieuances and enormities of Rome, the states of England consulting together, direct their letters to the pope for reformation thereof. First the abbats and priors, then the bishops and suffragans, after the nobles and barons, last of all the king himselfe. But as the prouerbe is, Venter non habet aures, so the popes purse had no eares to heare. And as our common saying goeth: As good neuer a whit as neuer the better: so went it with the pope, who not long after the same sent foo new tallages and oratious to be collected. Which thing when it came to the kings eare, he being moued and disturbed wonderfully withall, writeth in this wise to the bishops, seuerally to euery one in his diocesse.

The letter of king Henrie the third to the bishops.

King Henrie the third commandeth no tax nor tallage to be sent to the pope.

HEnricus tertius Dei gratia, &c. Venerabili in Christo, N. episcopo salutem. Licet aliàs vobis, &c. In English thus.

Henrie the third by the grace of God, to the reuerend in Christ bishop of N. Whereas we haue heretofore written vnto you, once, twice, thrice, as wel by our priuie seales, as alsoby our letters patents, that you should not exact or collect for the popes behalfe, any tallage or other helpe of our subiects, either of the clergie, or of the laitie, for that no such tallage nor helpe either can or is vsed to be exacted in our realme without the great preiudice of our princely dignitie, which we neither will nor can suffer or sustaine: yet you contemning and vilipending our commandement, and contrarie to the prouision made in our last councell at London (granted and agreed vpon by our prelats, earles and barons) haue that notwithstanding proceeded in collecting the said your taxes and tallages. Whereupon we doe greatly maruell and are amoued (especially seeing you are not ashamed to doe contrarie vnto your owne decrees) whereas you and other prelats in the said councell in this did all agree and grant, that no such exactions should be hereafter, vntill the returne of our and your ambassadors from the court of Rome, sent thither purposely of vs, and in the name of the whole realme for the same, for to prouide redresse against these oppressions. Wherefore we straitly will and command you, that from henceforth you doe not proceed any more in collecting any exacting, such tallages or helpes, as you will inioy our fauor & such possessions of yours as within this our kingdome you haue and hold. And if you haue alreadie procured or gathered anie such thing, yet that you suffer not the same to be transported out of our realme, but cause it to be kept in safe custodie till the returne of the said ambassadors, vnder the paine of our displeasure in doing of the contrarie: and also of prouoking vs to extend our hand vpon your possessions, further then you will think or beleeue. Moreouer, willing and charging you that you participat and make common this our inhibition, with your archdeacons and officials, which we here haue set forth for the liberties of the clergie and of the people, as knoweth God, &c.

At length the ambassadors which were at Rome came home about the latter end of December, bringing word that the pope hearing what was done in the councell of Winchester and of the king, was greatlie displeased with him and the realme, saying: Rex Anglorum qui iam recalcitrat & frederisat suum habet consilium, ego verò & meum habeo, quod & fequar, &c. Whereupon when the ambassadors began to speake in the kings behalfe, from that time they were halfe counted for schismatikes, and could no more be heard in the court of Rome.

King Henrie restraineth the popes taxes.

The king hearing this, was marueilously incensed therewith, commanding by generall proclamation through all his realme, that no man should hereafter consent to any tax or subsidie of money for the court of Rome. When this came to the popes eare, vpon a cruell rage he directed his letters to the prelats of England, charging that vnder paine of suspence or interdiction, they should prouide the same summe of money to be collected against the feast of Assumption, the charge being giuen to the bishop of Worcester to be executor of the said curie. The king that lately intended to stand to the liberties of the church, now for feare of the pope and partly for perswasions of the said bishop of Worcester and other prelats, durst not stand to it, but gaue ouer. Moreouer, the grædie guile of the Romish auarice waxed so vnmeasurable, that at length the pope thaued not vpon the censure of his curse, to aske the third part of the church goods, and the yearely rent of all vacant benefices. The chiefe doers and legats in England, were Otho, Stephanus capellanus, Petrus Rubeus nuncius, Mag. Martin, and Mag. Marinus, Iohannes Anglicus episcopus Sabinensis. Of whom to speake further (for that I haue matter much more to write) for this present time I thinke best to surceasse, lest in opening all the detestable doings and pestilent workings of those men, I might perhaps not only moleste good eares, but also infect the aire. Yet one thing concerning the said Otho I cannot well ouerpasse.

This Otho, as he left no place vnsought, where any aduantage might be got: so amongst all others he came to Oxford, where lying in the house of Osney, he was received with great honour, the scholars presenting him honourable with such like duties and rewards as they had, thinking to gratifie the cardinall after the best maner. This being done before dinner, and the dinner ended, they came reuerently to see and welcome him, supposing that they also should with like courtesie againe of him be intertained. As they came to the gate, the porter (being an Italian) with a loud voice asketh what they would haue. They said they came to se the lord legat. But Cerberus the porter holding the doze halfe open, with proud and contumelious language thrust them out, and would not suffer them to enter. The scholars seeing that, by force thrust open the gate and came in: whom when the Romans which were within would haue repelled with their fists, and such staues as they had in their hands, they fell to alarum and by the eares together, with much hooting and howing and many blowes on both sides. In the meane time while some of the scholars ran home for their weapons, there chanced a poore scholar (an Irishman) to stand at the gate waiting for his mates. Whom when the master saw at the gate, taking hot scalding water out of the pan where the meat was sodden, did cast it in his face. One of the scholars a Welchman, that came with his bow and shafts, seeing that, letteth driue an arrow, and thereth this Sabuzardan (that maister of cookes) cleane thorow the bodie, and slayeth him out of hand. The cooke falling dead, there wag a mightie broile and a great clamour throughout all the house. The cardinall hearing the tumult and great noise about him, like a valiant Roman runneth as fast as he could into the steeple, and there locketh the doores fast vnto him, where he remained till midnight. The scholars in the meane while not yet all pacified sought all corners about for the legat, exclaiming and crying out: Where is that traitor, that simoniake, that piller and poller of our liuings, that proller and extortioner of our money, which peruerteth our king, and subuerteth his kingdome, inriching himselfe with our spoiles? &c. All this heard the cardinall, and held his peace. When the night approching had broken vp the field, the cardinall comming out of his seat, and taking his horse (in silence of the night) was priuily conueyed ouer the riuer toward the king, conueying himselfe away as fast as he could. After the king heard this, he sendeth to Oxford a garrison of armed men, to deliuer the Romans which were there shut vp for feare of scholars. Then was maister Otho a lawyer, with thirtie other scholars apprehended, and caried to Wallingford castle, and from thence had in carts to London, where at length (through much intreatie of the bishops) being brought barefoot to the legats bowe, had their pardon, and the Vniuersitie released of interdition. And thus much concerning the popes legat in England.

Thus partly you haue heard, and do vnderstand the insufferable thraldome and captiuitie of this realme of England and the clergie of the same, who before refused to take part with king Iohn their naturall prince, against the forren power of the pope: and now how miserably they are oppressed and scourged of the same pope, whose insatiable extortion and rapacitie did so exceed in pilling and polling of this realme long after this, that neither the king now could helpe them, neither could the pope with any reasonable measure be content. In so much (as writers record) in the daies of Sudburie archbishop of Canturburie, An. 1360. the pope by his prodors gat from the clergie in lesse then one yeare, more then fortie thousand florens, of the like summe contribution: besides his other annates and common reuenues out of benefices, prebendaries, first fruits, tributes, Peter pence, collations, reseruations, relaxations, and such merchandize, &c.

Mention was made a little before of Albingenses keeping about the citie of Tholouse. These Albingenses because they began to smell the pope and to controll the inordinat proceedings and discipline of the see of Rome, the pope therefore procured them as a people heretical, erected and directed vp recounting them as a people heretical, erected and directed vp against them this present time and yeare. Anno 1220. Ludouike the yong French king through the instance of Philip his father, to lay siege against the said citie of Tholouse, to expugne and ertinguish these Albingenses his enemies. Whereupon Ludouike according to his fathers commandement) treated a pursuit fant and a mightie armie to compasse about and beset the forenamed citie, and so did. Iohannes de S. Egidio. Alexander de Hales.

And this by the way. Now to proceed further in the yeares and life of this king Henrie. The next peare following, which was An. 1221, the king went to Oxford, where he had summoned to be with William earle de Albemarla, who had taken the castle of Lidham: but at last for his grob seruice he had done in the realme before, was released of the king with all his men, by the intercession of Walter archbishop of Yorke, and of Pandulph the legat. About which present peare entred first the frier Minorits, or Grap friers into England, and had their first house at Canterburie, whose first patron was Francisc⁹, which died Anno 1227, and his order was confirmed by pope Honorius the third, An. 1224.

About the first comming of these Dominike and Grap friers Franciscan into the realme (as is in Nicol. Triuet testified) many Englishmen the same time entred into their orders. Among whom was Iohannes de sancto Egidio, a man famous for expert in the science of physicke and astronomie, and Alexander de Hales, both Englishmen and great diuines. This Iohannes making his sermon Ad clerum, in the house of the Dominike friers, reported his auditorie with great persuasions vnto wilfull pouertie. And to confirme his words the more by his owne example, in the midst of his sermon he came downe from the pulpit and put on his friers habit: and so returning into the pulpit againe, made an end of his sermon. Likewise Alexander Hales entred the order of the Franciscans, of whom remaineth yet the booke intituled De summa theologiæ in olo libraries.

Moreouer, not long after by William de longa spata, which was the bastard sonne of king Henrie the second, and earle of Salisburie, was first founded the house of the Carthusian monkes at Heitrope, An. 1222. After whose death his wife Ela was translated to the house of Yenton in Wiltshire, An. 1227, which Ela also founded the house of nuns at Lacocke, and there continued her selfe abbesse of the place. The bishop of London named William, the same time gaue ouer his bishoprike, after whom succeeded Gufface in that se. Flor. hist.

In the towne of Oxford aboue mentioned, where the king kept his court, Simon Langton archbishop of Canterburie held a councell, where was condemned and burned a certaine deacon, as Nicol. Triuet saith, for apostasie. Also another rude countriman, who had crucified himselfe, and superstitiously bare about the woundes in his feet and hands, was condemned to be closed vp perpetually within walls. Ex Nicol. Triuet. About which peare also Alexander king of Scots maried Ione sister to king Henrie.

Ex Nic. Triuet.

Not long after began the new building of the minster of Salisburie, whereat Pandulphus the popes legat laid the fine first stones; not for the pope (such was the fortune of that church to haue the popes stone in his foundation) the second for the yong king Henrie; the third, for the good earle of Salisburie; the fourth, for the countesse; the fift, for the bishop of Salisburie, &c. which was about the same peare aboue mentioned, An. 1221. Ex chron. do. Sal.

Ex Nic. Triuet.

In the same peare about S. James tide fell a dissension betweene the citizens of London and men of Westminster, the occasion whereof was this. A certaine game betweene these two parties was appointed, to trie whether part in wrestling could ouercome the other. Thus in striuing for maistrie, each part contending against the other (as the manner is in such pastime) it happened the Londoners to get the victorie, and the other side was put to foile, but especially the steward of the abbat of Westminster, who being not a little confounded therewith, began to forethinke in his mind how to be reuenged against the Londoners. Whereupon another day was set, which was at Lammas, that the Londoners should come against to wrestle, and who so had the victorie should haue the belt: whether, which was the price of the game appointed. As the parties were thus occupied in their play, the steward suddenlie bringeth vpon the Londoners vnawares a company of barnes fed men prepared for the same before, and letteth driue at the Londoners, who at length being wounded and grieuously hurt, after much bloud shed were driuen backe againe into the citie. This tumultie thus being receiued, the citizens eagerly fruche ken with ire and impatience, ran to the common bell, and by ringing thereof assembled their commens together, to consult with themselues what was to be done in that case so contumelious. Wherein when diuers sentences were giuen diuerslie, Serle the same time maior of London (a wise and discreet man) gaue this counsell, that the abbat of Westminster should be talked withall, who if he would reuoke the iniurie done, and satisfie for the harme receiued, it should be to them sufficient. But this for the harme receiued, it should be to them sufficient. But this for the harme receiued, it should be to them sufficient. But this thedrall and conuentuall church. Which being so, they much marruelled that he would not in the publike councell make manifest to them those letters which specially concerned them as much as the others. Wherefore their request was to him in the Lord, that no such offensiue matter might rise by him in the French church; knowing this, that the thing he enterpriseth could not be brought to effect without great offence taken, and inestimable damage to the church of France. For graue (said they) that certaine will assent vnto you, yet their assent standeth in no effect concerning such matters as touch the whole: especially, seeing both the states of the realme with all the inferiour subiects, yea and the king himselfe they are sure will withstand the same, to the venture not only of their honor, but of their life also, considering the case to be such, as vpon the offence whereof standeth the subuersion both of the realme publike, and of the whole church in generall. Declaring moreouer the cause of this feare to rise hereof, for that in other realmes such communication hath been with bishops and prelats for the procuring of such prebendships, whereas neither the prince nor the subiects were made any thing priuie thereto.

Inferiours euer must bold to speake vnto their superiours in all matters of truth, then the rich.

In conclusion, when the matter came to debating with the legat, the obiections of the inferiour parts against the cruell exaction were these in briefe effect, as is in Parisiensis noted.

The obiections of the clergie of France against the popes exaction.

First, they alleaged their great damages and expenses which they were like to sustaine thereby, by reason of the continuall procurators of the pope, which in euery diocese must line not of their owne, but must be sustained vpon the charges of the cathedrall churches, and other churches also, and many times they being but procurators, will be found as legats.

Item, by that means they said great perturbations might insue to the couents and chapters of cathedrall churches in their elections: for so much as the popes agents and factors being in euerie cathedrall church and chapter house, perchs the pope would command him in his person to be present at their elections, and so might trouble the same, in delaying and deferring till it might fall to the court of Rome to giue: and so should be placed more of the popes clientele in the churches of France, then of the proper inhabitants of the land.

Item, by this meanes they affirmed, that all they in the court of Rome should be richer, and should receiue more for their proposition then the king of the realme: by reason of which abundance of riches it was like to come to passe, that as the wonne of rich men is paire; so by the meanes of this their riches, the court of Rome would delay and driue off great suites, and scarce would take any paines with small causes. The experiment whereof is euident, for that now also they vse to delay the matters when they come with their gifts, and being in assurance to receiue. And thus should iustice stand aside, and poore suitors die at the gates of the court of Rome, thus flowing and triumphing in full abundance of all treasure and riches.

Item, for so much as it is meete and conuenient to haue friends in the court of Rome, for the better speeding of their causes, therefore they thought to keep them wiselie, whereby their gifts may be the sweeter, and their causes sooner dispatched.

Item, when as it is impossible the fountaine of greedie desire to be stopped, it was to be feared that either they would do that by others which they were wont to do by themselues, or else they should be inforced to giue greater rewards then before; for small gifts in the sight of great rich men are not looked vpon.

Item, where he alleaged the removing away of the slander which goeth on the court of Rome: by this meanes rather the contrarie were to be feared, wherein they alleaged the sentence of the verse, that great riches stop not the taking of much, but a mind contented with a little:

Quod virtus reddit, non copia sufficientem;
Et non paupertas sed mentis hiatus egentem.

Further, they alleaged that great riches would make the Romans mad, and so might kindle among them sides and parts taking, so that by great possessions sedition might follow to the ruine and destruction of the citie, whereof some experiment they had already.

Item, they added, that although they would condescend and oblige themselues to that contribution, yet their successours would not so be bound, nor yet ratifie the bond of theirs.

Lastly, thus they conclude the matter, desiring him that the zeale of the vniuersall church, and of the church of Rome would moue him: for if this oppression of the church should be vniuersall, it were to be doubted left an vniuersall departing might follow from the church of Rome: which God forbid (say they) should happen.

God graunt, say we.

The legat hearing these words, being therewith something moued (as seemed) excused himselfe, that he being in the court neuer agreed in this exaction: and that the letters hereof came not to him before he was in France. Whereat he said he was greatly sorie, adding this withall, that the words of his percept included this secret meaning in them thus to be vnderstood and taken: so far forth as the empire and other realmes would agree vnto the same. And as for him, he would stir no more in the matter, before it were proued what other countries would say and do therein.

The cardinall repulsed and defeated of his purpose in France.

And thus much concerning the second part of the blind commission of this legat touching his eraction of prebendships in euerie cathedrall and conuentuall church; wherein as yee heare, he was repulsed: Ex Matth. Paris. pag. 62.

Matth. Paris. pag. 62.

The popes traffeth was against the earle and the people of Tholouse.

Now to returne to the first part of his commission againe, which was concerning Reimundus the godly earle of Tholouse, thus the storie proceedeth; that while the legat was in hand with this matter of the popes money, in the meane season certaine preaching friers were directed by the said Romanus the popes legat into al France, to incite and stir vp the Frenchmen to take the crosse vpon them, and to war against the earle of Tholouse and the people thereof, whom they accounted then for heretikes. At the preaching whereof a great number of prelats and lay-men signed themselues with the crosse, to fight against the Tholosians, being thereto induced, as the storie saith, more for feare of the French king or fauor of the legat, then for any true zeale of iustice. For so it followeth in the words of Paris: Videbatur enim multis abusio, vt hominem fidelem christianum infestarent, præcipue cum constaret cuncti is eum in concilio nuper Biturisensi, multis precibus persuasisse legato, vt veniret ad singulas terræ suæ ciuitates, inquirens a singulis articulos fidei: & si quempiam contra fidem inuenires, &c. For to many (saith he) it seemed an abuse, to moue warre against a faithfull christian man, especially seeing in the councell of Bitures (before all men) he intreated the legat with great instance that he would come into euerie citie within his dominions, and there to inquire of euerie person the articles of his faith: where if hee found any man to hold any thing contrarie to the catholike faith, he promised a full satisfaction to be had therof, according to the censure of the church, to the vttermoft, &c.

Testimonie of the author by the clearing of Reimundus and of the Albingenses.

Yet all this notwithstanding, the pseud legat contemning this so hautie and reasonable purgation of the earle Reimundus, ceased not by all manner meanes to prosecute the popes furie against him and his subiects, stirring vp the king and the Frenchmen vnder paine of excommunication, to war against them. Likewise the French king thus being inforced by the legat, answered againe, that he for his owne safetie would not attempt that expedition or aduenture against the earle, vnlesse it were first obtained of the pope to write to the king of England: commanding him that hauing the time of that expedition, he should vnite and make fit no peece of his lands and possessions which he the same present time did hold, whether by right or by wrong, or bobsolouer they were holden, while the time of the said war against the heretikes (as they were then termed) did indure, but rather should aid and assist him with counsell and money in that enterprise. All which being done and accomplished, the French king and the legat (crossing themselues to the field) appointed a day peremptorie for the French army to meet together at Lions, vnder paine of the popes excommunication, and with horse and harneste to set vpon the Tholosians, against the Ascension day next insuing.

The vntrustie tyrannie of the pope against the Tholosians.

Lewis the French king and Romanus the popes legat marching against the Albingenses.

Item, the Ascension day was come, which was the day peremptorie appointed, the French king hauing prepared at Lions all things necessarie for his armie, marcheth forward with a great and mightie host; after whom also commeth the legat, with his bishops and prelats. The number of fighting men in his armie besides the victuallers and waggeners were 500 men. The legat by the law openly excommunicated the earle of Tholouse, & all that take his part, and further more interdicted his whole land. Thus the king came marching forward, till he came into the prouince of Tholouse, and the first citie which they came vnto there of the earles was Auinion: which citie they thought first to haue besieged, and so in order after, as they went, to haue destroyed and wasted all the whole prouince belonging to the earle. And first the king demanded of them to haue his passage through their citie, fairing himselfe in peaceable wise (for the expedition of his iourney) but to passe through the same. The citizens consulting with themselues what was to be done, at length gaue answere that they mistrusted their comming, and supposed that in deceit they required the entrance of their citie, and so no necessitie of their iourney.

Remaunding earle of Tholouse excommunicated.

The citie of Auinion besieged.

The king hereat being much offended, sware an oth that he would not depart thence till he had taken the citie, and immediatly in those places where he thought most meet, he began to giue sharpe assaults, with all manner of suitable engins: the citizens againe within, manfully defended themselues, casting stone for stone, and hayling shot for shot, and slew and wounded many of the Frenchmen. Thus, when they had long besieged the citie, and could not win the saun: at length victuals in the French campe began to faile, and many of them died for hunger. For the earle of Tholouse as a wise man of war, hearing before of their comming, tooke into the towne all the prouision that was abroad, and left nothing without to serue for their defence and succour: he plowed vp the fields, that there should no flower be found to serue their hosses, he put out of the towne all the old people and young children, left they should want victuals that kept the towne, and before their comming sent them far away; so that within the towne they had plentie, and without they died for famine. And besides in seeking farre for their forage, manie fell into the hands of them that kept the citie, who secretly lay in wait for them abroad and slew manie of them: besides a great number of cattell and hosses died for want want of forage: and poore soldiers that had no great store of monie, died for want of victuals. By which mortalitie and sickenes both of men and cattell, grew great infection and pestilence amongst them, in so much that the king himselfe and also the legat were greatly dismaied, thinking it to be no little shame as well to the realme of France, as also to Rome, that they should depart and breake vp their siege. Thus againe thought the souldiers, that much better it were for them to end their liues by battell then so to die like dogs and starue. Wherefore with one consent they purposed to giue a new assault at the bridge that goeth ouer the flood Rhodanus into the towne, to which place they came in such number, that either by the debilitie of the bridge, or subtilitie of the souldiers that kept the towne, three thousand of them with bridge and all fell armed into the violent streame, and were drowned. What was there then but ioy and gladnesse of the citizens part, and much lamentation and heauinesse on the other part? Then shortly after, the citizens of Auinion (when they saw a conuenient time, whilest their enemies were in eating meat) came suddenly vpon them out of the towne, and slue of them two thousand, and tooke the towne againe with safetie. But the legat with his companie of prelats (like good men of warre) practised none other martiall feats, but all to be cursed the earle of Tholouse, his cities and his people. Ludouicus the king, to auoid the pestilence that was in the campe, went into an abbie not farre off, where the battle after he died, of whose death are sundrie opinions, some saying that he was poisoned, some that he died of a bloudie flix.

Lewis the French king died at the siege of Auinion.

Whose death notwithstanding the legat thought to keepe secret and conceale, till that the towne might bee rendred and giuen vp: for he thought himselfe shamed for euer, if hee should depart before the towne were wonne. Wherefore after hee had incouraged the souldiers afresh, and yet after many sharpe assaults could not preuaile, he bethought him how by falshood he might betray them, and sent vnto them certaine heralds, to will them that they should amongst themselues consult vpon articles of peace, and bring the same to their campe, whose safe conduct they faithfully promised and warranted both of comming and going. And when they had giuen their pledges for the same, the messengers from the citizens talked with the legat: who promised them, if they would deliuer vp their citie, they should haue their liues, goods and possessions in as ample manner as now they inioyed the same. But the citizens & souldiers refused to be vnder the seruitude of the French king, neither would to deliuer vp their citie to those, of whose insolent pride they had so good experiment. After much talke on both sides, and in one like to take effect, the legat requested them, & friendly desired, that he and his prelats which were about him, might come into their citie to examin what faith and beleefe they were of, and that he neither sought nor ment any other thing thereby, but their owne safeties as well of bodie as soule, which thing he faithfully sware vnto: For (saith he) the lute of your great infidelitie hath come to the lord popes eares, and therefore desired he to make true certificat thereof. Whereupon the citizens not mistrusting his faithfull oth and promise made vnto them, granted entrance to him and the residue of the clergie, bringing with them no weapon into the town. The souldiers of the campe, as it was agreed before, made them ready, so that at the entrance of the prelats in at the gate, nothing regarding their oth and fidelitie, the other suddenlie were readie, and with violence rushed in, flue the porter & wardens, and at length wonne the citie and destroyed the same, and flue many of them that were within. Thus by falshood and policie, when they had gotten this noble citie, they carried the kings corps vnto Paris where they buried the same. Of the whole number of the French souldiers which in this siege were destroyed by famine, pestilence, and drowning, he recounted more then two and twentie thousand: Whereby, saith the storie of Mat. Parisiensis, it may euidentlie appeare the warre was vniustlie taken in hand, &c: Ex Mat. Parisiensi.

The vncontinent life of these Romish prelats to bee noted.

After these things finished, and after the funerall of the king celebrated at Paris, it followeth more in the said historie of Parisiensis, that the said legat Romanus was vehementlie suspected, and grieuously inflamed to abuse himselfe with Blanca the kings mother: Suspicium est (saith he) hoc credere, quia æmuli eius hoc disseminauerunt; benignus autem animus dubia in melius interpretatur: that is, But it is vngodly to suspect any such thing of him, because his enemies to rumored the same abroad; but a gentle mind expoundeth things doubtfull in the better part.

To passe further to the yere next following, which was {Anno 1227.} 1227. of the Lord, first is to be noted, that in this yere king Henrie beginning to shoote vp vnto the twentith yere of his age, came from Reading to London, where he began to charge the citizens of London for old reckonings, namely for giuing of lending one thousand marks to Lewis the French king, at his departing out of the realme, to the great preiudice of him and of his kingdome. For the recompence whereof they were constrained to yeld to the king the full sum of the like monie. That done he remoued to Oxford, where he assembled a great councell, there denouncing and protesting before them all that he was come to sufficient age, no more to be vnder tutors and gouernors; but to be his owne man: requiring to be freed from the custodie of others. Which thing being protested, and contraried forthwith; hee by the counsell of Hubert the chiefe iustice (whom hee made then the earle of Kent) removed from his companie the bishop of Winchester, 3 others, vnder whom he was moderated. And immediatlie in the same councell, by the sinister perswasion of some, doth annihilat and make void the charters and liberties before by him granted, pretending this colour: for that they had been granted and sealed in the time of his minoritie, at what time he had the rule neither of himselfe, nor of his seale. Whereupon much muttering and murmuring was among the multitude, who did all impute the cause to Hubert the iustice. Moreouer, it was the same time proclaimed, that who soeuer had any charter, or gift sealed vnder the time of the kings minoritie, they should come and renew the same againe vnder the new seale of the king, knowing otherwise that the thing should stand in no effect. And finallie, for renewing of their seales, were taxed not according to their abilitie, but according as it pleased the iustice and other to leuie them.

Moreouer, beside this general subsidie of the fifteenth granted to the king through the whole realme, and beside also the contribution of the Londoners, diuers other parcels and payments he gathered through seuerall places: as of the burgesses of Northhampton he required a thousand and two hundred marks, for his helping of them, and so of others likewise. All this preparation of monie was made toward the furnishing of his voiage to recouer Normandie. And yet because hee would gratifie the citie of London againe with some pleasure: hee granted the citizens thereof (should passe toll-free (saith Fabian) throughout all England. And if of any citie, towne, or towne they were constrained at any time to pay their toll, then the shiriffes of London to attach euery man comming to London of the said citie, borough, or towne, and him with his goods to withhold, till the Londoners were againe refunded of all such monie paid for the said toll, with all costs and damages sustained for the same. Anno 1228

I declared before, how after the death of Honorius succeeded pope Gregorie the tenth, betweene the which Gregorie and the people of Rome, this yere, fell a great sedition. Insomuch that about the fall of Easter, they thrust the pope out of the citie, pursuing him vnto his castle at Viterbium. Where also they inuaded him so valiantlie, that they chased him to Perusium. Then hauing no other remedie wherwith to reuenge his persecutors, fiercely did excommunicat them. Ex Mat. Paris. pag. 69.

Ex Fabi. part. 7.

Sedition betweene the Romans and the pope.

Here, by the way, is to be obserued and considered, christian reader, not only by this sedition, but by so many other schismes, diuisions, tumults, fightings, battels & contentions in the church of Rome, euen from the first beginning of the popes dominion, and that not only within the citie of Rome, but vniuersallie almost in all popish monasteries, colledges, churches, and conuents vnder the pope subiected, continuallie raigning amongst them, what is to be thought of their religion and holinesse, hauing so little peace, so great disquietnesse, dissensions, and wrangling amongst them, as in stories both manifold it is to behold, and wonderous to consider.

The popes church may be iudged by their dissensions and schismes.

No peace in the popes church.

And so much as I haue entred here into the mention of this schismaticall commotion betweene the pope and his clergie: it followeth moreouer in the historie of Parisiensis, who maketh relation of a like hayling matter, which befell the same yere, and time, An. 1228. betweene the prior and conuent of Durham, and this king Henrie the third vpon this occasion: After the death of Richard bishop of Durham, the prior and chapter of the said church came to the king, to obtaine licence for the electing of their bishop. The king offered to them one Lucas a chaplen of his, requiring them instantly to elect him for their bishop. To this the monks answered, that they would receiue no man, but by their order of canonicall election. Meaning belike by their canonicall election, that is, when as they elect either some monke out of their owne companie, or else some monkish priest after their owne liking. Contrarie, the king against sendeth word vnto them, and bound it with an oth, that they should tarrie seuen yeres without a bishop, vnlesse they would admit the forsaid Lucas to that place of that dignitie. All which notwithstanding, the monks preceding in their election, refused the said Lucas, and preferred another clerke of theirs, named William archdeacon of Worcester, and him they presented to the king: but the king bringing in exceptions and causes against the partie, would not admit him.

Dissension betweene the prior and conuent of Durham and the king.

Canonicall election.

Then the monks in all haste speed send vp to Rome certaine of their couent, to haue their election ratified by the authoritie apostolicall. On the other side the king likewise hearing, sendeth also to Rome against the monks, the bishop of Chester, and the prior of Lentonie on his behalfe, to withstand the purpose of the monks. And to the matter being trauised with great altercatio on both sides, did hang in suspence (saith mine author) till at length thus it was concluded betweene both, that neither matter William, nor yet Lucas should be taken, but that Richard bishop of Sarum should be translated to Durham, and be bishop there. An. 1228. Ex Matth. Parisiensi.

like matter, betweene the monks of Couentrie and the canons of Lichfield, about choosing of their bishop, which of them should haue the superior voice in the election of their prelat. After much adoe, the cause at length being hoisted vp to Rome, had this determination; that the monks of Couentrie & the church of Lichfield should chuse their bishop by course, each part keeping his turne the one after the other: prouided notwithstanding, that the prior of Couentrie should alwaies haue the first voice in euery election, whereas the old custome was, saith mine author, that the couent with the prior of Couentrie was wont to haue the whole election of the bishop without the canons; this was An. 1228. Ex Parisiensi, pag. 68.

Ex Mat. Paris. pag. 64.

Stephan Langton first archbishop here.

The chapters of the Bible first distinguished by Stephan Langton.

In the which yere died Stephan Langton archbishop of Canturburie, by whom as is recorded by Nic. Triuet, the chapters of the Bible, in that order & number as we now vse them, were first distinct. The said Langton also made postils vpon the whole Bible. The same moreouer builded the new hall in the palace of Canturburie.

Another contention betweene the monks of Canturburie and king Henrie the third. Obiections laid against the new archbishop.

After the death of this Langton insued another variance about the election of the archbishop of Canturburie, betweene the monks of Canturburie and the king. The perturbation whereof as it was no lesse seditious, so the determination of the same was much more colticke. After the death of Stephan Langton, the monks of Canturburie obtaining licence of the king to proceed in the election of a new archbishop, did chuse one of their owne societie named master Walter Hemeham. Whom when the monks had presented vnto the king, bee after long deliberation, began to obiect against that election, saying: first, that the monks had elected but one as neither was profitable to him nor his kingdome. Secondly, he obiected against the partie elect, that his father was conuict of felonie, and hanged for the same. Thirdlie, that hee stood in causes against his father king John in the time of the interdict. Moreouer, the bishops his suffragans charged the partie elect, that he had lien with a certaine nun, and had children by her: adding further, that the election of the archbishop was without their presence, which ought not to be, &c. But the archbishop against all this standing vnto his election, appealed vp to Rome, and estsoones taking with him certaine monks, presented himselfe to the popes aiont prouer person, there to see his appeale, instant the matter, that his election might stand confirmed by his authoritie pontificall. But the pope vnderstanding that the said election was resisted by the king and the bishops, deferred the matter vntill he did heare further of the certaintie thereof. The king and the bishops hauing intelligence that the archbishop with his monks were gone to Rome, thought good to acquaint the foresaid obiections alone alleaged, in writing; and sealing the same with the seales both of the king and of the bishops to exhibit them to the bishop of Rome. The messengers of these letters, were the bishops of Rochester, of Chester, and the archdeacon of Bedford master John, &c. Who comming to Rome, and exhibiting their message with their letters vnto the pope; consideration being had vpon the same, were commanded to wait attendance against the next day after Ashwednesday: then to haue a resolute answer concerning the cause, which was the second day of March the next yere following, that is, in the yere of our Lord 1229. In the meane season, the kings procurators ceased not with all instance to labour the pope and his cardinals to be fauourable to the kings side. But finding them fourthat hard and strict in the matter, as is the guise of that court; they began to mistrust their speeding. Wherefore consulting together with themselues vpon the premisses, they came to the pope, promising in the kings behalfe to be giuen and granted to him out of the realmes both of England and Ireland, the tith or tenth part of all the goods within the said realmes moueable, to sustaine his wars against the emperor, so that he would incline fauourably to the kings suit and petition herein. At dominus papa (saith Paris) quia rebellem imperatorem sibi per omnia sibi subiugare cupiens, tantis promissionibus exhortatus fuerat, vt consentiret. That is, But the pope, saith the author, which boiled with desire aboue all measure, to haue the emperour his enemie cast doiune, being cheered with so great promises granted by his consent to them, who sitting then in his consistorie had these words, as here follow.

The popes answere to the election of Walter archbishop of Canturburie.

There hath come of late to our intelligence the election of a certaine monke named Walter, to be archbishop of Canturburie, whereupon after that we heard and aduised as well those things which the said monke hath said for himselfe and for his election: as also on the contrarie side, the obiections and exceptions of the bishops of England alleaging against him and against his election; namelie of the bishop of Chester, the bishop of Rochester, and John archdeacon of Bedford: We vpon the same committed the examination, touching the person of the man, vnto our reuerend brethren lord cardinall Albanie, Lord cardinall Thomas de Sabina, and master Peter. And when the foresaid elect comming before them, was asked of them, first concerning the Lords descending into hell, whether he descended in flesh, or without his flesh, he answered not well. Item, being asked touching the making of the bodie of Christ on the altar, he answered likewise not soundly. Being asked moreouer how Rachel wept for her children, she being dead before, he answered not well. Item, being asked concerning the sentence of excommunication denounced against the order of law, he answered not wel. Againe, being required of matrimonie, if one of the married parties be an infidell, and do depart, he answered there-to not well. Vpon these articles he was (as is said) diligentlie examined of the cardinals, to the which wee say hee answered not onely not well, but also very ill. For so much therefore, as the church of Canturburie is a noble church, and requireth a noble prelat, a man discreet and modest, and such as ought to be taken out of the bosome of the church of Rome; and for so much as this new elect (whom not only heere we pronounce to be vnworthie, but also should say more of him, if wee would proceed with him by the rigor of the law) is so insufficient, that he ought not be admitted to such a roome: we doo vtterly to our selues the prouision of the said church. Hec ex Mat. Parien. sub verbum.

The election of Walter archbishop of Canturburie disalloued of the pope for the kings mony.

Thus the election of Walter being frustrat and disalloued, the kings procurators, bringing forth the letters of the king, and of the suffragans of the church of Canturburie, presented the same vnto the pope for the ratification of Richard chancellor of Lincolne, to bee appointed archbishop of Canturburie, whom they with great commendation of words did set forth to be a man of profound learning and knowledge, of an honest conuersation; and which was greatest of all, that he was a man much for the profit of the church of Rome, as also for the realme of England. And thus the said Richard being commended to the pope by the letters procuratorie of the king and of the bishops, had the consent of the pope and of the cardinals, and so was made bishop of Canturburie before he was elected. Whereupon the said pope Gregorie in his behalfe directeth downe his letters to all and singular suffragans of the church of Canturburie, declaring thus, and beginning first with a tie; that for so much as by the fulnesse of ecclesiasticall power the charge of pastorall office is committed to him in generall vpon all churches, he therefore for the sollicitude hee beareth as well to all other churches in generall, as in special to the metropolitan church of Canturburie, repudiating and disanulling the former election of Walter the monke vpon iust causes, both prouided for, that see a man, as in all other good gifts verie first and excellent, by the report of them that know him, so for that function verie fit and commodious; and willeth and commandeth them, and all others by his authoritie apostolicall, with all deuout reuerence to receiue him, and humblie to obay him, &c: which was An. 1229. The church of Couentrie finished.

The popes French armie thinking to destroy Raimund, is deliuered by the way.

These letters thus finished at Rome, the pope not forgetting the sweet promises made of the English siluer which he so gratuitie gaped for, omitting neither time nor diligence, in all speedie wise sendeth vnto the king of England & Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, which were promised to him before, there with to maintaine his war against Frederike the emperor. And to the intent he might inflame al christian realms with the like hatred which he bare against Frederike the emperor, sendeth also with the said Stephan speciall letters full of manifold complaints, and grieuous accusations against the said emperour, whereof more (Christ granting) shall be shewed hereafter. Vpon the comming of this Stephan the legat, the king assembled all his earles and barons, with the archbishops, bishops, abbats, priors, templaries, hospitalers, parsons, and vicars, and other such as held of him in capite, to appeare before him at Westminster, to the end to commune of the matter. In the assembly of whom, the popes patent letters were brought forth and read, wherein hee required the tenths of all the moueables in England, Wales, and Ireland, as well of the clergie as of the laitie, to maintaine his expedition against the foresaid Frederike the emperor. The which expeditio as he pretended to atchieue and to take in hand for the cause of the vniuersall church, and the pope, had begun the matter alreadie, and for so much as the riches of the apostolik see did not suffice for the accomplishing of so great an enterprise, he therefore inforced by mere necessitie, did implore the aid and help of all the true obedient and natural chickens of the church of Rome. left the members thereof together with the head should be subuerted. These letters of the pope to this effect, being openlie recited & explained by ꝑ popes chapien, which he with much more allegation and perswasion of words did amplifie to his vttermost; the king (saith mine author) in whom all men did hope for helpe to their defence, became then as a staffe of reed. For so much as he had obliged himselfe to the same before, for the election of his archbishop, now could he say nothing against it, but held his peace. The earles, barons, and all the laitie vtterlie refused so to bind their bareines to the church of Rome: but the bishops, abbats, priors, with other prelats of the church, first requiring space & respit to deliberat for three or foure daies; at length for feare of the popes curse (although they durst not vtterly withstand) had brought to passe to haue concluded for a sum of mony much lesse, had not Stephan Segraue, one of the kings counsellors, craftilie commoned with the legat; and by subtill meanes bought it so to passe, that the whole tenths were gathered and paid, to the inestimable gantine, hee sendeth to euery shire his proctors to gather the popes monie, or else to excommunicat them which denied to pay. And for so much as the present need of the pope required present helpe without delay, he sendeth moreouer to the bishops and prelats of the realme, in paine of interdiction, forthwith to procure and send to him either of their owne or vplone, or by fauce, or by what meanes soeuer, so much mony in all post speed for the present vse of the pope; and after to take vp against the said monie of the tenths of euerie singuler person, by the right taxing of their goods. Vpon this, the prelats to auoid the danger (hauing no other remedie) were driuen to sell their chalices, crutes, copes, iewels, and other church plate, and some to lay to mortgage such things as they had, some also to borow vpon vsurance to make vp the monie which was required. Moreouer, the said Stephan the popes chaplen (as reported by Paris) brought with him into England for the same purpose, such bankers and vsurers, who lending out their monie vpon great vsurie, did vnreasonablie pinch the English people, which merchant vsurers were then called Caursini. Briefle, such strict exaction was then vpon the poore Englishmen, that not onlie their present goods were valued and taxed, but also the corne yet growing in the field, against the next haruest was tithed, &c. Onelie the earle of Chester named Ranulphus, stood stoutly against the pope, suffring none within his dominion either lay man or clerke to yeeld any tenths to the popes proctors. Ex Mat. Paris. pag. 74. And this was the end of the strife betweene the monks of Canturburie and the king for the election of their archbishop, which was about the yere of our Lord 1229. in the which yere was finished the new church of Couentrie, by Alexander bishop of the said citie, and partlie by the helpe of the king: which church, Richard his predecessor bishop before him of Couentrie had begun.

The Frenchmen about this time againe prepared themselues towards Poyters, to warre against the foresaid Reimundus earle of Tholouse, and to expulse him out of his possessions. And hearing that he was in his castle of Saracene, they made thither all their power, thinking there to inclose and compasse him about: but the earle being priuie of their conspired purpose, set vpon them by the way, appointing certaine ambushments in woods, not so secretly as strongly, there to wait and receiue the comming of the Frenchmen, and to giue them their welcome. Thus when the French were entred the wood, the earle with his traine of well armed and able warriors, suddenly did sle vpon them on wares, and gaue them a bitter meeting, so that in that conflict fiue hundred of the French soldiers were taken, and many slaine. Of their seruitors to the number of two thousand men with their armour were taken, of whom some lost their eies, some their noses, some their eares, some their legs, and so sent home; the rest were carried away prisoners into the castell. After the death of this Richard, the monks of Canturburie (according to the manor) addresse themselues to a new election: at which was chosen Ralfe Neuill, bishop of Chichester, who was the kings chancellor, much commended in stories, to be a man faithfull, vpright, and constant: which from the way of iustice declined neither to the right hand nor to the left, but vpright and sincere both in word and deed. This Ralfe (thus chosen of the monks) was presented vnto the king to be their archbishop, wherewith the king was right well contented, and glad alle of his election: and forthwith inuested him for archbishop of the church of Canturburie. sking of the king was not enough, vnlesse he should also be confirmed by the pope. Wherefore the monks readie to take their iourney vnto Rome, came to the new archbishop, requiring his helpe for their expenses by the way, and to know what seruice he would command them to the court of Rome. But he fearing in his mind the same not to be without some scruple of simonie and ambition, said he would not giue an halpenie, and holding vp his hands to heauen, thus prayed, saying: O Lord God, if I shal be thought worthie to be called (although indeed vnworthie) to the seat and office of this church: so be it as thou shalt dispose it. But if otherwise in this troublesome office of chancery, and this my inferior ministerie, whereunto I haue bin assigned, I shall seeme more necessarie for this thy kingdome and people, I refuse not my labour, thy will be done.

The monks beholding the constancie of the man, notwithstanding they had of him no monie, yet refused not their trauell and iournie to Rome, to haue their election confirmed by the popes authoritie. The pope inquiring of Simon Langton (brother of Stephan Langton archbishop of Canturburie before mentioned) of the person of this man, it was reported against him by the said Simon (maliciously depraning the good man behind his backe) declaring to the pope that hee was a courtier, vnlearned, lasciue, and seruent in his doings, and such a one, who if he should be promoted to that dignitie, would go about with the helpe of the king and of the whole realme, to remoue and bring the reaime of England from vnder the yoke of the pope and of the church of Rome: and for to breaine the yoke of Rome of the tribute, vnder which king Iohn had once subiected himself and his realme, at what time he pulled his crowne to the hands of Pandulphus the legat, &c. With these and such other words Simon Langton fallie and maliciously depraned the godly bishop. The pope hearing with one eare and receiuing what he heard, without further inquisition made of the matter partie accused, sendeth incontinent to the monks of Canturburie to proceed in a new election, and to chose them another archbishop, such as were an wholsome pastor of soules, profitable vnto the church of England, and benigne to the church of Rome: and thus was the lawfull election of this good archbishop made frustrat, too good peraduenture to serue in that place whereunto he was elected.

After the repulse of this Radulph, the Canturbury monks entring a new election, agreed vpon Iohn their prior, to bee their metropolitan, who going vp to Rome to haue his election confirmed by the pope, was there bates together examined of the cardinals. And when they could find no insufficiencie in him, touching those things wherein they tried him, notwithstanding the pope finding fault with his age (he peraduenture being more aged himselfe) repelled him, for that hee said he was to old and simple to sustaine that dignitie. Ex Paris.

What was the age of this person, I find it not in the author expressed; yet it is to be supposed, that he which was able to take that iourny to Rome and home again, was not so greatly to be complained of for his age, but that he was able sufficientlie to take paines in keeping the chaire of Canturburie.

In the former parts of this storie preceding, partly before hath been declared, partlie hereafter more shall appeare (Christ willing) how the church of England and commons of the same was grieued and miserable afflicted by the intollerable oppressions of the pope: who through his violent extortion had procured the best benefices to be giuen vnto his Romans, and the chiefe fruits of them to be referred to his owne coffers. And what complaints thereof haue been made, yet heard to force: but no redresse could be had. Such was the insatiable auarice of these Romane rakehels polling and polling therefore the realme, with their propulsions and exactions out of measure, and neuer satisfied. In so much that here in England whosoeuer lacked, their barnes were alwaies full of corne; and what penurie soeuer pinched the people, they were sure to haue inough. And these importunat exactions and contributions of these Italia harpyes, besides the Peter pence, besides the common tribut, daily more and more increased, to the great griefuance of the realm, in so much that the wealth of this land was almost cleane sucked vp and translated to the court of Rome. Neither was the king ignorant hereof, but could not helpe the matter. Wherefore it was deuised by some of the nobles (as appeareth in the storie of Parisiensis) this foresaid yere, An. 1222. that certaine letters vnder the pretensed colour of the kings authoritie, should be sent abroad, willing and commanding, that such come and graine with other reuenues, as were taken vp for the pope, should be staid and forth comming by a certaine day in the said letters appointed; the which letters are thought to proceed chiefly by the meanes of Hubert lord chiefe iustice of England, who then next vnder the king, ruled the most affaires of the realme. The words and contents of the letters be these.

After diuers and sundrie griefes and oppressions which this realme, as you know, hath sustained by the Romanists, and yet doth, as well to the preiudice of the king himselfe, as also of the nobility of the same, concerning the aduoasons of their churches, and about their tithes: who also goe about to take from the clerks and spiritual men their benefices, and to bestow them vpon their owne nation and countrimen, to the spoile and confusion both of vs and our realme: we therefore by our common consents haue thought good (although very late) now yet rather, then any longer to suffer their intollerable oppressions and extortions, to resist and withstand the same. And by the taking from them their benefices through all England, in like maner to cut short and bridle them, as they had thought to haue kept vnder and bridled others: whereby they may desist any longer to moleste the realme. Wherefore we straitly charge and command you, that as touching the farming of their churches, or else the rents belonging to them, which either you haue presently in your hands, or else do ow vnto the said Romanists, that from henceforth you be no more accountable to them, or else pay to them from henceforth the same. But that you haue the said your rents and reuenues readie by such a day, to pay and deliuer vnto our procurators thereunto by our letters assigned; and that al abbats and priors haue the same in a readinesse at the time appointed, in their owne monasteries: and all other priests, clerks, and laimen, at the churches of the Romanists, there readie to pay. And further, know yee for certaintie, that if ye refuse thus to doe; that all that you haue besides, shall bee by vs burnt and spoiled. And besides, looke what danger we purpose shall fall vpon them, the same shall light vpon your necks, if you refuse this to doe. Farewell.

When this was done, they sent their letters abroad by certaine souldiers thereunto appointed, to the which letters [illegible] had deuised a new seale with two swords ingraued, and ouerseene the swords was written; Ecce gladij duo, &c; Behold these two swords, readie to take vengeance of all these that shall withstand the some and order in these letters contained.

At that time the sixteenth day before the kalends of Ianuarie, about the beginning of the yere 1232. there was kept at S. Albons a great conuocation of abbats, priors, archdeacons, with diuers both of the nobilitie and clergie by the popes commandement, for the celebration of a diuorce betweene the countesse of Esser and her husband. At the breaking vp of which conuocation, when euerie man was about to depart thence, there was a certaine clerk, whose name was Cincius a Romane, and also a canon of Pauls in London, taken by some of the said vniuersitie not far off from S. Albons, and was carried away from his companie by the souldiers. But maister Iohn archdeacon of Norwich a Florentine, hardie escaping from that companie, got to London where he hid himselfe, and durst not be seene. Cincius after fiue weeks, when they had inuelempticd his bags, was safely sent againe without any more hurt to London.

Not long after this, about the beginning of Ianuarie, the barnes of a certaine beneficed man a Roman, and parson of Wingham, being full of corne, were broke vp by a like companie of armed souldiers, and the corne brought out to be sold and giuen away to the poore people. The farmer seeing this and not able to resist, complaineth to the shiriffe of the shire of this iniurie done to his master, and of breaking the kings peace: whereupon the shiriffe sent certaine of his men to see what was done. Who comming to the emptie barns, and there finding the foresaid souldiers to them vnknowne, who had sold away the most part of the corne vpon easie price, and some for charitie had giuen to the pouertie of the countrie about: requiring of them what they were, that so durst presume to breake the kings peace. Whom the other then called secretly apart, and there vnto them the kings letters patents (pretending at least the kings name and seale) wherein was forbidden that no man should presume to stop or let them in that purpose. Whereof the shiriffs seruants being certified, quietly returned from whence they came.

This comming to the knowledge of Roger bishop of London, he (with the assistance of other bishops) proceedeth in solemne excommunication, first against them that robbed Cincius the Romane; then of them which spoiled the barnes of the parson of Wingham another Romane; thirdly, he excommunicated them that forged the letters and seale of the king aboue specified.

Neither yet for all this, did that so cease, but the same yere about Easter next following, all the barns in England, which were in the hands of any Roman or Italian, were likewise wasted, and the corne sold to the best commoditie of the poore commons. Of the which, great aimes were distributed, and many times monie also with corne together was sparled for the needie people to gather vp. Neither was there any that would or durst stand against them. As for the Romans and Italians themselues, they were stricken in such feare, that they hid themselues in monasteries and cels, not daring to complaine of their iniuries receiued; but held it better to lose rather their goods then to lose their liues. The authors and workers of this feat were to the number of fourscore armed souldiers, of whom the principall captaine was one naming himselfe William Withers, surnamed Twing.

This comming to the popes knowledge, he was not a little stirred therewith, and sendeth his letters immediatlie to the king vpon the same, with sharpe threatnings, and imperious commandements, charging him for suffering of such villanie within within his realme, straitly inioyning him vnder paine of excommunication, to search out the doers hereof with all diligence, and so to punish them that all others by them may take example. Likewise he sendeth the same charge to Peter bishop of Winchester, and to the abbat of S. Edmund, to inquire in the south parts. Also to the archbishop of Yorke, and to the bishop of Durham, and to maister Iohn canon of Yorke, a Romane, to inquire in the north parts for the said malefactors, and after diligent inquisition made, to send vp the same to Rome, there medes to appeare before him, &c.

Thus after earnest inquisition made of all parties, and witnesses sworne and examined, many were found culpable in the matter, some that were factors, some that were consentors, of whom some were bishops and chaplens vnto the king, some archdeacons and deans, with other souldiers and lay men. Among whom certaine thirles and vnderthrils with their seruice, whom when they were apprehended and cast into prison by the king. Many for feare fled and escaped away, who being sought so could not be found: but the principall of this number (as is aforesaid) was supposed to be Hubertus lord iustice, who both with the kings letters and his owne, fortified the doers thereof, that no man durst interrupt them. Moreouer, in the same seruitie of them which were noted in these doings, was the same Robert Twing aboue mentioned, a comelie young man, a tall souldier, who of his owne voluntarie accord with fiue of his seruitors, whom he toke with him abroad to worke that feat, came vnto the king, openlie protesting himselfe to be the author of that deed doing, and laid he did it for hatred of the pope and the Romans, because that by the sentence of the bishop of Rome, and fraudulent circumuention of the Italians he was bereaued of the patronage of his benefice, hauing no more to giue but that one: wherefore to bereuenged of that iniurie, hee enterprised that which was done; preferring rather iustlie to bee excommunicated for a season, then to be spoiled of his benefice for euer. Then the king and other grecntors of the popes commandement, gaue him counsell, that seeing he had so incurred the danger of the popes sentence, he should offer himselfe to the pope to be absolued of him againe, and there to make his declaration vnto him, that he iustlie and canonicallie was possessed of that church. The king moreouer with him sent his letters testimoniall vnto the pope, witnessing with the said souldier, and instantly desiring the pope in his behalfe, that he might with fauor be heard. At the request whereof, pope Gregorie afterwards both released him of the sentence, and restored vnto him his patronage, writing vnto the archbishop of Yorke, that hee might againe inioy the right of his benefice in as ample manner as he did before it was taken from him.

The bishops go about to bring Hubert out of the kings fauor.

Hubert de Burgo lord chiefe iustice, being one of them which held against the Romish priests, as is afore signified, was therefore not a little noted of the bishops, who to requite him with the like despite againe (after their accustomed maner of practise) went about by subtill working to make him out of the kings fauour. And first commeth Peter bishop of Winchester to the king, grieuously complaining of certaine about the king; but especially of the foresaid Hubert the kings iustice: in so much that he caused him to be removed from his office, notwithstanding hee had the kings seale and writing for the perpetuitie of the same, and procured Stephan Segraue to bee placed in his function. And after a few daies, the king more and more incensed against him, called him vnto account of all the treasure which he was countable for by his exchequer office, also of all such debts by him due from the time of his father, till his time: also of all the lordships which were in the possession of William earle of Penbroke, chiefe iustice before him. Item, of the liberties which he did hold at that time in forests, warrens, shires and other places, how they were kept, or how they were made away. Of pyles likewise, also of losses committed though his negligence, & of walls made contrary to the kings profit, of his liberties how he did vse them. Item, of iniuries and damages wrought against the clerks of Rome and other Italians, and the popes legats, for the redresse whereof he would neuer adioyne his counsell, according as pertained to his office, being then chiefe iustice of England. Also of fruteges, gifts, presents, feapes of prisoners. Item of maritages which king Iohn committed to his keeping at the day of his death, and which were also in his time committed vnto him. To these Hubert answered, that he had king Johns owne hand to shew for his discharge, who so approoued his fidelitie, that he neuer called him to any, but cleerelie discharged him from all such counts. Whereunto answered against the bishop of Winchester, saying; The charter of king Iohn hath no force after the death of him, but that ye may now be called to a reckoning of this king for the same.

Note, that in Winchester the kings charter is no longer in force then whilst he liueth.

Other crimes obiected to Hubert by the king.

Diuers and sundrie other greater obiections were laid to his charge by the king, as for lending and writing vnto the duke of Austria that he might marrie his daughter, to the preiudice of the king and of the realme, dissuading that she might not be giuen to him. Item for counselling the king not to enter into Normandie with his armie, which he had prepared for the recouerie of lands there belonging to his right, whereby great treasure was there consumed in vaine. Item, for corrupting the daughter of the king of Scots, whom king Iohn his father committed vnto his custodie for him to marry. Item, for stealing from him a precious stone, which had a vertue to make him victorious in war, and for sending the same vnto Leolin prince of Wales: and that by his letters sent to the said Leolin, William Bues a noble man was caused there traitorouslie to be hanged, &c. These with other crimes, (whether true or false) were suggested to the king against the said Hubert by his aduersaries; wherevnto he was required to answer by order of law. Hubert then seeing himselfe in such a strait, refused to answer presently, but required respit thereunto, for that the matters were weightie which the king obiected to him: which was granted to him till the fourteenth day of September: but in the meane time, Hubert being in feare of the king, fled from London to the priorie of Merton. And thus Hubert, who before for the loue of the king, and defence of the realme (saith mine author) had got the hatred of all the nobles of England, now being out of the kings fauour, was destitute of comfort on euery side; saue onely that Lucas archbishop of Dublin, with instant prayers and teares, labored to the king for him. By this example and many like is to be seene, how vnstable and variable a thing the fauour of mortall and inutable princes is: to teach all such as haue to doe about princes, how to repose and plant their trust, not in man, but in their Lord God, by him to find helpe in Christ the true prince of all princes, which neuer faileth. By like example was Clito serued of king Alexander, Ioab of king Dauid, Belisarius of Iustinian, Harpagus of Astiages, Cromwell of king Henrie, with innumerable more, which in histories are to be found.

Princes fauors hereto be rewarded vnto.

When the day was come that this Hubert should answer, keeping amongst the monks of Merton, he durst not appeare. Then was it signified vnto him from the king, that he should come by and appeare in the court, there to answer to his charge. Wherevnto he answered again, that he vnfoundedly the kings anger, and therfore he did flie to the church, as the vttermost refuge to all such as suffer wrong; from whence he would not stirre, till he heard the kings wrath to bee mitigated towards him. With this the king moued and sore displeased, directed his letters in all hast to the maior of London, commanding him at the sight thereof to muster and raise vp all the citizens that could beare harnesse in the citie, & to bring to him by force of armes the foresaid Hubert either quicke or dead out of Merton. Whereupon, the maior immediatlie, causing the great bell to be rung, assembled together the people of London, and opening before them the kings letters, commanded them to prepare and arme themselues in all readinesse to the executing of the kings will and message.

The kings displeasure against Hubert.

The kings message to the maior of London.

The citizens hearings this, were therewith right glad and readie, for they were all in great hatred with Hubert, because of the execution of Constantine their citizen afore mentioned. Notwithstanding, certaine of the citizens, namelie Andrew Buttrell, Iohn Leauers and others more, men of more graue and sage discretion (wisely pondering with themselues, what inconuenience might rise hereof) went in haste to the bishop of Winchester, lying then in Southwarke, and waking him out of his sleepe, declared him of his counsell in that so sudden and dangerous distresse, declaring vnto him what perill might thereby insue as well to the church of Merton, as also to the citie, by the furie of the vnaduised and fierce multitude, which without doubt would be bridled from robbing and spoiling, neither will spare shedding of bloud, &c. Then Iohn againe the bloudie bishop gaue this bloudie counsell (saith Parisiensis): Dangerous it is (quoth he) both here and there; but yet for that you obay and execute the precept of the king, I counsell you plainely. At the which counsell of the bishop they being amazed, went with an ill will about the businesse inioyned. But the people inflamed with hatred, gladly coueted to be reuenged and to shed the bloud of the said Hubert.

Cruell counsell giuen of Peter bishop of Winchester.

The causes of displeasure betweene Hubert and the bishop of Winchester.

Hubert prostrat vpon the ground commendeth himselfe to God.

Sage counsell of an earle giuen to the king.

Now the cause why Peter bishop of Winchester was so earnestlie set against the iustice, was partly for the damages hee had done to the Romane priests, as before is touched: partlie also for the old grudge, because the king comming to his lawfull age before (through the counsell of this Hubert) loosed himselfe from the gouernement of the said bishop, who had him then in custodie. And thus rose vp the grudge and displeasure of this bishop towards him.

On the next morrow, the Londoners assuring out of the citie to the number of twentie thousand, set forth toward the abbie of Merton, where Hubert was lying prostrat before the altar, commending himselfe to God.

In the meane season, while the citizens were in their tumultuous raging against the poore earle of Kent; it was suggested to the king by Radulph bishop of Chichester, and lord chancellor, that it was dangerous to excite vp the vulgar and barrulie multitude, for feare of sedition; lest peraduenture the rude and headdie people being stirred vp, will not be sone be brought downe againe, when the king would haue them. Moreouer, what shall be said (quoth hee) among the Frenchmen and other nations, which of great things loue to make them greater, and of euill things to make them worse then they are; but thus selfe ingle things to make them worse then they are; but thus selfe ingle and mockingly: See what a kind bird is a young king of England, which seeketh to deuour his old nurse, vnder whose wings

He had been brought vp and nourished in his youth. And thus the king by the perswasion herof, changing his counsell, sent in all haste vnto after the armie against, willing them to retract their iournie, and to retire. And thus the Londoners (although much against their wils) returned home, missing of their purpose. Wherein is to be obserued another notable example of Gods working prouidence. For vpon the king[s] saith the historie, had sent by two messengers or pursiuants to require the armie and calle backe against the citizens of London, going with gredie minds to shed the bloud of the innocent iniurie: one of the messengers posting with all speed possible, with the kings letters, ouertooke the armie; and comming to the foreward where the captaines were, by vertue of the kings letters staid their course and bloudie purpose, wherby they could proceed no further. But the other messenger craftie and malicious, who bearing hatred to the said Hubert, rather wishing him to be slaine then to be deliuered, lingred by the way of purpose (although being commanded to make haste) and when hee came, went only but to the middle sort: more like a messenger sent to serue a dead mans arrant, then to serue the turne of them which he alone. And so in like maner by the ill hand of God it fell vpon him. For the same messenger stumbling with his horse, riding but a lofe or a fort pase, and rather walking then ronne, fell some backward from his horse backe, and there brake his necke and died. This merciefull message of the king was (as is said) sent by the instigation of Radulph bishop of Chichester lord chancellor (a worthious and a faithfull man) and one that could skill to haue compassion on the miseries of men. Of whom was declared before, that he being elected archbishop of Canturburie, would not giue one halfe peny to their expenses by the way, to get his election confirmed by the pope: and afterward by the said pope was reiected and vtterly refused of his election, as relation was made before. And thus through Gods prouidence by the meanes of the kings letters the armie returned, and Huberts life (contrarie to his expectation) was preserued.

A notable example of Gods iust punishment striking with death in that same path the death of another.

Excommunication of Radulph bishop of Chichester.

After this, the archbishop of Dublin a graue maketh intercession for Hubert.

The archbishop of Dublin a graue maketh intercession for Hubert. After this, the archbishop of Dublin with much labor and great suite intreated, and obtained of the king to grant vnto the said Hubert respit till the twelfth day of Ianuarie, to prouide himselfe of his answer to such things as were commenced against him. Then Hubert trusting to inioy some libertie by the kings permission to him granted, he breathed himselfe a little and to walke abroad, take his iournie towards S. Edmundsbury, where his wife was; and passing through the countrie of Essex, was inuited there in a certaine towne belonging to the bishop of Norwich. Whereof when the king was certified, fearing lest he would raise vp some commotion in the realme, sendeth in hastie anger after him, sir Godfrid Cranecombe knight with three hundred men: commanding vnder paine of hanging that they should apprehend him, and bring him to the towre of London: which commandement to accomplish, there lacked no haste. Hubert hauing intelligence of their comming (fling out of his bed naked as he was) ran into the chapell standing next vnto the inne, where he holdeth with the one hand the crosse, with the other hand the sacrament of the Lords bodie. Then Godfrid with his foresaid armed souldiers entring into the chapell, willed him to come out. Which when hee would not, with violent hands he drew him out of the chapell, and taking the crosse and the sacrament out of his hands, fast bound him with fetters and giues vnder the horse bellie, and broughthim as they were commanded, to the towre. And so certifying the king what they had done, who thereof hauing vnderstanding of them, he reioyced not a little thereat, and went merrie to his bed.

Hubert flieth to the church for his refuge.

Hubert violently drawne out of the church.

Hubert is committed to the custodie of the bishop of London.

The next morrow following after, Roger bishop of London hauing knowledge, how and in what order he was taken violentlie out of the chapell, commeth vnto the king, blaming him boldly for violating the peace of holy church, and protested that vnlesse the partie were loosed againe, and sent to the chapell from whence he was drawne, he would enter sentence of excommunication against all the bad doers.

The liues blamed by Hubert hauing the peace of holy church.

The king seeketh to find Hubert matter to send him into banishment.

The king is vexed with displeasure against Hubert, but yet he sendeth Albert against his will out of the towre vnto the said chapell again, and by the same souldiers which brought him out before. Which done, hee giueth in strait charge and commandement vnder paine of hanging to the shirifs of Hertford and of Essex, that they in their owne persons with the strength of both shires should watch and compasse about the chapell, and see that the said Hubert no waies might escape. Which commandement of the king was accomplished with all diligence. But Hubert tooke all this patiently, and continued in the chapell praying both night and day, and commending his cause vnto the Lord, whom he desired to deliuer him from that iniust danger, as hee alwaies fought the kings honour by his faithfull and trustie seruice. And as hee continued in his prayer, so the king continuing in his rage, commanded that no man should intreat for him, or make any mention of him in his presence. Notwithstanding yet Lucas archbishop of Dublin, his true and almost onelie friend, ceased not to pray and weepe to the king for him, desiring the king at least to intimat to him what his purposed should be done with Hubert. Wherevnto the king answering, said:

Example of a constant friend in the time of need.

Three things put to Hubert to choose.

Hubert conueied out of the castle into the parish church.

The great discorde among all religious orders noted.

Hubert putteth the castle of Deuizis.

That of these three things one he should chose, whether he would abiure the realme of England for euer, or be condemned vnto perpetuall prison, or else confesse himselfe openlie to bee a traitor. But Hubert hereunto said, that hee would chose none of these articles, as who knew himselfe neither guiltie, nor worthie of any such confusion: but to satisfie some what the minde of the king, hee would bee contented to depart the realme for a season, but to abiure the realme he would not so doe.

In this meane time it befell that Ranulphus earle of Chester and of Lincolne, one of his forsell enemies died. Hubertus all this while remained in the chapell inclosed and garded about with the power (as is said) of two shires, and so continued till at length by the commandement of the king, his two seruitors: which ministred to him within the chapell, were taken from him. Then Hubert seeing no other remedie, but there to starue for famine, offred himselfe of his owne accord to the shirifs, saying that hee would put himselfe rather in the kings mercie, then there desperatlie to perish for hunger. And so was he taken, and being fast bound in fetters, was brought againe and clapped, by the kings commandement, in the towre of London.

Not long after this, word was brought vnto the king by certaine, that the said Hubert had much treasure lying in the house of the new templaries in London. Whereupon the king, to trie out the truth thereof, sendeth for the prior or master of the house: who not daring to denie, confessed that there was indeed treasure brought into the house, but the quantitie and number thereof he could not tell. The king desirous to seize vpon the treasure, required and charged the matter with his brethren with threatning words, to bring forth the treasure to him, saying that it was taken and stolne out of his treasurie. But they answered againe, that the treasure was committed with trust and faith vnto their hands, and therefore they would not ought to let it goe out of their hands, being trusted withall, without the assent of him which committed the same vnto them. When the king could get no other answer at their hands, neither durst they in any further violence against them, he sendeth vnto Hubert in the towre, requiring of him the foresaid treasures. To whom he answering againe mildly, yeelded both himselfe, his treasures, and all that euer hee had vnto the kings will and pleasure, and so sending word vnto the master and brethren of the temple, willeth them to take all the treies, and deliuer the goods with all that there was vnto the king; who receiuing the same, and taking an inuentorie of that which was receiued, caused it to be brought vnto his treasurie: wherof the number both of the plate, of coine, and of the iewels, was of price vnknowne. The enemies of Hubert suppsling reuenge for to take aduantage against him, to bring him to his end, came with open complaint vnto the king, crying out against Hubert, that he was a theefe, a traitor, and a robber of the kingstreasure, and therefore by right was worthie to bee hanged, and thus cried his accusers daily in the kings eare. But the hearts of kings (saith the wise man) are in the hands of the Lord, to be ruled, not after mans will, but as it pleaseth God to direct them. And to this king hauing noio his will and fill vpon poore Hubert, and fauor what comming more vnto himselfe, answered against it this wise, that there was no such need to deale so straitlie with him, who from the time of his youth first serued mine vncle king Richard, then my father king John, in whose seruice (as I heard say) beyond the seas, hee was driuen to eat his horse, Parisiensis, pag. 81. and in my time hath paid to constantly in defence of the realme against foren nations, who kept the castle of Douer against king Lewis, and vanquished the Frenchmen vpon the seas, also at Bedford and at Lincolne hath done such seruice. And though against me hee hath dealt anything buttruelie, which yet is not euidentlie prooued, yet he shall neuer be put by me to so villanous a death. I had rather here commit a king saieth and simple, then to bee iudged a tyrant or striker of bloud, especiallie of such as haue serued me and mine ancestors in many perils so dangerous like, weighing more fewe euils which yet he is not proued, then so many good deserts of his cudent and manifest seruice done both to me and to the whole realme, &c. And thus the king somewhat relenting to poze Hubert his old seruant, granted vnto him all such lands as hee had giuen by king John his father, and whatsoeuer else he had by his owne purchase.

Thus Hubert after long trouble a little cheered with some peece of comfort, for Laurence his trustie friend that neuer left him, or that belonged to S. Albons, to bee his steward and ouerseer of those possessions granted vnto him by the king. And shortly vpon the same, after the kings mind was seene thus something to relent, the enuie also of the nobles being now partly satisfied, began to turne to mercie, in so much that foure earles, to wit, earle Richard the kings brother, William earle of Warrein, Richard earle marshall, and William earle of Ferris, became sureties to the king for him. Vpon whose fidelitie he was transferred to the castle of Deuizis, where hee was vnder the keeping of some souldiers by them appointed, hauing the liberte of the caste. But the bishop of Winchester, who alwaies hunted after the life of Hubert, craftilie commeth vnto the king, and desireth the custodie of that castle, making no mention of Hubert, to the intent that by the keeping thereof, he might the sooner dispatch him. Hubert hauing there of some inkling, breaketh the matter to two of his seruants, who (with compassion tendering his miserie, watched their time (the keepers being asleepe) and conueied him by night on their backs, tethered as he was, into the parish church of the towne, and there remained with him. The keepers when they miss their prisoner were in great perplexitie, and after diligent search finding him at length where he was in the church, with violent force drew him from thence to the castle againe. For which iniurie to the church, the bishop of Sarum vnderstanding the order of the matter, commeth to the castle where the keepers were, and required that Hubert should bee brought againe into the church from whence he was taken. Which when the keepers denied to doe, saying they would rather hee should hang then they: then the bishop gaue sentence against them of excommunication. Which done, he with the bishop of London and other bishops, goeth immediately vnto the king, complaining of the iniurie done vnto Hubert, and especially of the contumelie against holy church: neither would they leaue the king, before they had obtained that he should be reduced again into the church, and so he was. It was not long after, but the king in great displeasure sendeth to the shirifs of the shire to keepe him well watched in the church, till either he came forth, or there perished with famine.

It befell in the meane season that great dissension rose betweene the king and the nobles of the realme, by reason where of Hubert was taken and carried away by Richard earle marshall into Wales, and there remained, vntill the king at length was reconciled with his nobles, and so receiued (with the rest) the said Hubert againe into his fauor. Ex Matthæo Parisiensi, & ex Floribus historiarum. Of the which dissension more shall bee shewed (Christ willing) hereafter.

As the beginning of this trouble of Hubert first sprang of vexing the popes barnes: so likewise Roger bishop of London suspected for the same cause, was inforced to trauell vp to Rome, there to purge himselfe before the pope. Where after much money consumed, and robbed also by the way, hee gat nothing else, but loss his labor, and so came home againe. Who then doing the part of a good bishop, after his returne from Rome, attempted to expell and exclude out of his dioces all these Italian vsurers called, as is before said, Caursini. These Caursinits comming with the popes legats into England, and lending their money to religious houses, to colleges and churches, had their debters bound vnto them in such sort as was much vntageable to them, and much iniurious to the other, as in the forme of their obligations in the storie of Mat. Parisiensis is largely expressed fol. 65. Against these Caursinites the bishop of London being worthilie inflamed with zeale of iustice, first with louing admonition went about to reclaime them for the wealth of their soules, afterward with sharpe words began to charge them. But they neither regarding christian counsell, and despiting the bishops threatnings, would not leaue the sweetnesse of their occupation. Wherefore the bishop proceeding vnto the sentence of excommunication, precisely and districtly charged them to depart his dioces. But they againe being confident and imboldened vpon the popes defence, not onely set at light his excommunication, but also wrought such wiles with the pope, that they caused the said bishop of London, being both aged & sickly, to be cited peremptorily to appeare beyond the seas, there to answere to such obiections as they should inferre against him. And thus the bishop minding rather to couer then to open the faults of the church, and partly being let with infirmitie and age, was compelled to let the cause fall.

And thus much of the popes merchants here in England, which were not so busie here for their part, but the pope the great master of these merchant vsurers, was as busie for his. And although his barnes here in England were destroyed, and his banke something decayed, yet he thought to win it by another way: for he proclaimed the same yeare a generall visitation through all the religious houses exempt or not exempt vniuersallie pertaining to his iurisdiction, where by the cruell dealing of the visitors, many were compelled to appeale and to trauell vp to Rome, to the great expenses of their money, and filling the popes coffers. But as touching this visitation, to make short (saith the storie) it tended not to any reformation so much as to the deformation of vniuersall order: Dum omnes qui in diuersis orbi. partibus vnicam Benedicti secuti fuerant regulam, per nouas constitu...nes ita inuentiantur vbique discordes, quod ex omnibus cœnobijs, vel alijs religiosorũ ecclesijs vix duo inuenitur in norma viuendi concordes: that is, Whilst all they, which before though all sorts of the world followed onely the rule of Benedict, now through new deuised constitutions are found in all places so diuided and diuers, that of all monasteries, and other churches of religion, scarce may two be found, which doe agree in one rule and institution of life.

All this while that Hubert aboue mentioned was secluded from the king, Peter bishop of Winchester bare all the rule, and about all other alone was accepted. This bishop being in such priuiledge and fauour with the king, as by whose counsell all things were administred, remoued the naturall seruitors that were Englishmen, out of their offices, and placed other strangers, namely, of Pictauia, and of other countries, in their rooms. Among whom was thrust out William vndermarshall, which supplied the roome of Richard lord great marshall of England, for the which cause, the said lord Richard was nightlie offended. Also Walter treasurer of the kings house, was not onely expelled, but also merced at an hundred pounds, and put from all his holds and munitions, which he had by the kings patent granted to him.

Old seruitors of the king put out and displaced.

Moreouer, by the counsell of the said bishop of Winchester, all the old counsellors as well bishops, as other earles and barons, and all the nobles were reiected from the king in such sort, that he would heare and follow no mans counsell, but only the said Peter bishop of Winchester, and his cosin Peter de Rivallis. Whereby it came to passe that all the greatest holds and munitions in the realme were taken from the old keepers, and committed to the custodie of the said Peter. Then the bishop of Winchester, to plant and pitch himselfe more strongly in the kings fauor, adioyned to his fellowship Stephan Segraue succeeding in the place of Hubert the iustice: also Robert Passew, who had the keeping of the treasure vnder the foresaid Peter Rivall. So by these three, all the affaires of the realme were ordered. Moreouer, to make their partie more sure, by them was prouided, that souldiers and seruitors from beyond the sea, as Pictauians and Britains were sent for, to the number of two thousand, which were placed partly about the king, partly were set in castles & holds within the realme, and had the ouersight and gouernment of shires and baronies, who then oppressed the nobles of the land, accusing them to the king for traitors, whom the simple king did lightly beleeue, committing to them the custodie of his treasures, the sitting in iudgements, and the doing in all things. And when the nobles thus oppressed, came to complaine of their iniuries to the king, by the meanes of the bishop of Winchester, their cause was nothing regarded; insomuch that the said Winchester moreouer accused certaine bishops also to the king, so that hee did suffer them as open traitors and rebels.

The king seeketh his nobles and sticketh to strangers.

These things standing thus out of order, Richard the noble marshall of England, with others of the nobles ioyning with him, seeing these oppressions and iniuries daily growing contrarie to the lawes and wealth of the realme, came to the king, and blamed him for retaining such peruerse counsel about him of the Pictauians and other forreners, to the great preiudice of his naturall subiects, and of the liberties of the realme, humblie desiring and beseeching him, that he with as much speed as might be, would reforme and reuoke such excesses, whereby the whole realme seemed to lie in danger of subuersion. Otherwise, if he refused to see correction thereof, hee with other peers and nobles would withdraw themselues from his counsell, so long as he maintained the societie of those forreners and strangers about him.

Richard earle marshall admonished by the king.

To this Peter Winchester answering againe, said, that the king right well might call vnto him what forreners and strangers him liked, for the defence both of his kingdome and of his crowne; and what number of them he would, as by whom hee might be able to bridle his proud and rebellious subiects, and so to keepe them in awe and god order. When the earle and the nobles could get no other answere of him, in great perturbation they departed, promising among themselues, in this case, which so touched the state of the whole realme, they would constantly ioyne together to the parting of their life.

The disdainfull answere of the bishop of Winchester to the nobles.

After this, the foresaid Petrus bishop of Winchester with his complices, ceased not by all meanes to inflame the kings hart to hatred and contempt of his naturall people, whom they so vehemently peruerted, that he counting them no other then his enemies, sought by all diligence the vtter destruction of them, sending daily more garrisons of the Pictauians, that in that space they replenished welneare the whole land, whose defence the king only trusted vnto: neither was any thing disposed in the realme, but through the guiding of this Peter and of the Pictauians.

Wicked counsell about a king.

Petrus de rupibus bishop of Winchester peruerter of the king.

The king thus garded and strengthened with these forren aliens and strangers, proclaimed a parliament to be holden at Oxford, where the nobles were warned to bee present. They not considering the indignation of the king conceiued, would not appeare. Against they were required the first, second, and third time to present themselues. The assemblie proceeded, but they came not, for whom the king woked. In this assemblie or parliament, it was plainely told the king by a Dominike frier preaching before him, that vnlesse he remoued from him the bishop of Winchester and Peter Rivall his kinsman, hee should not, neither could long inioy peace in his kingdome. Although it was bluntly spoken of the frier against the bishop, yet this remedie he had; the frier had nothing to loose. Yet was there another chaplaine of the court, who perceiuing the king some what intigated by the former preaching, and after a courtlike dexteritie handling his matter, being a pleasant conceited man, thus merrilie came to the king asking a question, What was the thing most pernicious and dangerous of all others? That was the thing most pernicious and dangerous of all to them that trauell by the seas: That, said the king, is beſt knowne to ſuch as trauell in that kind of traffike. Nay ſaith he, this is eaſie to be told. The king demanding what it was, Forſooth (quoth he) ſtones and rocks, alluding merrily (but yet truely) to the biſhop of Winchester, whoſe name and ſurname was Petrus de rupibus, for ſo Petre in Latine ſignifieth ſtones, and Rupes rocks. Notwithſtanding, the king either not perceiuing the meaning, or not amending the fault, againe ſignified to his nobles to ſpeake with him at Weſtminſter. But they fearing ſome traine to be laid for them, refuſed to appeare, ſending plaine words to the king by ſolemne meſſage, that his grace without all delay ſhould ſeclude from him Peter biſhop of Winchester and other aliens of Britaine, or if he would not, they with the common aſſent of the realme, would diſplace him with his wicked counſellors from his kingdome, and haue within themſelues traeation for chuſing a new king.

The meſſage of the nobles to the king.

The king at the hearing of this meſſage being mightilie moued, partly to feare, partly to indignation, eſpecially hauing the late example of king John his father before his eyes, was cait in great perplexitie, doubting what was beſt to bee done. But Winchester with his wicked counſell ſo wrought with the king, that he proceeded with all ſecuritie againſt them, informing that in ſhort time the ſparkles of poyſoned counſell kindling more & more, grew to a ſharpe battell betweene the king and Richard earle marſhal with other nobles, to the great diſquietneſſe of the whole realme. The which war before was preſignified by terrible thundring and lightning heard all England ouer in the moneth of March, with ſuch abundance of raine and cloudes growing vpon the ſame, as cait downe mils, ouercouered the fields, threw downe houſes, and did much harme through the whole realme.

They called by the king againſt his nobles.

Great thunders and cloudes in England.

To proſecute here at large the whole diſcourſe of this war betweene the king and earle marſhall, which continued neere the ſpace of two yeares, to declare all the parts and circumſtances thereof, what troubles it brought, what damages it wrought vnto the whole realme, what traines were laid, what ſlaughter of men, what waſt of whole countries inſued from Wales vnto Shrewſburie, how the marſhall ioyned himſelfe with Leolin prince of Wales, how the Pictauians were almoſt all ſlaine and deſtroyed, how the king was diſtreſſed, what forgerie wrie Winchester wrought by the kings letters to intrap the marſhall and to betray him to the Iriſhmen, amongſt whom he was at length ſlaine; all this I refer to other authors, who at large doe intreat of the ſame, as Mat. Paris, Florilegus, and ſuch others. This is to be noted and obſerued (which rather pertaineth to our eccleſiaſticall hiſtory) to ſe how great ſedition and continuall diſquietnes was in thoſe daies among all chriſtian people almoſt, being vnder the popes catholike obedience: but eſpecially to marke the corrupt doctrine then reigning, it is to be marueiled, or rather lamented, to ſee the king and the people then ſo blinded in the principall point and article of their ſaluation, as we find in ſtories (which making mention of a houſe of monaſterie of conuerts, builded the ſame yeare by the king at London, do expreſſe in plaine words, that he then did it Pro redemptione animæ ſuæ, & regis Iohannis patris ſui, & omnium anteceſſorum ſuorum: that is, For the redemption of his ſoule, of the ſoule of king John his father, and for the ſoules of all his anceſtors, &c. Whereby may bee vnderſtood in what palpable darkeneſſe of blind ignorance the ſillie ſoules redeemed by Chriſt were then inwrapped, which did not know nor yet were taught the right doctrine and firſt principles of their redemption. Mention was made a little before of diſſoluing the election of Iohn Pikot of Canturburie, which was choſen by the monks to be archbiſhop of the ſaid church of Canturburie, but by the pope was defeated. After whom one John Blund was elected, who trauelling vp to Rome this yeare, An. 1233. to be confirmed of the pope, was alſo repealed and vnelected againe, for that it was thought in England, and ſo complained of to the pope, that he had receiued of Peter biſhop of Winchester, a thouſand marks, and had another thouſand promiſed him of the ſaid Winchester. Who by his money thought to make him of his ſide, and alſo wrote vnto the emperor to helpe forward his promotion in the court of Rome. Notwithſtanding, both hee with his giuing, and the other with his taking of bribes, were both detected and diſappointed of their purpoſe. For the pope hating then the emperor, for the ſame cauſe admitted not the election; pretending the cauſe, for that he was proued to hold two benefices without his diſpenſation. After whom, by the commandement of the pope, one Edmund canon of Saliſburie was ordained archbiſhop, and had his pall ſent to him from the pope. Which Edmund after for his vertues was canonized of the popiſh monks there for a ſaint, and called S. Edmund. About which time alſo Robert Groſſhead was made biſhop of Lincolne.

John archbiſhop of Canturburie elected by the chapter, is againe vnelected by the pope.

Corruption of bribes.

Edmund archbiſhop of Canturburie.

S. Edmund canonized. Robert Groſſhead made biſhop of Lincolne.

This Edmund accompanied with other biſhops, during this trouble betweene the king and his nobles, being in counſell at Weſtminſter, in the yeer next inſuing, which was 1234: came vttering their minds boldly in the name of the lords, and declaring vnto the king as breaine his faithfull ſeruants, that his counſell which then he followed, was not found nor ſafe, but cruell and dangerous both to him, & to the ſtate of the realme, meaning the counſell of Peter Winchester, and of Peter Riuall, with other adherents.

Anno 1233. Faithfull counſell of the biſhops graunted to the king.

1 FIrſt and in primis, ſo that they hate and contemne the Engliſh nation, calling them traitors and rebels, and turning the kings heart from the loue of his naturall ſubiects, and the hearts of them from him, as appeareth by the earle marſhall and others, ſowing diſcord among them.

2 Item, by the ſaid counſell, to wit, by the foreſaid biſhop and his fellowes, king John the kings father loſt firſt the hearts of his barons, after that loſt Normandie, and afterwardes other lands alſo, and in the end waſted all his treaſure, ſo that ſince that time the reguuent of England had neuer any quiet after.

3 By the ſaid counſell alſo, in their time and memorie, the kingdome of England had been troubled and ſuſpended, and in concluſion became tributarie, ſo that was before the prince of prouinces: and ſo war inſuing vpon the ſame, the ſaid king Iohn his father incurred great danger of death, and at laſt was ertinguiſhed, lacking both peace of his kingdome and of his owne heart.

4 Item, by the ſaid counſell the caſtle of Bedford was kept long time againſt the king, to the great loſſe both of men and treaſure, beſide the loſſe of Rupella, to the ſhame of the realme of England.

5 Moreouer, though their wicked counſell, at this preſent, great perturbation ſeemed to hang ouer the whole realme; for elſe if it had not been for their counſell, and that true iuſtice and iudgement might haue been miniſtred vnto the kings ſubiects, theſe tumults had neuer been ſtirred, and the king might haue had his land vnwaſted, and his treaſure vnconſumed.

6 Item, in that faith and allegiance, wherewith they were obliged vnto him, they proteſted vnto him that ſaid his counſell was not a counſell of peace, but of diuiſion and diſquietneſſe, for the cauſe that they which otherwiſe by peace could not aſpire, by diſturbing and diſherciting others might be eralted.

7 Item, for that all the caſtles, forts, munitions, alſo all the officers of the archeler, with all other the greateſt archcats of the realme were in their hands, of the which if the king would demand account, he ſhould proue how true they were.

8 Item, for that neither by the kings ſeale, nor commandement, except it bare withall the ſeale of Peter Riuall, almoſt no buſineſſe of any weight could be diſpatched in the realme, as though they counted their king for no king.

9 Furthermore, by the foreſaid counſell, the naturall ſubiects and nobles of the realme were baniſhed the court, which was to be feared would growe to ſome inconuenience both to the king and to the realme; for ſomuch as the king ſeemed more to be on their ſide then they of his, as by many euident coniectures may appeare.

10 Item, it was not well to be taken and liked, the ſaid counſell ſtanding of ſtrangers and aliens, to haue in their power both the kings ſiſter, and many other noble mens daughters and other women marriageable, with the kings wards and marriages, which they beſtowed and diuided among themſelues, and men of their affinitie.

11 Alſo, the ſaid counſell regarding neither the lawes, nor liberties of the realme confirmed and corroborated by excommunication, did confound and peruert all iuſtice: therefore it was to be feared that they would run vnder excommunication, and the king alſo in communicating with them.

12 Item, becauſe they kept neither promiſe nor faith, nor oth with any perſon, neither did obſerue any inſtrument made neuer ſo formall by laid, nor yet did feare any excommunication: therefore they were to be left for people deſperate, as which were departed from all truth and honeſtie.

These things (ſaid the biſhops) we as your faithfull ſubiects before God and men, do tell and aduertiſe your grace, deſiring and beſeeching you, that you will remoue and ſeclude from you ſuch counſellors as the cuſtome is of all other kingdomes to do, that you will ſo gouerne in like maner your kingdome by your owne naturall liege people, and ſuch as bee ſworne vnto you of your owne realme. For thus (ſaid they) in veritie we denounce vnto you, that vnleſſe in ſhort time you will ſee theſe things reformed, we according to our dutie will proceed by the cenſure of the church againſt you, and all others that gainſtand the ſame, tarrying no other thing, but onely the conſecration of this our reuerend archbiſhop.

Excommunication denounced by the biſhops againſt the king.

These words of the biſhop thus ſaid and finiſhed, the king required a little time of reſpit, wherein to aduiſe with himſelfe what the matter, ſaying that he could not in ſuch a ſudden remoue from him his counſell, before hee had entred with them account of this treaſure committed to them: and ſo that aſſemblie brake by.

The kings anſwere to the biſhops.

It followed then after this communication ſo broken by, that the king reſorted to the parts of Northfolke, where coming by S. Edmundſburie, where the wife of Hubert the iuſtice was, he being moued with zeale of pitie toward the woman, (who were humbile behaued her ſelfe to the king, and grant him eight manor places, which her huſband before with his money had purchaſed, being then in the cuſtodie & poſſeſſion of Robert Paſſelew, one of the kings new counſellors aboue ſpecified.

Edmund conſecrated archbiſhop of Canturburie, which was aforetime condemned by pope Innocent the fourth for a ſaint.

It was not long after this, but Edmund the archbiſhop was inueſted and conſecrated in the church of Canturburie, who ſhortly after his conſecration, about the moneth of Aprill, comming with his ſuffragans to the place of councell, where the king with his earles and barons was aſſembled, opened to him the cauſe and purpoſe of his comming and of the other prelats, which was to put him in remembrance of their former talke had with him at Weſtminſter; denouncing moreouer to him expreſſie, that vnles with ſpeed hee would take a better way, and fall to a peaceable and godly agreement with the true and faithfull nobles of his realme, hee incontinent with the other prelats there preſent, would paſſe with ſentence of excommunication againſt him, and againſt all them that ſhould bee enemies to the ſame peace, and maintainers of diſcord.

The counſell of Winchester and ſuch other biſhops as about the king, diſpraued by certaine cauſes.

Example of excommunication rightly practiſed.

The king after he heard the meaning of the biſhops, with humble and gentle language anſwered them againe, promiſing to condeſcend to them in all things. Whereupon within few daies after, the king comming to ſome better remembrance of himſelfe, commanded the foreſaid biſhop of Winchester to ſeale the court, and returne home to his biſhoprike, there to attend vnto the ſpirituall charge and care of his flocke committed to him. Moreouer, he commanded Peter Riuall the biſhops coſin (ſome ſtories ſay his ſon) who had then the diſpoſing of all the affaires of the realme, to render vnto him his caſtles, and to giue account of all his treaſures, wherof he had the keeping, and ſo to boide the realme, ſweating moreouer vnto him, but for that he was beneficed, and was within orders of the church, elſe he would haue cauſed both his eyes to be pluckt out of his head.

The kings promiſe to the biſhops.

Peter biſhop of Winchester diſcharged out of the court. Peter Riuall called to account of the kings reuenues.

He expelled likewiſe the Pictauians out of the court, and from the cuſtodie of his munitions, ſending them home into their countrie, and bidding they ſhould no more ſee his face. And thus the king wiſely diſpatching himſelfe of his wicked counſellors, firſt did ſend Edmund the archbiſhop, with the biſhops of Cheſter and of Rocheſter, into Wales to Leolin, and to Richard earle marſhall, and others, to intreat with them of peace. Alſo herceiued to his ſeruice againe men of his naturall countrie, to attend about him, offering himſelfe willing to be ruled by the counſell of the archbiſhop and the biſhops, by whoſe prudence he truſted his realme ſhould be reduced againe to a better quietneſſe.

Pictauians ſent home to the king vnto their countrie. Reconciliation ſought betweene the king and the nobles.

Richard earle marſhall fraudulently excommunicated, and ſlaine in Ireland.

But in the meane time, while theſe things were doing in England, the foreſaid Richard earle marſhall by the falſhod of the biſhop of Winchester, and Peter Riuall, forging the kings letters to the Iriſhmen againſt him, and partly by the conſpiracie of Gilbert de Sparico, was circumuented by the Iriſhmen in war, and there taken & wounded, was by them through the meanes of his ſurgeon ſlaine.

Catini ſlaine about Almaine, vnder colour of the pupills hoy hereſike.

Great ſlaughter the ſame time was of them which were called Catini, about the parts of Almaine. Theſe Catini were eſteemed of pope Gregorie and the papiſts to be hereſikes; but what their opinions were I find it not expreſſed: In Pariſienſi.

Albigenſes ſlaine in Spaine by the popes ſetting on.

In like ſort the Albigenſes afore mentioned, recounted alſo of the popes flock to be hereſikes, with their biſhops, and a great number and compaſſe of them were ſlaine by the commandement of pope Gregorie at the ſame time in a certaine plaine in Spaine. Ex March. Pariſienſi, fol. 87.

The king ſamineth the death of Richard earle marſhall.

Vnto the archbiſhop of Canturburie with other two biſhops were ſent into Wales for intreatie of peace. vve heard before. At whoſe returne againe after the time of Eaſter, the king going toward Glocester to meet them by the way, as hee was in his iourney at Wodſtocke, came meſſengers of Ireland, declaring to the king the death of Richard earle marſhall, and the order thereof, through the forged letters of Winchester and others: whereat the king made great lamentation and mourning, to the great admiration of all them that were by, ſaying and complaining that he left not his like in all the realm againe.

The ſaying of Leolin king of Wales. The ſtrength of king Henrie more feared then his puiſſance.

After this the king proceeding in his iourney came to Glocester, where the archbiſhop with the other biſhops comming to the king, declared to him the forme and condition of peace, which they had concluded with Leolin, which was this: If the king would be reconciled before with the other nobles with whom he was confederate, ſuch as the king had baniſhed out of his realme; to the end that the concord might be the more firme betweene them. Thus (ſaid they) was Leolin contented, although with much adoe & great difficulty, to receiue the league of peace, ſaying and proteſting this vnto them, that he feared more the kings almes then all the puiſſance both of him and of all his clergie within England.

Peace concluded betweene the king and the nobles.

This done, the king there remaining with the biſhops directed his letters to all the erles and baniſhed lords, and to all his nobles, that they ſhould repaire to him about the beginning of June, at Glocester; promiſing to them his full fauour and reconcilement to them and to their heires, and that they ſhould ſuſpect no fraud therin they ſhould haue their ſafe conduct by the archbiſhop and biſhops.

Hubert earle of Kent reſtored againe to the kings fauor.

Whereupon, though the mediation of the ſaid archbiſhop and the biſhops, firſt commeth to the king, Hubert earle of Kent, offring himſelfe to the kings grace and fauor. Whom the king with chearefull countenance receiued and imbraced, reſtoring him not onely to his fauor, but alſo to his houſhold and counſell, with his liuings and poſſeſſions from which hee had been diſlieged before. Then Hubert lifting vp his eyes to heauen, gaue praiſe and glorie to God, by whoſe gratious prouidence he ſo marcuelouſly being preſerued from ſo great diſtreſſes and tribulations, was againe ſo happilie reconciled to the king, and his faithfull friends. After him in like ſort came in Gilbert Baſſet a noble man, Richard Sward, alſo Gilbert the brother of Richard Marſhall that was ſlaine; which Gilbert recouered againe his whole inheritance as well in England as in Ireland, doing his homage to the king, & his ſeruice due for the ſame; to whom alſo was granted the office of the high marſhall court, belonging before to his brother Richard.

Hubert aſſieth thanks to God.

In the ſame councell of communication touching them at Glocester, the ſaid Edmund archbiſhop of Canturburie, bringing the forged letters wherein was betrayed the life of Richard earle marſhall, ſealed with the kings ſeale, and ſent to the great men of Iceland, read the ſame openly in the preſence of the king and all the nobles. At the hearing whereof, the king greatly ſorrowing and weeping, confeſſed there in truth, that being forced by the biſhop of Winchester and Peter de Riuallis, he commanded his ſeale to be ſet to certaine letters preſented vnto him, but the tenor thereof he ſaid and ſware he neuer heard. Whereunto the archbiſhop anſwering againe, deſired the king to ſearch well his conſcience, and ſaid that all they which were procurers or of knowledge of thoſe letters, were guiltie of the death of the earle marſhall, no leſſe then if they had murthered him with their owne hands.

Falſhood and murther couered with out. Kings many times abuſed by wicked counſell.

Then the king calling a councell, ſent his letters for the biſhop of Winchester, for Peter Riuall, Stephan Segraue, and Robert Paſſelew to appeare and yeeld account for his treaſures vnto them committed, and for his ſeale by them abuſed. But the biſhop and Riuall keeping themſelues in the ſanctuarie of the minſter church of Wincheſter, neither durſt nor would appeare. Stephan Segraue, the ſucceeded after Hubert the iuſtice, and was of the clergie before, after became a lay man, and now biding himſelfe in S. Patricks church in the abbie of Leiceſter, was turned to a clerke againe. Robert Paſſelew couertly hid himſelfe in a certaine cellar of the new temple, ſo ſecretly that none could tell where he was, but thought he was gone to Rome. At length through the foreſaid Edmund archbiſhop of Canturbury, meanes was made, that a dilatory day was granted by the king for them to anſwere. At which day firſt appeared Peter de Riuallis, then Stephan Segraue, after him Robert Paſſelew, each of them ſeuerally one after another, theiued themſelues, but not able to anſwere for themſelues, like traitors were repoued, and like villaines were ſent away. Ex Mat. Pariſienſi, fol. 91.

Peter Riuall, Stephan Segraue, Robert Paſſelew cal led to their anſwere.

Variance betweene pope Gregorie the ninth and the Romans.

VVHile peace thus betweene the king and the nobles was reconciled in England, diſſenſion and variance the ſame time and yeare began in Rome, betweene the pope and the citizens of Rome. The cauſe was, for that the citizens claimed by old cuſtome and law, that the biſhop of Rome might not excommunicate any citizen of the citie, nor ſuſpend the ſaid citie with any interdiction for any maner cauſe.

Variance betweene the pope and the citizens of Rome. The allegatiõ of the Romans.

To this the pope anſwered againe; Quod minor Deo eſt ſed quolibet homine maior (to vſe the very words of mine author:) Ergo, maior quolibet ciue, ne Etiam rege, vel imperatore, &c: That is, that he is leſſe then God, but greater then any man: Ergo, greater then any citizen, yea alſo greater then king or emperor. And ſo ſo much as he is their ſpirituall father, hee both ought and lawfully may chaſtiſe his children when they offend, as being ſubiected to him in the faith of Chriſt, and reduce them into the way againe when they ſtray out of courſe.

The popes anſwere.

Moreouer the citizens alleage againe for themſelues, that the potteſtats of the citie and ſenators doe receiue of the church of Rome yearely tribute, which the biſhops of Rome were bound to pay to them, both by new and alſo ancient lawes. And though with much adoe & great difficulty, to receiue the league they haue not yet in poſſeſſion before this preſent time of this pope Gregorie the ninth.

The ſecond allegation of the Romans. The pope bound to pay to Rome yearely tribute.

Hereunto the pope anſwered and ſaid, that although the church of Rome in time of perſecution, for their defence and cauſe of peace, was wont to reſpect the head rulers of the citie with gentle rewards, yet ought not that now to be taken for a cuſtome: for that cuſtome onely ought to ſtand, which conſiſteth not vpon examples, but vpon right and reaſon.

The pope refuſeth.

Further and beſides, the citizens ſaid that they at the commandement of the ſenators, would appropriate their countrie with new and larger limites, and infranchiſe the ſame, being inlarged with fields and bodders.

The reaſon cauſe and allegation of the Romans.

To this the pope againe made anſwere, that certaine lordſhips, and cities, and caſtles, be contained within the compaſſe of the ſaid limits, as the citie Viterbium, and Montcaller, which they preſume to appropriate within their precinct: but to aſcribe to them and vſurpe that which pertaineth to others, is againſt right and iuſtice.

The popes anſwere.

For theſe and ſuch other controuerſies riſing betwene the pope and the Romans, ſuch diſſenſion kindled, that the pope with his cardinals leauing the citie of Rome, remoued to Ianuarium as partly before is recited, thinking there to remaine and to plant themselues: but the Romans preuailing against him, ouerthrew diuers of his houses in the citie, for the which he did excommunicate them. The Romans then flying to the emperor, desired his aid and succour: but he, lothe to displease the pope, gathering an armie, went rather against the Romanes. Then the popes armie, whose captaines were the earle of Ebowlis (to purchase the popes fauor) and Peter the forenamed bishop of Tusculane (whether (whom the pope for the same had sent for from England partly for his treasure, partly for his practise and skill in feats of warre) and the emperors host ioyned together, and bordering about the citie of Rome, cast downe the castles or mansions belonging to the citizens round about the suburbs, to the number of eightéene, and destroyed all their vines and vineyards about the citie. Either of the Romans being not a little offended, brast out of the citie, with most hearte them ouerthrew them the popes citie with sworde and fire. But the multitude being vnordered and out of batell raie, and vnprouided for ieopardies which by the way might happen, fell into the hands of their enemies, who were in wait for them, and of them destroyed a great number, so that on both parts were slaine to the view of 30000: but the most part was of the citizens. And this dissension thus begun was not soone ended, but continued long after.

By these and such other stories, who seeth not how farre the church of Rome hath degenerated from the true image of the right church of Christ, which by the rule and example of the gospell ought to be a daughter of peace, not a mother of debate, not a reuenger of her selfe, nor a setter of wars; but a forgiuer of iniuries, humbly and patiently referring all reuenge to the Lord; not a taker for riches, but a winner of soules; not contending for worldly mastership, but humbling themselues as seruants, and not as vicars of the Lord; but loyally like brethren seruing together, bishops with bishops, ministers with ministers, deacons with deacons; and not as masters separating themselues by superiorities one from another; and briefly communicating together in doctrine and counsell, one particular church with another, not as a mother one ouer another, but rather as a sister church one with another, seeking together the glorie of Christ, and not their owne. And such was the church of Rome first in the old ancient beginning of her primitiue state, especially while the order of perfection yet kept the bishops & ministers vnder in humilitie of heart and feruent calling to the Lord for helpe: so that happie was that christian then, which with libertie of conscience onely might hold his life, how barely soeuer he liued. And as for the pride and pompe of the world, as striuing for patrimonies, buying of bishopriks, gaping for benefices, so far was this off from them, that then they had little leisure and lesse list yea once to thinke vpon them. Neither did the bishops then of Rome fight to be consuls of the citty, but fought how to bring the consuls vnto Christ, being glad if the consuls would permit them to dwell by them in the citie. Neither did they then presume so high, to bring the emperors riches vnder their girdles, but were glad to lay riches as an ouer course for the sword of the emperors. Then lacked they outward peace, but abounded with inward consolation, Gods holy spirit mightilie working in their hearts. Then was one catholike vnitie of truth and doctrine amongst all churches against errors and sects. Neither did the east and west, nor distance of place diuide the church, but both the east church and west church, the Greeks and Latins made all one church. And albeit there were then fiue patriarchs that appointed for order sake, differing by regions, and peraduenture also in some rites one from another: yet all these consenting together in one vnitie of catholike doctrine, hauing one God, one Christ, one faith, one baptisme, one spirit, one head, and linked together in one bond of charitie, and in one equalitie of honor, they made all together one body, one church, one communion, called one catholike, vniuersall, and apostolicall church. And so long as this knot of charitie and equalitie did ioyne them in one vnitie together, so long the church of Christ flourished and increased, one readie to helpe and harbor another, in time of distresse, as Agapetus and Vigilius flying to Constantinople were there aided by the patriarch, &c: so that all this while, neither forren enemie neither Saracen nor Soldan, nor Sultan, nor Caliphia, nor Sopastmine, nor Turke had any power greatly to harme it.

But through the malice of the enemie, this catholike vnitie did not long continue, and all by reason of the bishop of Rome, who not contented to be like his brethren, began to extend himself and to claime superiority aboue the other fiue patriarchall seas, and all other churches in the world. And thus as equalitie amongst christian bishops was by pride and singularitie oppressed, so vnitie began by little & little to be dissolued, and the Lords cote, which the soulders left whole, to be diuided. Which cote of christian vnitie, albeit of long time it had been now seamcript before by the occasion aforesaid: yet notwithstanding in some peace it held together in some meane agreement, vnder subiection to the see of Rome, till the time of this pope Gregorie the ninth, An. 1233 at which time the ruptures and schisme of the church brake out into a plaine diuision, vtterly disseuering the east church from the west church vpon this occasion.

There was a certaine archbishop elected to an archbishoprike among the Greekians, who comming to Rome to bee confirmed, could not be admitted vnlesse he promised a verie great sum of money. Which when he refused to doe, and detested the execrable simonie of the court of Rome, hee made his repaire home againe to his owne countrie vnconfirmed, declaring there to the whole nobility of that land the case how it stood. For the more confirmation whereof there were others also, which comming lately from Rome, and there had proued the same or worse, came in and gaue testimony to his saying. Whereupon all the churches of the Greekians the same time hearing this, departed vtterly away from the church of Rome, which was in the dayes of this pope Gregorie the ninth. Insomuch that the archbishop of Constantinople comming afterward to the generall councell at Lions, there openly declared, that whereas beforetime he had vnder him aboue thirtie bishopriks and suffragans, now he had not three; adding moreouer, that all the Greekians and certaine others, with Antioch and the whole empire of Romania, euen to the gates almost of Constantinople, were gone from the obedience of the church of Rome, &c. Mat. Paris, fol. 112, &c. fol. 186.

By the occasion of which separation aforesaid of the Greekians from pope Gregorie, it happened shortly after, being the yeare of our Lord 1237, that Germanus archbishop and patriarch of Constantinople wrote to the said pope Gregorie the ninth, humblie desiring him to studie and seeke some meanes of vnitie, how the seamelesse cote of the Lord Iesus thus lamentablie rent, not with hands of soulders, but by discord of prelats may be healed againe; offering this moreouer, that if hee will take the paines to the same, he for his part, notwithstanding his old age and feeble body, would not refuse to meet him in the mid way, to the intent that the truth on both sides being debated by the scriptures, the wrong part may be reduced, the sunder stopped, and vnitie reformed betweene them.

This request of the patriarch, as it was both godly and reasonable, so it had been the bishops part againe with like humilitie to haue condescended to the same, and glad with all his might to helpe forward the reformation of christian vnitie in the church of Christ, and to haue shewed himselfe the sonne of peace: but the proud bishop of Rome more like the sonne of discord and dissension, standing still vpon his maiestie, refused thus to doe: but writing againe answere to his letters with great disdaine, seeking nothing else but onely how to aduance his see aboue all other churches; and not onely that, but also shortly after sent forth his preaching friers to moue all christians to take the signe of the crosse, and to fight against the Grecians no otherwise then against the Turkes and Saracens: insomuch that in the ile of Cyprus many good men and martyrs were slaine for the same, as by the letters of the said Germanus patriarch of Constantinople is to be seene.

The tenor of the third letter to the pope, with the popes answere against him, being long and tedious to reade, are extant in the historie of Mat. Parisiensis, there to bee seene and found. The summarie effect whereof notwithstanding, I thought here briefly to notifie for the simple and vnlearned multitude, which vnderstanding not the Latine, may hereby perceiue the fault of this schisme, not so much to rest in the Greeke church, as in the church of Rome, as by the contents of his letter may appeare.

The effect of the patriarch of Constantinople his letter to pope Gregorie the ninth.

IN the which letter the said Germanus patriarch of Constantinople writing to pope Gregorie, first after his reuerend salutation and preamble following vpon the same, entring then towards the matter, sheweth the occasion of his writing, which was by fiue obseruant friers repairing that waies, whom he gentlie receiuing into his house, had conference with them touching this discord between the two churches, how it might be reduced againe to vnitie: and afterward perceiuing the said friers to make their iourney towards Rome, he thought therfore by them to write his letters. Wherin he first lamenting this diuision in the house of God, and reciting the inconueniences which come thereof, by the example of Iuda and Israel, Ierusalem and Samaria, Cain and Abel, Esau and Iacob; also of other such like, both priuat and publike societies, where brother fighteth against brother, like as amongst fishes the greater deuoureth the lesser: he proceedeth then further gently to exhort pope Gregorie to the studie of vnitie.

And forsomuch as the pope had accursed (belike) those churches of the Greeks before, he therefore taking his ground vpon the words of S. Paul (Gal. 1.) where he accurseth euery such person and persons whatsoeuer they be either man or angell of heauen, that shall preach any other gospell then hath been preached, &c: willeth the pope to stand with him vpon the same ground of the apostles curse: so that if the stroke of that curse haue light vpon him or his churches, he desireth him to shew the wound, and to helpe to wipe away the blood, to minister some spirituall implaister, to bind vp the sore, and to saue Salomon.

Faith & the church of the Greekes & the pope & church of Rome vnited vnder the danger of the Turke.

saue his brethren from perishing which lay in danger, according to the saying of the wise man: A brotherly friend is tried in aduersitie, &c.

But if we (saith he) of the Greeke church bee free from the stripe of this curse of the apostle, & that you Italians and of the Latine church be stricken therewith, and lie thereby in danger of destruction, I trust that you through ignorance and willfull obstinacie will not so suffer your selues to be separated from the Lord, but rather will suffer a thousand deaths before, if it were possible for a man so often to die.

And as touching this great discord betweene vs, if either contrarietie of doctrine, or swaruing from the ancient canons, or diuersitie of rites receiued of our forefathers bee any cause thereof, where take heauen and earth to witnesse, that wee for our parts are readie, and desire also vpon due triall of profound truth by Gods word & inuocation of the Holy ghost, to ioyne hands with you, or you to ioyne with vs. But to say the verie tauth, & to tell you plaine, this we suppose, that many mightie and noble potentates would sooner incline to your obedience, were it not that they feared your vniust oppressions, your infatiable exactions, & inordinate prouisions wherwith you wring your subiects. By reason whereof haue risen amongst vs cruell wars, one fighting against another, desolation of cities, buls and interdictions set vpon church dores, diuision of brethren, and churches of the Grecians left whithout seruice, where God should be praised. So that now only one thing lacketh, which I beleeue to bee predefined & appointed from aboue long before to vs Grecians, the time I meane of martyrdome, which also now hasteneth fast vpon vs, that the tribunall of tyrants should be opened, and the seats of toirments bee set, that the blood of martyrs should be spilled, and we brought to the stage of martyrdome, to fight for the crowne of glorie.

This that I do speake, and wherfore I speake it, the noble iland of Cyprus doth alreadie know and feele, which hath made many new martyrs, and hath seene valiant souldiers of Christ, which of long time before passing by water & teares of sorrowe, now at last haue also passed through fire, and so entred into the heauenly rest. How say you, bee these good and seemely, O holy pope, the successor of S. Peter the apostle? Is this the bidding of that good Peter, the meeke and humble disciple of Christ? Doth he thus instruct the seniors and elders in his epistle, where he writeth in this wise? The elders which are among you, I beseech, which am also a fellow elder with them, & witnes of the sufferings of Christ, and also a partaker of the glorie that shall be opened. Feed the flocke of God which is amongst you, hauing care & sight ouer it, not of a coaction as compelled against your wils, but willingly of your owne accord, not for filthie lucre sake, but freely and heartily, neither as bearing dominion and lordship ouer the church, but shewing your selues as an example to the flocke: and when the chiefe pastor shal appeare, you shall receiue an incorruptible crowne of eternall glorie, &c. And this is the doctrine of Peter, as they shall see, which do not obey it. As for vs, the other part of the said epistle is sufficient: wherein he willeth them to reioyce which are in heauinesse through manifold temptations, that the triall of their faith being much more precious then gold that perisheth, and is tried in fire, may be their laud, honor, and glorie, at the appearing of the Lord Iesu, &c. But beare with me I pray you (O holy father, and of al your predecessors most meeke) and suffer my words though they be something sharpe, for they bee sighings of a sorrowfull heart.

Wherefore gird about your loines with fortitude, and light vp the candle of your discretion, and seeke the grote that is lost, of the vnitie, I meane of faith. And we will also with like compassion ioine with your holinesse, and will not spare this weake bodie of mine, in pretending any excuse either of age or length of the way: for the more laborious the trauell is, the more crownes it bringeth. And S. Paul saith: euery man shall receiue reward according to his trauell, &c.

Neither are we ignorant (if it please your holines) that like as we Grecians for our parts do labor in all respects to keepe & obserue the sinceritie of true faith and doctrine, not to erre nor swarue in any part or point from the statutes of the blessed apostles and ancient fathers: so the church likewise of old Rome doth for his part labor also (we know well) to follow the sincere veritie of christian doctrine, and thinketh hir selfe to erre in nothing, nor to need any remedie or reformation. And this we know is the iudgement and saying of both the churches, as well of the Greekes, as of the Latines. For no man can see any spot in his owne face, without he stoope downe to the glasse, or else be admonished by some other, whether his face be blotted or no. Euen so haue wee many great and faire glasses set before vs: first the cleare gospell of Christ, the epistles of the apostles, and diuinitie bookes of ancient writers. Let vs therefore looke in them well: they will shew euery mans mind and iudgement, whether he go right or wrong. The God of peace tread downe Satan speedilie vnder our feet. The author of peace confound the fewer of discord. He that is the cause of all goodnesse destroy the hater of that which is good, and which giueth cause of offence and slander. And he which is God of all ioy and peace, send to vs, which are the shepheards of his sheepe reasonable, the angel of peace, and the messenger of great glad tidings, as he did in the natiuitie of Christ, to the shepheards of brute sheepe and vnreasonable, and make vs worthie to sing that ioyfull song of Gods praise: Gloria in excelsis Deo, & in terra pax, hominibus bona voluntas: and to receiue one another with an holy kisse. The grace of our lord Iesus Christ, and the peace of God the father, and the communion of the Holy spirit be with you alwaies: Amen.

Another epistle of the said Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople, and primate of the Greeke church, to the cardinals of Rome.

ANother letter the said Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople, wrote also the same time to the popes cardinals, wherin he first commendeth them for their wisedome and counsell, and sheweth what vtilitie commeth by good counsell giuing. For so much as God (saith he) many times, that vtterly he bereth from one, inspireth to another, so that that good thing which by the almightie God is sundrely dispended to diuers, through common counsell and conference spreadeth to the publike vtilitie of many, &c. After this ech one he beginneth to exhort them, that they like charitable ministers, and discreet counsellors, will take in hand the spirituall armor of God, to cast downe the stop and partition wall of the old discord betwixt the Greeke and Latin church, and that they will be a meanes to the bishop of Rome, that they which so long haue been deuoured by dissension, may now be coniouned in vnitie of peace, in brotherly charitie and communion of faith.

Concerning which matter, I haue (saith he) already written to his holinesse. And now I beseech the king of heauen, which take the shape of a seruant, to helpe his miserable seruants, & was exalted vpon the crosse, to raise them vp which were fallen into the profunditie of desolation, that he will vouchsafe to put from your hearts all elation of mind, extolling it selfe ouer and aboue the vnitie of your brethren and fellow seruants, and to lighten your consciences with the true light of vnderstanding, that we may all together agree in one, & that there be no schisme amongst vs. Let vs therefore as we are instructed, so abide in one mind, that it bee not said of vs, as it was of the Corinthians before vs: I hold of Paul, I of Apollo, I of Cephas, and I of Christ: but that all we, as we hold the name of Christ, and are all called christians, so may also abide in that wherein wee are instructed in one mind, that is, to follow loue and charitie in Christ Iesus, hauing alwaies in our hearts the words of the apostle, saying: One Lord, one faith, one baptisme.

Thus now to be plaine with you in that I haue to say, I shall desire you not to be offeaded with me in bitring the truth as a friend vnto you. The words (saith Salomon) of a wise man telling truth, be like to nailes which bee driuen in deepe: And truth for the most part breedeth enemies. And therefore though I am partly afraid, yet will I simple confesse the truth vnto you. Certes this diuision of christian vnitie amongst vs, proceedeth of no other cause but onely of the tyrannie, oppression, and exactions of the church of Rome, which of a mother is become a step dame, and hath put hir children from hir whom long time she nourished (after the maner of a rauening bird, which deuoureth hir owne young from hir:) which children how much the more humble & obedient they are to hir, the lesse shee esteemeth them, & treadeth them vnder foot, not regarding the saying of the gospell: Who so humbleth himselfe shall be exalted.

Let modestie therefore something temper you, and let the auarice of the court of Rome, although it cannot well out of the flesh which is bred in the bone, yet forcease a while, and let vs together condescend to the triall of the truth, which truth being found out on both sides, let vs constantly imbrace the same.

For why, we haue been altogether sometimes both Italians and Grecians in one faith, and vnder the same canons, hauing peace each with other, and defending one another, and confounding the enemies of the church. At what time many spring out of the west parts (which that the tyrannie of the heretikes induced) made their concourse to vs, and were receiued, and part fled vnto you, that is, old Rome, as to a strong towre of refuge, and so receiued they comfort in both places, and one brother twins thus receiued into the bosome of another, by mutuall loue for their defence.

Then after, when Rome had been often distressed by the barbarous and heathen nations, the Grecians were euer ready to rescue and deliuer them. Did not Agapetus and Vigilius flie vnto Constantinople by reason of the dissensions then at Rome, and being honorablie receiued, were here defended vnder our protection? although the like kindnesse was neuer yet shewed of your part to vs againe in our like necessities. Notwithstanding, we ought to do good to them also that be vngratefull; for so doth the sea participat his fresh & saline tides euen vnto the pirats. And so God causeth the sun to shine vpon the iust and vniust. But (alas for sorow) what bitter diuision is this, that hath thus sequestred vs asunder? One of vs detracteth another, thwnting the companie one of another, as the damnation of his soule. What a mostall hatred is this come among vs? If you thinke we are fallen, then do you helpe to lift vs vp, and be not to vs a stumbling blocke to our bodily ruine, Paul rebuketh Peter. Galath. 2.

But if the blame and first origin of all this offence proceedeth from Rome, and the successors of Peter the apostle; then read ye the words of saint Paul to the Galathians, saying: When Peter came to Antioch, I withstood him in the face, because he was to be rebuked, &c. Do whilst this resistance was no cause of any discord, or breach betweene them, but the cause rather of further search and profounder disputations, prouoking temporall agreement. For either were fast ioyned together in the bond of charitie in Christ, agreeing in faith and conformitie of doctrine, separated by no ambition or anarice. In which points would God we also were like vnto them: This to vs in our minds gendreth a great offence, that you gaping so greedily after terren possessions, scrape together all that you can scratch and rake. You heape vp gold and siluer, and yet pretend that you be the disciples of him which said: Gold and siluer I haue none, &c. You make whole kingdomes tributarie to you, and kings and princes your vassals. You augment your mooney by vsurie, and by feats of merchandize. Don vniteach by your deeds, that which you teach in words.

Acts 3. The ambition of the patriarch of Constantinople and other bishops which were made tributarie to the see of Rome.

The immoderate quarrel of the court of Rome.

Moderate your selues therefore with more temperance, that you may be an example to vs and to all the world. You see how good a thing it is one brother to helpe another. Onely God alone needeth no helpe or counsell, but men need to bee holpen one of another. And were it not that I doe reuerence the blessed apostle Peter, the chefe of Christs apostles, the rocke of our faith, I would here put you in remembrance how greatly this rocke was shaken and remoued from the foundation, at the sight of a silly woman and Christ of his secret purpole permitted the same, which by the crowing of the cocke brought him againe to remembrance of that which was foretold him, and raised him from the slumber of desperation. Then he being thus waked, washed his face with teares, confessing himselfe before God and all the world, to bee a true patrone of repentance, which before bare the keyes of the kingdome, as saying thus vnto vs: Say not he which falleth, rise againe: Oh you which are fallen, rise vp and behold me, and hearken vnto me, trauelling toward paradise; the gates wherevnto to open I haue receiued power.

Peter an ensample of repentance.

And thus do I write vnto you, not for any instruction, but onely to put you in remembrance: for I know how God hath indued you with all wisedome and knowledge; as Salomon saith: Give only occasion to the wise, and he will learne wisedome: Teach the iust man, & he will be glad to take instruction.

This one thing more I will say and so make an end: There bee great and mightie nations that are of like mind and opinion with vs. First the Ethiopians that inhabite the chiefest part of the east. After that the Syrians, and other more of greater number then they, and more disposed to vertue, as the Hiberi, Alani, Gothi, Gharari, with innumerable people of Russia, and the kingdome of great Tiberie of the Bulgarians. And all these are obedient vnto vs as their mother church, persisting hitherto constantly in the ancient and true orthodoxe faith immouueable.

Christian countries and nations in the east parts which are not vnder the bishop of Rome.

The God of all holinesse, which for our sakes became man, and which onely is the head of his church and congregation, vouchsafe to gather vs againe together in vnitie, and grant that the Grecian church together with her sister church of old Rome may glorifie the same Christ, the prince of peace, by the vnitie of faith, to the restitution of sound & wholesome doctrine, wherein many yeares agone they haue agreed and were vnited. God grant vnto you brotherly charitie, and the hand of the most mighty God guerene you all holy cardinals) till that ioyfully ye arriue in the hauen of euerlasting tranquillitie. The grace of God be with you all, Amen. Ex Match. Parisiens. fol. 111.

Christ only the head of the church.

Shortly after the sending of these letters, pope Gregorie prepared to send men of war signed with the crosse to fight against the Grecians: whereupon the archbishop of Antioch, with the said Germanus solemnly excommunicated the pope, after he first had excommunicated them: Paris. fol. 118. In the meane time by the tenor of these letters of the patriarch sent to the pope and to the cardinals, it is euident to all men that haue eyes in their heads to see: first how the whole vniuersall church of Christ, from the east parts to the west, in ancient times were altogether vnited in one consent of doctrine, and linched together in brotherly charitie, one church brotherly to helpe another, both with temporall aid and spirituall counsell, as cause required. Neither was then any one mother church aboue other churches, but the whole vniuersall church was the mother church and spouse of the Lord, to euery faithfull beleeuer. Vnder which vniuersall church in generall were comprehended all other particular churches in special, as sister churches together, not one greater then another, but all in like equalitie, as God gaue his gifts to serue one another, euer holding together the vnitie of faith, and fatherly loue. And so long was it and rightly might so be called the catholike church, hauing in it true vnitie, vniuersalitie, and free consent. Vnitie in doctrine, vniuersalitie in communicating and ioyning together of voices, consent in spirit and iudgement. For whatsoeuer was taught at Rome touching faith and saluation, it was no other then was taught at Antioch, Syria, &c.

The first note. The second note.

Secondly, how in processe of time, through occasion of the bishops of Romes tyrannie and violent oppression, this ring of equalitie being broken all flew in pieces, the east church from the west, the Greeks from the Latins, and that which was one before, now was made two; vnitie turned to diuision, vniuersalitie to singularitie, and free consent to dissension.

The third note.

Thirdly, here is also to be noted, after this pitifull breach of equalitie, how many and what great nations departed from the communion of the church of Rome, and especially about this time aboue specified of pope Gregorie the ninth, An. 1230: so that both before and after that time many councels were holden, and many things concluded in the west church, whereunto the one halfe of christendome lying in the east parts, did neuer agree: and contrarie, many councels holden with them, which in the Latine church were not receiued. So that the church now is the lest the benefit of vniuersall consent, so also the lest the name catholike. Whereupon this question is to be asked, that when the councell of Latran vnder pope Innocent the third, ordained the doctrine of transubstantiation, and auricular confession here in the west church, without the free consent of the east church, whether the same doctrine is to be counted catholike or not?

The church hath her name of catholike, where by and when. Whether the doctrine of transubstantiation, made without the free consent of the east churches, be catholike or no? The fourth note.

Fourthly, in the departing of these churches from the bishop of Rome, here also is to be noted, that the same churches of the Greeks, notwithstanding they sequestred themselues, and fell out with the church of Rome, and that finally: yet they kept their vnitie still with their God, and receiued still the true faith alwaies; that is, The true and sincere doctrine of faith, readie to debate and trie the truth of their religion by the scriptures, as they here in their owne writings before to haue the truth examined, according as ye haue heard. Wherefore the church of Rome hath done them open wrong, which being offred so gentlie to trie and to be tried by the truth of Gods word, not onely would stand to no triall, no abide conference, but also hath excommunicated them as heretikes, which appeare here to bee more orthodoxe & catholl chiflians then they themselues.

Fiftly, these things thus standing, then haue we to conclude that the church of Rome falsely pretendeth it selfe catholike. For if the name of catholike must needs import an vniuersall consent of the whole, how can that be catholike where the consent of so many famous and true christian churches hath been lacking; and furthermore where the consent that hath been amongst themselues, hath rather been coacted then any free consent? Which is easie to be proued: for let these fires and fagots cease, let kings and princes leaue to presse their subiects with the popes obedience; but let the scripture, and the bishops alone euery one in his owne diocesse to gouerne their flocke after the rule of Gods word, and how few bee there in this well end of the world (trow you) that would not bee the same that these Grecians, Ethiopians, and Syrians haue done before vs? And thus much by the occasion of this patriarchs letters sent to pope Gregorie concerning the Grecians.

The fifth note. The church of Rome vniuersall not to be catholike. The diuersitie of churches and nations free consent, but not coacted.

Ex Mat. Paris. fol. 71. b.

The miserable state of the west part of christendome vnder the pope. The popes excommunication like to a foules tagget. The false pretensions of the popes supremacie, cause of much bloudshed.

Many grone at Rome between the king and the archbishop of Canturbury.

Whose doings when I consider, as I cannot but commend their wisedome, and iudge their state happie and blessed, in hauing of free right neckes the miserable yoke of the popes tyrannie: so on the other side considering with my selfe the wretched state done of these our churches here in the west part of the world vnder the bishop of Rome, I cannot tell whether more to maruell or to lament their pitifull fate, who were brought into such oppression and slauerie vnder him, that neither they could abide him, nor yet durst cast him off. So intolerable were his exactions, so terrible was his tyrannie, his sufpensions and excommunications much like to a mad mans dagger, drawne at euery trifle, that no christian patience could suffer it, nor nation abide it. Againe, so deepe did he sit in their consciences, faltlie beleeuing him to haue the authoritie of S. Peter, that for conscience sake neither king nor Cesar durst withstand him, much lesse poore subiects once mute against him. And although his takings and spoilings namely in this realme of England were such, that neither the laitie nor spirituallie they could beare them, yet was there no remedie, beare them they must, or else the popes sentence was vpon them, to curse them as blacke as pitch.

The miserable state of the realme of England.

In reading the histories of these times, any good heart would lament: true, to see the miserable captiuitie of the people vnder this tyrannie of the bishop of Rome, more (God willing) shall follow hereafter, and some part presently I mind to expresse.

A briefe table or declaration of the popes vnreasonable gatherings, exactions, and oppressions in the realme of England.

A briefe table of the popes spoiling and getting of English mens goods in the daies of king Henrie the thirde.

AND first to begin with the elections of the bishops, abbats, deanes, and priors within this realme, it cannot bee told what masse of money grew to the popes coffers thereby, especially in this kings daies: for so much as in his time lightly no election happened either of archbishop, bishop, abbat, or any conuent of dignitie, but when the conuent or chapter had chosen one to their mind, the king, who had maried a stranger, and and sought therefore to prefer strangers, would set vp another. Vp reasd whereof, when the other part was faine to appeale to Rome, and there to plead the case, no small riuers of English mony, besides expences and trauell by the way, went flowing to the popes sea. And although the election went neuer so cleere, yet the new elect must needs respect the holy father with some gentle reward, and further by his oth was bound euery three yeares, either in his owne person, or by another to visit Limina apostolorum.

Many coming to the popes court for confirmation of their election. Iohn Herford bishop of S. Asaphs. Matth. Paris. fol. 132. b.

So in the house of S. Albons, when Iohn Herford was elected abbat, their publike election was not enough, but for the confirmation of the same the monks were faine to send Reginold the physician, and Nicolas a monke, to Rome with a sufficient bag of mony, through the mediation whereof the election might stand, and the new abbat swone euery three yeere by himselfe, or another to visit the bones of the apostles.

Eight thousand nine hundred fiftie marks paid for the bishopricke of Lichfield to the pope, about the election of Alexander Nale, An. 1241.

Another such like contention happened betweene the king and the monks of Winchester, about the election of William Nale, whom the monks had chosen; but the king refused, willing to place a stranger, and therefore sent to Rome his messuage, Theobald a monke of Westminster, and Walter Alexgers, Theobald a monke of Westminster, and Walter Alexanders a lawyer, with no small sum of mony to procure the election of the foresaid William Nale: commanding moreouer, that the gates of Winchester should be shut against him, and no man so hardy there to receiue him in the house. Whereupon the said Wil. being secluded, after he had laid his curse vpon the whole city of Winchester, made his repaire to Rome, where eight hundred marks being promised to the pope, his bishopsicke (spite of the kings heart) was confirmed, and he receiued. Ex Mat. Paris. fol. 164. & 240.

Many coming to the pope, before the bishop of Lincolne and the conuent.

Great expence of money in the court of Rome, between the bishop of Lincolne and the conuent.

After the death of Stephan Langton archbishop of Canturbury, he heard before how the monks had elected Walter a monke of Canturbury. But the king to stop that election, sent his two procters, M. Alexander Stanes, and M. Henry Sandford bishop of Rochester to the pope, to coacuat that election, and to place Richard chancellor of Lincolne. Which procters perceiuing at first the pope and cardinals, how hard and vnwilling they were thereunto, and considering how all things might be bought for mony, rather then the king should faile of his purpose, they promised on the kings behalfe to the pope for maintaining his wars against Frederike the emperor, a deme of tenth part of all the moueables in the realme of England and of Ireland. At the contemplation of which mony the pope effewes thinking to passe with the king, began to picke quarrels with the foresaid Walter, for not answering rightly to his questions about Gualtis descending to hell, making of Gilles body on the altar, the weeping of Rachel for her children, the being dead before, about the sentence of excommunication, and certaine causes of matrimony. His answers whereunto when they were not to the popes mind, he was therefore put backe, and the kings man preferred, which cost the whole realme of England and Ireland the tenth part of their moueable goods, by reason whereof, what mony was raised to the popes gazophylacium, I leaue to the estimation of the reader, An. 1229.

The popes answer to Robert Grosthead.

Ex Mat. Paris. fol. 71.

It happened moreouer the same yeere, that the said Robert Grosthead excommunicated and deprined one Ranulphus a beneficed person in his diocesse, being accused of incontinencie: who after the terme of forty daies, refusing to submit himselfe, was by the writ of the shiriffe of Rutland to appeered him at the bishop vnder the shiriffe of Rutland to appeered him at the bishop vnder the shiriffe of Rutland to appeered him at the bishop vnder a few words in pope Innocents care, the marriage was good enough: and letters sent to the pope the popes legat here, to giue sentence solemnly with the earle. Notwithstanding the Dominican freiers, and other of the like religious fraternities, withstood that sentence of the pope stoutly, saying that the popes holinesse was therein deceiued, and sought in danger, that Christ was ielous ouer his wife, and that it could not bee any wise pull'ble, that a woman which had solued marriage with Christ, could af erward marry with any other. &c: An. 1238. Ex Parisiensi, f. 1114.

As touching was nothing so hard in the wide world, wherewith the pope would not dispence for money: so by the said dispensation was much mischief was wrought abroad. For the rulers of the people crushing vpon the popes dispensation, little regarded what they did, what they promised, or what they sware. As well appeared by this king Henry the third, of whom a great number of the peere commons, as euer was any king before him or since, and thinking thereby to win the people fauor to his deuotion, most faithfully promised them once or twice, & there to bound himselfe with a solemne oth, both before the clergy and laity, to grant vnto them the old liberties and customes as wel of Magna charta, as Charta de foresta, perpetually to be obserued. Whereupon a Quindecim was granted to the king. But after the parement was sure, the king trusting by the popes dispensation for a little money to be discharged of his oth and couenant went from that he had promised and sworne before.

Wilfull periury maintained by the popes dispensations.

In like maner the said king another time, being in need of money, signed himselfe with the crosse, pretending and swearing deeply in the face of the whole parliament, that he would himselfe personally fight in the holy land against the Sarasens. But as soone as the mony was taken, small care was had for performance of his oth, being so put in the head by certaine about him, that he needed not to passe of that periury, for smuch as the pope for an hundred pounds or two, would quickly discharge him therof. Ex Mat. Paris. fol. 372.

Out of the same corrupt spring of these popish dispensations, haue proceeded also many other foule absurdities. For where many young men were in those daies, which inioied benefices, and were no priests: and when by the procurement of Robert Grosthead, bishop of Lincolne, the said young men should be forced, whether they would or not, to enter orders; they laying their purses together, sent to Rome, and obtained of the pope a dispensation to remaine still as they were, that is, to haue the fruits of benefices to finde them at schole or Vniuersitie, and yet themselues vnder ministers to take charge, nor yielding any seruice for their preists taken: Ex Mat. Paris, fol. 256. Besides innumerable heapes of enormities more, proceeding of the popes dispensations, as dispensing one man to haue sundry bishopricks, to incroch pluralities of benefices, to make children parsons, to legitimate bastards, with such other like, the particulars wherof for brenities sake I doe omit to further opportunitie.

Commodities which spring of the popes dispensations.

The intollerable oppression of the realme of England by the popes exactions, and contributions, and of their slights vsed in the time of king Henry the third.

Diuers kinds of the popes exactions and contributions.

ALthough these enuoluments, thus rising daily to the popes purse by simony and bribery, by elections and dispensations, might seeme sufficient to satisfie his greedy appetite: yet so insatiable was the auarice of that sea, that he not yet contented therewith, euer and besides all this, sent euery where almost some legat or other into this realme to take for his aduantage. Insomuch that during all this kings time, the realme was neuer lightly without some of the popes legers, with all violence exacting and extorting continuall pensions, contributions, and summes of money to be leuied out of cels, abbies, priories, fruits of benefices, and bishopricks, and also lay mens purses, to the miserable impouerishing both of the clergy and temporalty, as hereunder followeth.

Cardinall Otho sent into England.

First, after Pandulphus, was sent into this realme cardinall Otho, procured by the king without the assent of his nobles, to the vtter to all these vncreature affaires he had to do. At receiuing of which legat, great preparance was made, many rich and sumptuous gifts in scarlet, in plate, in iewels, in money and palfreies were giuen him. When the king also himselfe went as far as the seaside to receiue, bowing downe his head in low courtesie to the cardinall his man. To whom also the bishop of Winchester for his part gaue to the keeping of his house, fifty tun of red, an hundred semes of wheat, 4 eight great vessels of pure wine. This legat at his first comming beginneth first to bestow such benefices as he found vacant, vpon them whom he brought with him, without respect whether they were needy or not. Ex Parisiensi, fol. 105.

After this, the pope hearing how the nobles and commons of the realme began to stomach the cardinall for his excessiue procurations and exactions, sent for him home: but the king by reason he stood in feare of his nobles, 4 thought to haue a stay by the cardinall against all occurrents, intreated him to stay while he wrote to the pope to obtaine further licence for him to tary: 2 so did, not without some English money he may be sure.

In this meane time of vacation, Otho thinking to lose no time, but to gather also some crums in Scotland, made as though he would set things there in order, which were in the church of Scotland to be reformed: and so commeth to the king of Scots, being then in Barke with king Henry, to haue leaue to enter. Vnto whom the king thus made answer, that he neuer saw, to his remembrance, any popes legat in his land, neither was there any such need: God be praised, for such to be sent for. Matters there were well enough, and needed no helpe of his. And as he could neuer learne either in the dates of his father, or any his predecessors, that any such entrance to any legat was granted: so for his part would not now begin. But yet notwithstanding, forsomuch as I learne (said he) that you are a good man, this I tell you before, that if ye will needs aduenture in, doe it warily, and take heed to your feete, lest it happen to you otherwise then I would wish: for they bee a sauage and vnruly people, giuen much to murther, and shedding blood, whom neither I my selfe am scarse able to bride, so that if they fall vpon you, I shall not be able to helpe you. And how they also inuaded me, and fought to expell me from my kingdome, ye heard a late. And therefore I warne you before, take heed before what ye thinke best to do. After the cardinall heard the king speake these words, he plucht in his bonnes, and durst proceed no further, but kept him still by the side of king Hertin. Notwithstanding shortly after, the same legat comming to the borders of Scotland, there called the bishops to him, and so when he had well filled his bags, came backe againe. Ex Mat. Paris, fol. 106. 123. b.

The king of Scots his answer to the legat sent into Scotland.

The realme of Scotland by diuers meanes troubled, to bow any popes legat.

It was not long after, but licence came from pope Gregory to his legat Otho, for his longer abode here in the realme (as welcome as water in the ship) with new authority also to proceed in the popes affaires. Who first shewing to the bishops and the clergy his letters of longer tarying, required of them, for smuch as no man (said he) warreth of his owne charges, to be supported with new procurations, which was, to haue of euery mile thorough fore marks, and where one church was not able to reach thereto, that other churches should ioine withall, to make the said mony. Notwithstanding the bishops a great while stood in the denial thereof. Paris, fol. 122. 128. 132.

Cardinall Otho stopped from going into Scotland.

Anno 1238

Besides, he assembled together all the blacke monks of S. Benedicts order, giuing to them fricte orders, which shortly after for many he released to them againe. Paris, fol. 116. 119.

Moreouer, by the said Otho, and other the popes exactions, with speciall bulls directed bolwne for the same, collation of benefices being taken out of the hands of the patrons were giuen to light and vile runnagates, comming from Italy and other places, such as pleased the pope & his legat to bestow them vpon, to the great preiudice of the ancient liberty and right of the true patrons thereof. Whereupon the earles and barons, and nobles of the realme, addressed letters vnto pope Gregory by sir Robert Twing knight, for redresse of such wrongs and iniuries, who otherwise should be forced (they said) to inuocat the succo: of their king, who both was able, and no lesse was willing, according to his duty (they trusted) to reforme such enormities, and to defend the liberties of his realme. The tenor of whose writing is to be read in Math. Paris, fol. 128. a.

The nobles of England write to pope Gregory for collation of benefices taken out of their hands.

Not long after the same, in the yere of our Lord 1240, came a new precept from pope Gregory, by Petrus Rubeus the popes Nuncio, to the foresaid Otho, that all benefices men of the clergy, as well in England as in France, should pay to the pope the fifth part of their reuenews. Whereupon when the clergy men made their complaint to the king, seeking to be relieued by him: the king answered them again, that he neither would, ne durst stand against the pope in any case, and so without all hope of succo: sent them away. Parisiensis, fol. 132. Then were the archbishops, bishops, abbats, and prelats of the church commanded to assemble together at Reading, there to heare the popes mandate and commandement concerning the payment of this fifth part, where in the end thus the matter was conded, that the prelats desired a further time to be giuen them to aduise vpon the matter; and so that season the assembly brake vp: Paris, 122. Notwithstanding at last, after many excuses and exceptions laid in by the clergy: first, that because the mony was gathered to fight against the emperor, they ought not to contribute their mony, contrary to the liberties of the church. Item, forsomuch as they had paid a tenth not long before vnto the pope, vpon condition that no more such paiments should be required of them, much lesse now the fifth part should be exacted of them, because an action twice done maketh a custome. Item, seeing they had oftentimes to repaire vnto the court of Rome, if they should giue this mony against the emperor, it would turne to their danger comming through his land. Item, seeing their king had many enemies, against whom they must needs relieue the king with their mony, they could not so doe if the realme were thus impouerished, &c. All which excuses, with diuers other more notwithstanding, they were compelled at length to conforme themselues to the popes god pleasure, through the example giuen of Edmund archbishop of Canturbury, who to obtaine his purpose against the monks of Canturbury (with whom he was then in strife) began first to yeeld to the legats 800. marks for his part, whereby the rest also were faine to follow after. Ex Mat. Paris. fol. 132. 136.

Further-

Further more, the same yere the pope agreed so with the people of Rome, that if they would aid him against Frederike the emperor, loose what benefices were to be giuen in England, the same should be at their arbitrement to be bestowed vpon their children. Whereupon commandement was sent to the foresaid Edmund archbishop, to the bishops of Lincolne and Sarum, that all the collations of benefices within the realme should be suspended, till promition were made for three hundred children of the citizens of Rome to bee first serued. Vpon the which so miserable request, the said Edmund archbishop of Canturbury, for sorow to see the church so oppressed, departed the territory, & so continued in France, and died at Pontiniac. Ex Mat. Paris, fol. 124. b. Which Edmund was afterward made a saint, and canonized by pope Innocent the fourth.

Some kinne children of Rome preferred to benefices in England.

Edmund archbishop of Canturbury departeth out of the realme, and dieth in exile.

This done, then went Petrus Rubeus the popes Nuncio, and Rufinus into Scotland, from whence they brought with them three thousand pounds to the popes vse about All hollontide the same yere. At which time moreouer commeth another harpar from the pope to England, named Romelius, bringing with him three and twenty Romans here into the realme to be beneficed. Thus, what by the king on the one side, and what by the cardinall Otho, Petrus Rubeus, Rufinus and Romelius on the other side, pope England was in a wretched case. Mat. Paris, fol. 137.

Three thousand pounds to the popes vse. Romelius bringeth to England to be beneficed.

Another prettie practise of the pope to pull so mony, was this: The foresaid Petrus Rubeus, comming into religious houses and into their chapters, caused them to contribute to the popes holinesse, by the example of this bishop, and that abbat, pretending that he and he of their owne voluntary deuotion, had giuen so much and so much, and so seduced them. Paris, fol. 134. Also the pope craftily subjoined certaine letters, authorized with full indulgence, that whosoeuer had vowed to fight in the holy land, and was disposed to be released of his vow, needed not to repaire to Rome for absolution, but paying so much mony as his charges would come to going thither, he resorting to the fiue friers might be absolued at home.

✠ This passed in the yeere 1240. Now all these troubles laid together, were enough to ver the meekest prince in the world; where to by way of accesse to the kings further molestation, he had much adoe with the prelats and clergy men of his realme, who were alwaies tempering with his title, especially in their assemblies and councels: to whom the king to refraine them from that presumption, did both send and write, as appeareth by his exhidence of record, Rex misit Galfridum de Langley, &c. That is, The king sent Geffrey Langley to the archbishop of Pharaoh. Whereupon the king beginning at last to looke vp, and to consider the iniuries & wrongs receiued in this realme, through the auarice of the court of Rome, directeth to pope Innocent the fourth this letter in tenor as followeth.

Inuasion giuen to the king, touching the intollerable oppression of the realme by the pope.

The kings letter to pope Innocent the fourth.

SAnctissimo in Christo patri ac domino Innocentio Dei gratia summo pontifici, Henricus eadem gratia rex Anglia, &c. Salutem & pedum osculabeatorum, &c.

The kings letter to the pope.

To the most holy father in Christ and lord, Innocent by the grace of God chiefe bishop, Henry by the same grace king of England, &c. Greeting and kissings of his blessed feete. The more deuout and obsequious the sonne sheweth himselfe in obeying the fathers will, the more fauour and supperatation doth he deserue to finde at his fathers hands againe. This therefore I write, for that whereas both we and our realme haue euer and in all things bin hitherto at the deuotion and commandement of your fatherhood, and that although in some certaine affaires of ours and of our kingdome, we haue found your fatherly fauour and grace sometimes propice vnto vs: yet in some things againe, as in prouisions giuen and granted to your clerks of forren nations, both we and our kingdome haue felt no small detriment. By reason of which prouisions, the church of England is so fore charged and burthened, that not onely the patrons of churches, to whom the donations thereof doe appertaine, are defeated of their right: but also many other good workes of charity thereby doe decay, for that such benefices which haue been mercifully bestowed vpon religious houses to their sustentation, are now wasted and consumed by your prouisions.

Wherefore forsomuch as your fea apostolike ought to be fauourable to all that be petitioners to the same, so that no person be wronged in that which is his right, we thought therfore to be suters to your fatherhood, most humbly beseeching your holinesse, that you will desist and surcease for a time from such prouisions to be exacted. In the meane season, it may please your fatherhood we beseech you, that our lawes and liberties, (which you may rightly repute none other but your own) you will receiue to your tuition, to be conserued whole and sound, nor to suffer the same by any sinister suggestion in your court to be violated and infringed. Neither let your holinesse be any whit moued therefore with vs, if in some such cases as these be, wee doe or shall hereafter resist the tenor of your commandements, forsomuch as the complaints of such as which daily call vpon vs, doe necessarily inforce vs thereunto, which ought by the charge of this our office and kingly dignity committed to vs vs of almighty God, to foresee that no man in that which is their right be iniuried, but truly to minister iustice to euery one, in that which duly to him appertaineth. This letter was sent the eight and twentith yeere of the kings raigne. Ex Parisiensi, fol. 172.

A man would thinke that this so gentle and obedient letter of the king to the pope, would haue wrought some good effect in his apostolicall breast, to withdraw his preuisions, and to haue rendered the kings so reasonable and iust request: but how little all this preuailed to stop his insatiable greedinesse, and intollerable extortions and oppressions, the sequell well declareth. For besides that, shortly after the pope sent M. Martin with blankes, being bulled for contribution of 12000 marks, in all hast to be paid also, euen immediatly vpon the receiuing of this letter, it followeth in mine author, that the said pope Innocent the fourth, after all this great submission of the king, and so manifold benefits and paiments yerely out of his realm receiued, was not ashamed to take of Dauid prince of north Wales, fiue hundred marks by yere, to set him against the king of England, and exempted him from his fealty and obedience due to his owne liege lord and king, to whom both he and all other Welshmen had sworne their subiection before, as by the scales and obligations as well of that Dauid himselfe, as other Welsh lords in this behalfe doth appeare: In Mat. Paris, fol. 172.

Ex Matth. Paris, fol. 172.

The pope setteth vp Dauid prince of north Wales against the king of England.

Neither did M. Martinus in the meane while slep his businesse, in making vp his market for the popes mony of ten thousand marks, but still was calling vpon the prelats and clergy. Who first assuring themselues by the absence of the king and the archbishop of Canturbury, after warde being called againe by new letters, made their answer by the deane of Pauls their spokesman.

First, that the pouerty of the realme would not suffer them to consent thereto.

Item, whereas they had giuen before a contribution to cardinall Otho, for paying of the popes debts, and knew the said mony to be imployed to no such end as it was demanded for, more cause they had now to misdoubt, lest this contribution in his handes, which was a much more inferior messenger then the cardinall, would come to the same or a worse effect.

Contribution required of the pope, with their excuses and reasons against the same.

Item, if they should now agree to a new contribution, they feared lest it would grow to a custome, seeing that one action twice done, maketh a custome.

Item, forsomuch as a generall councell is shortly looked for, where euery prelat of the realme must needs be in both his trauell and expences, and also his present to the pope: if the prelats now should be bound to this tax, they were not able to abide this burthen.

Item, seeing it is alleaged, that the mother church of Rome is so far in debt, reason and right it were, that the mother so oppressed, should be sustained of all her beloued children meeting together in the generall councell: whereas by helps of many, more reliefe might come then by one nation alone.

Item, last of all, they alleaged that for feare of the emperor and his threatnings, they durst not consent to the said contribution.

While these things were thus in talke betweene the popes priests and the clergy of England, commeth in Iohn Mansell and other messengers from the king, commanding in the kings name, that no bishop that held his baronage of the king, should inlest his lay fee to the court of Rome, which they ought only to him, &c. Ex Paris. fol. 129. An. 1245.

The popes of England talk to Mansell about the prouisions, yet all was in vaine.

Not long after this, in the yeere of our Lord 1245, the whole nobility of the realme by generall consent, and not without the kings knowledge also, caused all the ports by the sea side to be laid, that no messenger with the popes letters and bulls from Rome should be permitted to enter the realme, whereupon some were taken at Douer and there staied. Notwithstanding when complaint thereof was brought to the king by M. Martinus the popes legat, there was no remedy but the king must needs cause these letters to be restored againe and executed to the full effect. Paris.

Then the king vpon aduice, caused a view to be taken through euery shire in England, to what sum the whole reuenewes of the Romans and Italians amounted, which by the popes authority went out of England: the whole sum whereof was found yerely to be threescore thousand marks, to the which sum the reuenewes of the whole crowne of England did not extend: Ex Mat. Parisiensi, fol. 185. a.

The nobles then vnderstanding the miserable oppression of the realme, being assembled together at Dunstable for certaine causes, sent one Fulco in the name of the whole nobility, vnto M. Martinus the popes merchant with this message: that he indelaiedly vpon the same warning should prepare himselfe to be gone out of the realme, vnder pain of being cut all to peces. At which message the legat being sore agast, went straight to the king, to know whether his consent was to the same or not. Of whom when he found little better comfort, he take his leaue of the king, who bad him adieu in the diuels name (saith Matth. Paris) and thus was the realme rid of M. Martinus: Ex Mat. Parisiensi, fol. 185. b. An. 1245.

As soone as pope Innocent had hereof intelligence by the complaint of his legat, he was in a mighty rage. And further more, remembring how the French king and the king of Arragon not long before had denied him entrance into their land, and being therefore in displeasure with them likewise, began in great anger to knit his bookes, and said: It is best that we fall in agreement with our prince, whereby we may the sooner bring vnder these little pettie kings: and so the great dragon being pacified, these little serpents we shall dawble at our owne pleasure as we list.

Iohn regalis. The blood bookes of the pope against the French king and king of England.

After this, immediatly then followed the generall councell of Lions, to the which councell the lords & states of the realme, with the consent of the communalty, sent two bils: one containing a generall supplication to the pope and the councell; the other with the articles of such greeuances which they desired to be redressed, whereof relation is made sufficiently before. The other bill of the supplication, because it is not before expressed, I thought here to exhibit for two causes. First, that men now in these dates may see the pitifull blindnesse of those ignorant dates, wherein our English nation here did so blindly humble themselues and stand to the popes courtesie, whom rather they should haue shaken off, as the Grecians did. Secondly, that the pride of the pope might the better appeare in his colours, who so disdainfully reiected the humble suite of our lords and nobles, when they had much more cause to disdaine rather, and to stamp him vnder their feet. The tenor of the supplication was this.

The copy of the supplication written in the names of all the nobles and commons of England to pope Innocent the fourth, in the generall councell at Lions, Anno 1245.

Anno 1245

To the reuerend father in Christ, pope Innocent, chiefe bishop, the nobles, with the whole communaltie of the realme of England sendeth commendation, with kissing of his blessed feete.

The supplication of the lords and commons of England to the pope.

OVr mother the church of Rome we loue with all our harts, as our duty is, and couet the increase of her honour with so much affection as we may, as to whom we ought alwaies to flie for refuge, whereby the griefe lying vpon the child, may finde cōfort at the mothers hand. Which succor the mother is bound so much the rather, to impart to her child, how much more kind and beneficiall she findeth him in relieuing her necessitie. Neither is it to the said our mother vnknowne, how beneficiall and bountifull a giuer the realme of England hath bin now of long time for the more amplifying of her exaltation, as appeared by your yerely subsidie, which we terme by the name Peter pence. Now the said church not contented with this yerely subsidie, hath sent diuers legats for other contributions, at diuers and sundry times to be taxed and leuied out of the same realme: all which contributions and taxes notwithstanding haue bin louingly and liberally granted.

The supersticious founding of monasteries in England.

Furthermore, neither is it vnknowne to your fatherhood, how our forefathers, like good catholikes, both louing and fearing their maker, for the soules health as well of themselues as of their progenitors and successors also, haue founded monasteries, and largely haue indued the same both with their owne proper lands, and also patronages of benefices, whereby such religious persons professing the first and chiefest perfection of holy religion in their monasteries, might with more peace & tranquillity occupie themselues deuoutly in Gods seruice, as to the order appertained: and also the clerks presented by them into their benefices, might sustain the other exterior labors for them in that second order of religion, and so discharge and defend them from all hazards: so that the said religious monasteries cannot be defrauded of those their patronages and collations of benefices, but the same must touch vs also very neere, and work intollerable griefe vnto our hearts.

Benefices in England wickedly giuen away to Italians.

And now we beseech you, which is lamentable to behold, what iniuries we sustaine by you and your predecessors, not considering those our subsidies and contributions aboue remembred, doe suffer also your Italians and forreners (which be out of number) to be possessed of our churches and benefices in England, pertaining to the right and patronage of those monasteries afore said: which forreners neither defending the said religious persons, whom they ought to see to, nor yet hauing the language, whereby they may instruct the flock, take no regard of their soules, but vtterly leaue them of wilde wolues to be deuoured. Wherefore it may truly be said of them, that they are no good shepheards, whereas neither they know their shcep, nor the sheep do know the voice of their shepheards, neither doe they keepe any hospitality, but only take vp the rents of those benefices, carrying them out of the realme, wherewith our brethren, our nephewes, and our kinsfolks might be sustained, who could and would dwell vpon them, and imploy such exercises of mercy & hospitality as their duty required. Where of a great number now for meere necessitie are lay men, and faine to flie out of the realme.

And now, to the intent more fully to certifie you of the truth, ye shall vnderstand that the said Italians and strangers receiuing of yeerely rents out of England not so little as threescore thousand marks by yeere, besides other availes and exises deducted, do reape in the said our kingdome of England more emoluments of meere rents, then doth the king himselfe, being both tutor of the church, and gouernour of the land.

Threescore thousand marks yerely giuen to Italians out of the church of England.

Furthermore, whereas at the first creation of your papacie, we were in good hope and yet are, that by meanes of your fatherly goodnesse we should inioy our franchises, and free collation of our benefices and donatiues, to be reduced againe to the former state: now commeth another grieuance, which wee cannot but signifie vnto you, presſing vs aboue measure, which we receiue by M. Martin, who entring late into our land without leaue of our king, with greater power then euer was seene before in any legat, although he beareth not the state and shew of a legat, yet he hath doubled the doings of a legat, charging vs euery day with new mandats, and so most extremely hath oppressed vs: first in bestowing and guing away our benefices, if any were aboue thirty marks, as soone as they were vacant, to Italian persons.

Secondly, after the decease of the said Italians, vnknowing to the patrons, he hath intruded other Italians therein, whereby the true patrons haue been spoiled and defrauded of their right.

Thirdly, the said M. Martinus yet also ceaseth not to assigne and conferſuch benefices ſtillvnto the like persons: and some he reſerueth to the donation of the apoſtolicall ſea, and extorteth moreouer from religious houſes immoderat penſions, excommunicating and interdicting whoſoeuer dare gainſtand him.

Complaint of M. Martin the popes legat.

Wherefore, forſomuch as the ſaid M. Martin hath ſo far extended his iuriſdiction, to the great perturbation of the whole realme, and no leſſe derogation to our kings priuiledge, to whō it hath been fully granted by the ſea apoſtolike, that no legat ſhould haue to doe in his land, but ſuch as he by ſpeciall letters did ſend for: with moſt humble deuotion beſeech you, that as a good father will alwaies be ready to ſupport his child, ſo your fatherhood will reach forth your hand of compaſſion to relieue vs your humble children from theſe grieuous oppreſſions.

King Henry the third died sorry that he became tributarie by note.

And although our lord and king, being a catholike prince, and wholly giuen to his deuotions and ſeruice of Chriſt Ieſu our Lord, ſo that he reſpecteth not the health of his own body, will feare and reuerence the ſea apoſtolike, and as a deuout ſon of the church of Rome, deſireth nothing more then to aduance the eſtate and honor of the ſame: yet we which traueil in his affaires, bearing the heat and burden of the day, and whoſe duty together with him, is to tender the preſeruation of the publike wealth, neither can patiently ſuffer ſuch oppreſſions ſo deteſtable to God and man, and greiuances intollerable, neither by Gods grace will ſuffer them, through the means of your godly remedy, which we well hope and truſt of you ſpeedily to obtaine. And thus may it pleaſe your fatherhood, we beſeech you to accept this our ſupplication, who in ſo doing ſhall worthily deſerue of all the lords and nobles, with the whole communalty of the realme of England, condigne and ſpeciall thanks accordingly. An. 1245. Ex Mat. Pariſienſi, fol. 188.

This ſupplication being ſent by the hands of ſir R. Bigot knight, and W. de Polwike ſquier, Henry de la Mare, with other knights and gentlemen, after it was there opened & read, pope Innocent firſt keeping ſilence, deferred to make anſwer thereunto, making haſt to proceed in his deteſtable excommunication and curſe againſt the good emperor Frederike. The which curſe being done, and the Engliſh ambaſſadors waiting ſtill for their anſwer: the pope then told them that they ſhould not haue their requeſt fulfilled. Whereat the Engliſhmen departing in great anger away, ſware with terrible othes, that they would neuer more ſuffer any tribute, or fruits of any benefices, namely whereof the noble men were patrons, to be paied to that inſatiable and greedy court of Rome, vntyp to be deteſted in all worlds. Ex Mat. Pariſienſi, fol. 192.

The Englishmen greeued with the pope.

The pope in an anger with England.

The pope hearing theſe words, albeit making then no anſwer, thought to watch his time, and did. Firſt, incontinent vpon the ſame, during the ſaid councell, he cauſed euery biſhop of England to put his hand and ſeale to the obligation made by king Iohn for the popes tribute, as is aboue ſpecified. Threatning moreouer, and ſaying, that if he had once brought downe the emperor Frederike, he would bidde the inſolent pride of England well enough.

The bishops of England ſet their ſeales to the popes tribute.

✠ But here by occaſion of this councell at Lions, that the reader may ſee vpon what ſlipperp, vncertainty and variableneſſe the ſtate of the king did depend; it is materiall here to interlace the forme of a letter ſent by Henry the third to the prelats of his land, before they were tranſported ouer ſea to Lions, whereby may be gathered, that the king doubted they would be thouing and heauing at his roialty; and therefore directed theſe letters vnto them, otherwiſe to prepare their affections: the tenor whereof followeth.

A letter of charge to the prelats of England, purpoſed to aſſemble in the councell at Lions, that they ſhould ordaine nothing, &c: to their kings preiudice.

cuio intramenti nobis (vt noſtis) aſtrictis, &c. In Engliſh thus.

The king to the archbiſhops, biſhops, and to all other prelats of his land of England, appointed to meet at a councell at Lions, greeting. You are (as you know) bound vnto vs by oth, whereby you ought to keep all the fealty that you can vnto vs in all things concerning our roiall dignity and crowne. Wherefore we command you vpon the fealty and alleagiance wherein you are ſtrictly bound vnto vs, inioining that you doe your vtermoſt indeuour, as well to get as to keepe, and alſo to defend the right of vs and our kingdome. And that neither to the preiudice of vs, or of the ſame kingdome, nor yet againſt vs or our rights, which our predeceſſors and we by ancient and approued cuſtome haue vſed, you preſume to procure or attempt any thing in your councell at Lions: nor that you giue conſent to any that ſhall procure or ordaine ought in this caſe, vpon your oth aforeſaid, and the loſſe of your temporalties, which you hold of vs. Wherefore in this behalfe ſo behaue your ſelues, that for your good dealing and vertue of thankfulneſſe, we may rather ſpecially commend you, then for the contrary by you attempted (which God forbid) we reproue your vnthankfulneſſe, and reſerue vengeance for you in due time. Witneſſe my ſelfe, &c: the nine and twentith yeere of our raigne. ✠ Initio ſcat wrote hee to the archbiſhops and biſhops, &c. of Ireland and Gaſcoigne.

After this councell ended, in the beginning of the next yeare following, An. 1246, pope Innocent came to Clunake, where was then appointed a ſecret meeting or colloquie betweene the pope and Lewis the French king (who was then preparing his voiage to Hieruſalem) in which colloquie the pope ſought all meanes to perſwade the French king, in reuengement of his iniury, to war Contra regulum (as he termed him) that is, againſt the weake and feeble king of England, either to driue him vtterly from his kingdome, or elſe to diminiſhe him, whereby he ſhould be conſtrained whether he would or no, to ſtoope to the popes will and obedience, wherein he alſo would aſſiſt him with all the authority he could doe. Neuertheleſſe, the French king to this would not agree. Firſt, for the conſanguinity that was betweene them (for their two queenes were ſiſters.) Alſo for the truce that they had taken. Thirdly, for feare of the emperor, leſt he ſhould take his part. Item, for that it could not be without the much ſpilling of chriſtian bloud. And laſtly, becauſe he was preparing his voyage to the holy land, where his comming was already looked for. And thus the French king, denying the popes bloudy requeſt, refuſed not only to enter warre againſt the king and the realme of England, but alſo ſhortly after concluded with him longer truce, An. 1246. Ex Mat. Pariſienſi, fol. 196. b.

Lewis the French king refuſeth to warre againſt England.

Straight vpon the necke of this followed then the eraction of Boniface archbiſhop of Canturbury that he had bought of the pope; which was to haue the firſt yeares fruits of all benefices and ſpirituall liuings in England for the ſpace of ſeuen yeres together, vntill the ſum ſhould come of ten thouſand marks. Whereat the king firſt was greatly grieued. But in concluſion, hee was faine at laſt to agree with the archbiſhop; and ſo the mony was gathered there. Paris. fol. 197.

The first yeeres fruites for ſeuen yeeres gathered of all benefices for the archbiſhop of Canturbury.

Ouer and beſides all other exactions wherewith the pope miſerably oppreſſed the church of England, this alſo is not to be concealed, how the pope ſending downe his letters from the ſea apoſtolike, charged and commanded the prelats to find him ſome ten, ſome fiue, and ſome fifteene able men well furniſhed with horſe and harneſſe for one whole yeere, to fight in the popes wars. And leſt the king ſhould haue knowledge thereof, it was inioined them vnder paine of excommunication, that they ſhould reueale it to none, but to keepe it in ſecret only to themſelues. Paris, fol. 200.

A ſubtill practiſe of the pope.

The pope yet notwithſtanding, partly being laboured by ſuters, partly of his owne mind thinking good ſometwhat to giue to the king and people of England, as fathers are wont to giue ſomething to their babes to play withall to keep them ſtill, ſent downe this releaſement to the king, that hereafter whoſoeuer any of the popes nephewes, or of his cardinals were to be beneffced in any church of England, either he or the cardinals ſhould firſt make the king priuie thereof, and inſtantly craue his good will in obtaining the procuration, or elſe the ſame to ſtand in no effect. Paris, 202. Howbeit all this ſeemed to be done but of a policie, to get the kings fauor, whereby he might be ſuffered more freely to paſſe with greater exactions, as afterward appeared.

The popes bulle ſent downe to more mony.

For when the foreſaid pope Innocent the fourth had knowledge at the ſame time of certaine rich clerks leauing great ſubſtance of mony, which did inteſtate, as of one Robert Hails, archdeacon of Lincolne, which died leauing thouſands of marks and much plate behind him, all which becauſe no will was made, came to the temporall mens hands: alſo of M. Almaſtaine, archdeacon of Bedford, being found worth a great ſubſtance when he died: and likewiſe of another M. John Iotoſh, archdeacon of Northhampton, who died ſuddenly inteſtat, leauing behind him fiue thouſand marks, and there ſtanding peces of plate, with other infinit iewels beſides: ſent forth vpon the ſame a ſtatute to be proclaimed in England, that whatſoeuer eccleſiaſticall perſon henceforth ſhould decreaſe in England inteſtat intestat, that is, without making his will, all his goods should redound to the popes vse. Paris, fol. 203.

Six thousand marks sent to the popes vse out of England for the popes.

Furthermore, the pope not yet satisfied with all this, addresseth new letters to the bishop of Winchester, and to W. bishop of Norwich, for gathering vp amongst the clergy, and religious houses in England, fiue thousand marks, to the behoofe of holy mother the church, without any excuse or delay, by vertue of obedience. Which tallage being greatly grudged of the clergy, when it came to the kings eare, hee exclames directly contrary letters to all the prelats and euery one of them, commanding them vpon forfeiting their temporalities to the king, that no such subsidy of money should be gathered or transported out of the realme. But the pope againe hearing thereof, in great anger writeth to the prelats of England, that this collection of money, vpon paine of excommunication and suspension should be prouided, and brought to the new temple in London, by the feast of the assumption next ensuing.

The king beseecheth Winchelsey and the pope, but both in vaine.

The pope in a chafe.

Furthermore, forsomuch as he perceiued the king to go about to gainstand his proceedings, taking threat great disdain: hee was about the same time to interdict the whole land. Whereupon then one of his cardinals called Ioannes Anglicus, an Englishman borne, speaking for the realme of England, desired his fatherhood for Gods cause to mitigate his moodie ire, and with the bridle of temperance to assuage the passion of his mind: which (said he) to tell you plaine, is here stirred vp too much without cause. Your fatherhood (quoth he) may consider that these daies be euill. First, the holy land lieth in great perils to be lost. All the Greeke church is departed from vs. Frederike the emperor is against vs, the mightiest prince this day in all christendome. Both you and we, which are the peeres of the church, are banished from the papall sea, thrust out of Rome, yea excluded out of all Italy. Hungary with all coasts bordering about it, loketh for nothing but vtter subuersion by the Tartarians. Germany is wasted and afflicted with inward wars and tumults. Spaine is fierce and cruell against vs, euen to the cutting out of the bishops tongues. France by vs is so impouerished, that it is brought to beggery, which also is conspired against vs. Sicilie England being so often plagued by our manifold iniuries, euen much like to Balaams asse, beaten and bounst with spurs and staues, beginneth at length to speake and complaine of her intollerable greefes and burthens, being so wearied and dammified, that she may seeme past all recouery; and we, after the maner of Ismael, hating all men, prouoke all men to hate vs, &c. Ex Parisensi, fol. 207.

The weeds of Ioannes Anglicus cardinall, to the pope.

The miserable estate of christendome.

Of Spaine he maketh mention, how cause the king of Aragon a little before had cut off the tongue of a certaine bishop that had reuiled him.

Parisiensi. 207.

For all these words of Ioannes Anglicus his cardinall, the popes cholerike passion could not yet bee appeased, but forthwith he sendeth commandement with full authority to the bishop of Worcester, that in case the king would not speedily surceasse his rebellion against his apostolicall proceedings, hee would interdict his land. So that in conclusion, the king for all his stout enterprise, was faine to relent at last, and the pope had his mony. An. 1246. Ex Parisiensi, fol. 204.

Power giuen to the bishop of Worcester to interdict the land.

The king faine to relent to the pope.

He heard before of the Greeke churches vnder the empire of Constantinople, how they sequestred themselues from the company of the Romish church. Iasomuch that Germanus the patriach of Constantinople, and the archbishop of Antioch did excommunicate the bishop of Rome. And after the said Germanus another archbishop of Constantinople, at the councell of Lions protested, that whereas before there thirtie suffragans belonging to th' prouince, now there were not three that held with the church of Rome. And this breach, albeit it chiefly brast out in the time of pope Gregory the ninth, Anno 1230, to open warre and bloodshed, yet the same had begun, & so continued long before, in such sort as in the time of pope Innocent the third, if any priest had said masse in their churches, they would wash the altar afterward: as appeareth by the acts of the Lateran councell. Capit. 4. Wherefore pope Innocent now (as his other predecessors had done before) bearing an old grudge against those churches of the Greeks, and neither willing by conference to try with them, nor able by learning to match with them, thought by force of armes to subdue them, sent the pronuntiall of the gray friers, with other assistats of the same order into England with his precept authentical, containing in it these articles.

The Greekes were so much offended with the altar cloth, &c. That they would not say masse vpon it, vntil they had washed it.

Goods left in dead mens wils for the relaxation, conuerted to the pope.

Goods bequeathed in dead mens wils, conuerted to a warre against the Greekes.

Goods ill gotten giuen to the pope.

Absolution for money.

1 First, that the said prouinciall, or his friers, should inquire vpon all visites being alue, and of all such euill gotten goods giuen per fauorem pecuniarum, should make attachment for the vse & preparation for this warre against the Greeks, excommunicating all them by district censures of the church that repugned against it.

2 That all they which tooke the badge of the crosse, for the recouery of the land oppressed of the Greeks, or with goods and catell, should helpe sufficiently vnto the same, should be absolued of all their sinnes.

3 Item, that all the goods left in the testaments of them that were deprived, being gotten by vsury, should be taken vp to the subsidie of the empire aforesaid, and whosoeuer repugned against the same, should be excommunicated.

4 Item, that such goods as in the testamets of the dead were left, or which should be left three next yeers to come, for restitution of such goods as the dead had euill gotten, they should take vp for the subsidie of the empire aforesaid, excommunicating, &c.

5 Item, such goods as were left to be distributed in godly vses, after the arbitrement of executors, by the wils of the dead, or were not in their wils deputed to any certaine places or persons named, nor yet were bestowed by the said executors to the foresaid vses, they should collect to the vse and subsidie aforesaid, and giue certificat to the sea apostolike of the quantitie thereof, excommunicating all repugners and rebellers against the same.

6 Item, that they should diligently inquire of such mens goods euill gotten of euil come by, as were aliue, and them they should attach for the subsidie aforesaid, in case the party which ought to be satisfied for those goods euill gotten, could not be found, giuing certificat thereof, and excommunicating, &c.

7 Item, that the said prouincial or his friers, should haue full power to absolue those that were excommunicated, which wittingly had done any fraud touching the collection aforesaid, so that the said persons did make due satisfaction to the deputies aforesaid. Ex Mat. Parisiensi, fol. 205.

Absolution for money.

What man hauing eies is so blind, which seeth not these execrable dealings of the pope to be such, as would cause any nation in the world to do as the wise Grecians did, and perpetually to abiure the pope, and well to consider the blurred authority of that seat not to be of God? But such was the rude dulnes then of miserable England, for lacke of learning and godly knowledge, that they feeling what burthens were laid vpon them, yet would play still the asse of Balaam, or else the horse of Esop, which receiuing the bridle once in his mouth, could afterward neither abide his owne misery, nor yet recouer liberty. And so it fared with England vnder the popes thraldome: as partly by these stories aboue hath been declared, partly by other in like case following is to be seene.

An interdiction at the creation of the pope.

For so it followeth in the story of the said Matth. Paris, how the pope taking more courage by his former abused boldnesse, and perceiuing what a tame asse he had to ride vpon, ceased not thus, but directed a new precept the same yeere, 1246, to the prelats of England, commanding by the authority apostolike, that all benefited men in the realme of England, which were resident vpon their benefices, should yeeld to the pope the third part of their goods, & they which were not resident should giue the one halfe of their goods, and that for the space of three yeres together: with terrible commiuations to all them that did resist: and euer with this clause withall, Non obstante, which was like a key that openeth all locks. Which sum cast together, was found to amount to 60000 pounds: which sum of mony could scarse be found in all England to pay for king Richards ransome: Paris, fol. 207. The execution of this precept was committed to the bishop of London, who conferring about the matter with his brethren in the church of Pauls, as they were busily consulting together, and bewailing the impotable burden of this contribution, which was impossible for them to sustaine, suddenly commeth in certaine messengers from the king, sir John Lenuton knight, and M. Laurence Martin the kings chaplen, straitly in the kings name forbidding them in any case to consent to this contribution, which should bee greatly to the preiudice and desolation of the whole realme. Paris, fol. 207.

Three score thousand pounds granted of the clergy to be paied to the pope.

A parliament.

This being done, about the first day of December, in the yeere aboue said, shortly after in the beginning of the next yeere 1247, about February the king called a parliament, where by common aduice it was agreed, that certaine ambassadors should be sent to Rome, to make manifest to the court of Rome the exceeding grieuances of the realme, deliuering moreouer these letters to the pope in the name both of the temporality and also of the clergy, as here followeth.

The bishop of London answered to the letters the popes messengers.

Another letter sent to pope Innocent the fourth in the names of the whole clergy and comminalty of England, An. 1247.

A letter sent to the pope in the name of all the estates and comminalty of the realme.

Sanctissimo patri in Christo ac domino Innocentio Dei prouidentia summo pontifici, vniuersitas cleri & populi per prouinciam Cant. constituti deuota pedum oscula beatorum. Cum Anglicana ecclesia, &c. To the most holy father in Christ, and lord Innocent, by Gods prouidence chiefe bishop; the whole comminalty both of the clergy and laity within the prouince of Canturbury sendeth deuout kissings of his blessed feet. Like as the church of England, since it hath first receiued the catholike faith, hath alwaies shewed her selfe faithfull and deuout in adhering to God and to our holy mother the church of Rome, studying with all kind of seruice to please and to serue the same, and thinking neuer otherwise to do, but rather to continue and increase as she hath begun: euen so now the same church most humbly prostrat before the feet of your holinesse, intirely beseecheth your clemencie to accept her petition, in sparing this imposition of mony, which so manifold wates for the subuention of other nations, by the commandement of your holinesse is laid vpon vs: considering that not onely it is importable, but also impossible which is inioyned vs. For although our countrey countrie sometimes yeelded forth fruit for the necessarie sustentation of the inhabitants, yet it bringeth forth neither gold nor siluer, neither were able to bring forth of long time so much as now adaies is required. Which also being burdened and ouercharged of late daies with another such like imposition, but not so great as this, is not able any whit to answere vnto that which is exacted.

Furthermore, besides this commandement of your holinesse, there is required of the clergie a subsidie for our temporall king, whose necessities neither possible we can, nor honestly ought to forsake, whereby he may both withstand the inuasion of the enemie, and maintaine the right of his patrimonie, & also recouer againe that hath been lost. In consideration whereof, we haue directed the bearers hereof to the presence of your holinesse with our humble supplication, to explaine to you the dangers and inconueniences which are like to insue vpon the premisses, which by no meanes we are able to sustaine, although notwithstanding we know our selues by all bonds of charity to be obliged to your deuotion and obedience. And because our generall communitie hath no seale proper, wee haue signed therefore these presents with the publike seale of the citie of London, &c. Ex Parisiensi fol. 209.

The like letters were sent also vnto the cardinals, to the same effect. The pope vnderstanding these things, and perceiuing that there was no striuing against such a generall consent, and yet loth to forgo his sweet haruest, which he was wont to reape in England, craftilie deuised to send this answere againe vnto the king, much like to the same which he sent before, which was: That although the pope in time past vpon his owne will and pleasure to the vnpotable grieuance of the realme of England, hath euery where, and without reason, through the whole land made his prouisions in giuing their benefices vnto his Italians, yet now, the Lord be praised, that tempest said he, is ouerblowne: & that hereafter if the pope shall grant his prouision for any of his nephues or of his cardinals, they shall come first and make their instant sute vnto the king, without all inforcement, so that it shall stand wholy in the kings free arbitrement to doe herein what he thinketh good, &c. Matt. Paris, fol. 209. b.

The pope answere against to the king of England.

The pope false of his promise.

This answere of the pope albeit it was but a subtil shift for the time, yet neither did he long stand to that he had thus promised to the king. For shortly after, and within few daies vpon the same, and in the time also of the said parliament holden at Winchester, the pope sent two English friers into the realme, whose names were Iohn and Alexander, with full authoritie after the largest sort, for new contributions. Who first pretending lowly submission to the king, while they had leaue granted to range about the realme, afterward comming to the bishops and rich abbats, shewed themselues forth in their full authoritie, in such sort as they became rather tyrants then exactors.

Note the subtill practise of the pope to get money.

Among others, comming to Robert bishop of Lincolne, who of all other bare a speciall mind to the order of obseruants, these two friers as proud as Lucifer, bringing forth the terrible mandat with the popes bulls, required and eke commanded vnder the popes mightie curse, to haue the gathering in his diocesse of fiue thousand marks. Likewise of the abbat of S. Albons they required foure hundred marks vnder great penalty and that in short time to be paid.

The bishop although well liking before that order of those friers, yet seeing the impudent behauiour, and more impudent requeste of those merchants, thus answered them against that this exaction (sauing, saith he, the popes authoritie) was neuer heard of before, and neither was honest, nor yet possible to be performed: and moreouer was such as did not onely concerne him, but the whole publike state of the clergie, and of the whole realme in generall; and therefore it should be absurdlie and rashly done of him to giue them answere herein, before the king and the rest of the councell, with others to whom the matter generally did appertaine, were made priuie thereunto, &c: and so for that time he shoke them off. Paris, fol. 210.

Furthermore, as touching the abbat of S. Albons, when he also alleaged the same causes, he pretended moreouer that hee would appeale, and so did, to the pope and his cardinals. Whereupon immediately was sent downe from pope Innocent another legat called Iohannes Anglicus, an Englith frier and cardinall, who bringing downe a new speciall precept to the foresaid abbat, cited him either to appeare at London the morrow after S. Giles day, or to dispatch to the vse of the pope the foresaid foure hundred marks. By reason whereof the abbat was driuen to send his proctors againe, with a new supplication to the pope at Lions, who in the end through great instance of monied friends, agreed with the abbat for two hundred marks, besides his other charges borne. And so thus that matter compounded little to the abbats profit. Paris, fol. 217.

The pope false of promise.

To recite all damages and grieuances receiued by the bishop of Rome in this realme of England, neither is any historie sufficiently able to comprehend, nor if it were, vnneth is there any that would beleeue it. Notwithstanding to those aboue declared, this one I thought to commit likewise to memorie, to the intent that they which now liue in this age may behold and wonder in themselues to see in what miserable slauerie, passing all measure, not onely the subiects, but kings also of this realme were brought to, vnder the intollerable yoke of the popes tyrannie, which in those daies neither durst any man cast off, nor yet was able to abide. As by this example insuing, with infinite others like to the same, may appeare.

Example how it is a crime of England was oppressed vnder the pope.

In the yeare of our Lord 1248. after that pope Innocent the fourth had taken holy order in the realme, that all prelats of the church were suspended from collation of any benefice, before the popes visitoures and clerks of Italie had been first promoted for: it happened vpon the same, that the abbat of Abington had a commandement from the pope, to bestow some benefice of his church in all hast, to a certaine priest of Rome, which the abbat as an obedient child vnto his father the pope was prest and readie to accomplish accordingly. But the Roman priest not contented with such as fell next hand, would take his time, to haue such as were principall and for his owne appetite, hauing a speciall eie to the benefice of the church of S. Helen in Abington, which was then esteemed worth an hundred marks by yeare, besides other baits and commodities bedong longing to the same: the collation whereof the priest required by the authoritie apostolicall to be granted vnto him.

The abbat of Abington cited to appeare before the pope.

As this past on, it chanced at last the incumbent to die and the benefice to be emptie. Which ecclesmes being knowne, the same day commeth a commandement, with great charge from the king to the abbat, to giue the benefice to one Aethelmare the kings brother by the mother side, who at the same time was possessed with so many benefices, as the number and value thereof was vnknowne. The abbat here being in great perplexitie, and not knowing what to doe, whether to gratifie his king, or to obey the pope, tooke counsell with his friends: who well aduising the matter, gaue him counsell rather to preferre the brother of his prince and patron, so that the king would vndertake to stand in his defence against the pope, rather then the Romish priest, whom alwaies he should haue lying there as a spie and watcher of him, and like a thorne euer in his eie: and so the king assuring the abbat of his vndoubted protection, and indemnitie against all harmes, the benefice was conferred forthwith to the kings brother.

The abbat of Abington cited to appeare before the pope.

The Roman priest not a little grieued therat, speedeth himself in all hast to the bishop of Rome, certifying him what was done, and partly also (as the manner is of men) making it worse then it was. Vpon whose complaint the pope ecclesmes in great anger cited vp the abbat personally to appeare before him, to answere to the crime of disobedience. The abbat trusting vpon the kings promise and protection (which neither could helpe him in that case, neither durst oppose himself against the pope) being both aged and sickly, was driuen to trauell vp to the court of Rome, in great heauinesse and bitternesse of mind. Where in conclusion after much vexation and bitter rebukes, besides great expences, he was faine to satisfie the pope after his owne will, compounding to giue him yearely fifte marks in part of making amends for his trespasse of disobedience. Ex Matt. Parisiensi, fol. 222.

The abbat of Abington ouerdriuen in litle maketh for the proue of an English bruce. ance to an Italian the popes nephue.

To this also may bee added another like fact of the pope as outragious as this, against the house of Witham. For when the benefice of Wetle in the diocesse of Elie was voide by the death of the incumbent, who was an Italian and one of the popes chamber, the donation of which benefice belonged to the priore of Witham, an other Italian which was a bastard and vnlearned, borne in the citie of Genoa, called Periggetto de Spalchana debalta, brought downe the popes letters to M. Berardo de Nympha the popes agent here in England, with strict charge and full authoritie, commanding him to se the said benefice to be conferred in any case to Periggetto. Berard though the benefice had been giuen alreadie, yet notwithstanding the possessio therof should bee displaced, and the said Periggetto preferred: yea also Non obstance that the foresaid priore himselfe had before giuen his grant to the king and realme of England, that one Italian should not succeed another in any benefice there: yet for all that the said Periggetto vpon paine of excommunication to bee placed therein, Ex Matt. Parisiensi, fol. 240.

A detestable extortion of the pope vsed against the prioresse of Witham.

And thus much hitherto of these matters, through the occasion of the east churches and the Grecians, to the intent all men that read these stories, and see the doings of this vnsetled bishop, may consider what iust cause these Grecians had to exclude themselues from his subiection, and communion. For what christian communion is to be found with him, which so contrarie to Christ & his gospell seeketh for worldly dominion, so cruelly persecuted his brethren, so giuen to warre, so greedie in getting, so iniurious in oppressing, so instatiable in his exactions, so malicious in reuenging, stirring vp wars, deposing kings, deposing emperors, playing Rex in the church of Christ, so erroneus in doctrine, so abominable abusing ecclesiastical communication, so false of promise, so corrupt in life, so void of Gods feare: and briefly, so farre from all the parts of a true euangelicall bishop? For what seemeth hee to care for the soules of men, which setteth in benefices, popes and outlandish Italians: and further, one Italian to succeed another, which neither did know the language of the flocke, nor once would abide to see their faces. And who can blame the Grecians then for differring themselues from such an oppressio: and grant against him.

Whose euil example if this realme had then followed, as they might, certes our predecessors had been rid of an infinite number of troubles, iniuries, oppressions, wars, conuentions, great trauels and charges, before the sauing of innumerable thousandes of pounds, which the said Pope hath taken and transported out of this realme of ours. But not to exceed the bounds of my historie, because my purpose is not to stand vpon declamations, nor to dilate common places, I will passe this ouer, leauing the iudgement therof to further examination of the reader. For else if I listed to prosecute this argument to farre as matter would leade me, and truth peraduenture would require me to say, I durst not onely say, but could well proue the pope and court of Rome to be the onely fountaine and principall cause, I say not of much misery here in England, but of all the publike calamities and notorious mischefs which haue happened these many yeares though all these worldes parts of christendome, and especially of all the lamentable ruine of the church, which not onely we, but the Grecians also this day doe suffer by the Turks and Saracens. As whosoeuer shall considereth by reading of histories the course of times, and wherein withall the doings and acts passed by the said bishop of Rome, together with the blind leading of his doctrine, shall see good cause not onely to thinke, but also to witnesse the same. Onely one narration touching this argument, and yet not transgressing the office of my historie, I minde (the Lord willing) to set before the readers eies, which happened euen about this present time of this king Henries reigne, in the yeare of our Lord 1244.

The pope and court of Rome to be the only fountaine and principall cause of much misery here in England, and elsewhere.

In the which yeare it chanced, that Lewis the French king, fonne to queene Blanch, fell very sore sicke, lying in a swound or in a trance for certaine daies, in such sort as few thought he would haue liued, and some said he was gone alreadie. Among others, there was with him his mother, who sorrowing bitterly for her sonne, and giuen somewhat as commonly the manor of women is to superstition, went and brought forth a piece of the holy crosse, with the croiser and the speare, which piece of the holy crosse Baldwinus emperor of Constantinople whom the Grecians had deposed a little before for holding with the bishop of Rome) had sold vnto the French king for a great sum of money, and blessed him with the same, also laid the croisure and the speare to his bodie, making a vow withall in the person of her son, that if the Lord would grant him with health and release him of that infirmitie, he should bee crossed or marked with the crosse, to visit his sepulchre, and there solemnely to render thankes in the land which hee had sanctified with his blood. This as the rest with the bishop of Paris, & others there present more plainly, behold the king which was supposed of some to be dead, began with a sigh to plucke to his armes and legs, and so stretching himselfe, began to speake, giuing thankes to God, who from an high had visited him and called him from the danger of death. Which as the kings mother with others there take to be a great miracle wrought by the vertue of the holy crosse: so the king amending more and more, as soone as hee was well recouered, receiued solemnly the badge of the crosse, vowing for a fearfull sacrifice vnto God, that he, if the counsell of his realme would suffer him, would in his owne person visit the holy land: forgetting withall the rule of true christianitie, where Christ teacheth by otherwise in the gospell saying: That neither in this mount, nor in Samaria, nor at Ierusalem the Lord will be worshipped, but seeketh true worshippers, which shall worship him in truth and veritie, &c. After this was great preparance and much ado in France toward the iourney forth to the holy land. For after the king first began to be crossed, the most part of the nobles of France, with diuers archbishops and bishops, with earles, and barons, and gentlemen to a mightie number, receiued also the crosse vpon their shoures. Amongst whom was the earle Attrebatensis the kings brother, the duke of Burgundy, the duke of Brabant, the countesse of Flanders with her two sons, the earle of Britaine with his sonne, the earle of Sarcestre, earle of Swession, earle of S. Paul, earle of Vandosme, earle of Eureux, with many notable persons more. Neither lacked here whatsoeuer the pope could do, to set forward this holy businesse, in sending his legats and friers into France, to stir the people to follow the king and to contribute to his iourney. Whereupon was granted by the king to gather of the vniuersall church of France by the popes authoritie the tenth part of all their goods for three yeares space together, vpon this condition, that the king likewise would grant to the pope the twentith part, for so many yeres after to be gathered of the said church of France. Which was agreed. An. 1246. Ex Mat. Parisiensi, fol. 204. b.

{Anno 1247}

Shortly after this, in the yeere of our Lord one thousand two hundred fortie & seuen, followed a parliament in France, where the king with his nobles being present, there was declared how the king of Tartarians or Turks, hearing of the voyage of the French king, writeth a letter to him, requiring that he will become his subiect. In the which parliament the time was prefixed for taking their iourney, which should be after the feast of saint Iohn Baptist next yere ensuing. At to the whole church, what strength it gaue to the Saracens and Tartarians, how it impaired christian concord, and weakened all christian lands, not onely the host of the French king did find thereby after, but christendome euen to this day may and doth feele and rue. Neither can it scapes be found any greater cause which first made the Turks so strong, to get so much ground ouer christendome as they haue, then the prelates vnworthy king of this pope in deposing and excommunicating this worthy the emperor. For as there was neuer emperor of long time, which more victorious preuailed in building and keeping vnder these enemies of Christ, or which haue done more against them, then the said Frederike if he might haue been suffered: so after the deposing and excommunicating of him, when the French king neither would abide at home, as hee was counselled, neither was yet able, without the helpe of others, to withstand the force and multitude of the said Saracens and Tartarians being now ioyned together, neither yet could the emperor be suffered by the pope to rescue the king: it followed thereof, that the good king being taken prisoner, and all his armie destroyed, the Turks thereupon got such a hand, and such a courage against the christians, that euer since they haue burst in further vpon vs, and now haue preuailed so far, as neuer the power of the pope nor of all christendome is able to driue them out, as hereafter by sequell of storie is further to be declared.

In the meane time, to returne where before we left, when the French king comming thus vnto the pope at Lions, to intreate for the emperor: could find no fauor, hee take his leaue and with great heauinesse departed, setting forward on his iourney into Spartilia, and so failed to the ile of Cyprus, where he remained all that winter, so that falling into penurie and lacke of victuals, he sent fame to send to the Venetians and other their friends for helpe of prouision. The Venetians gently sent vnto him fiue great ships laden with corne, wine, and other victuals requisite, besides the reliefe of other lands more. But especially Frederike the emperor, vnderstanding of their want, so furnished the French campe with all plentie of necessaries, that it had abundance. Whereupon the French king moued with the kindnesse of the emperor, wrote his especiall letters to the pope in the emperors behalfe; but the hard heart of the pope would not relent. Blanchia the kings mother in France, hearing what the emperor had done to his sonne, sent him most heartie thanks, with presents and rewards manifold: Matt. Paris. fol. 226.

In this meane time about the beginning of October, the Frenchmen got Damiata, being the principall fort or hold of the Saracens in all Egypt, in the yere one thousand two hundred fortie and nine. After the winning of Damiata, the prince and people of the Saracens being affonied at the losse thereof, offered to the christians great ground and possessions more then euer belonged to them before, so that they might haue Damiata to them restored againe. But the pride of the earle of Artois the kings brother would in no case accept the offers of the Saracens, but requireth both Damiata and Alexandria, the chiefe metropolitan citie of all Egypt to bee deliuered vnto them. The Saracens seeing the pride and greedinesse of the Frenchmen, in no case would abide it: which turned afterwards to the great detriment of our christians, as in the end it prooued: Ex Mat. Parisiensi, fol. 229.

The next yeare insuing, which was 1250, about Ashwednesday, the Frenchmen issuing out of their tents by the citie of Damiata, fell vpon the Saracens which besieged them, and so after a great number of the enemies slaine, with bickarie and skirmishes, returned to their tents againe. Now within the citie of Damiata was the queene with her ladies, the popes legat, and bishops, with a garrison of horsemen and footmen for the defence of the citie strongly appointed. The next day, the Frenchmen supposing to haue the like hand of the Saracens, as they had the day before, gaue a fresh assault vpon them; but in that conflict the Saracens had so strongly appointed themselues, that the Frenchmen lost ten times more then they got the day before, and so after a great slaughter of their men, retired vnto their tents againe. Whereupon the Saracens began to take great hearts and courage against our men stopping all the passages round about the citie of Damiata, that no victuals could passe vnto them. In like maner the Soldan also gathering all the gallies about Alexandria and all the land of Egypt, so inclosed the seas, that no intercourse should be to them by water.

The emperor offereth to put in the French king and king of England to be his sureties, & to bring them out of captiuitie.

The Frenchmen againe beseiged by the Soldan.

At length after long talke and consultation between them on both sides, the Soldan aduised them betimes to resigne vnto him the citie of Damiata, with the furniture which they found therein, and they should haue all the countrie about Ierusalem, with all the captiues of the christians friendly restored vnto them. Wherewith the christians (said he) ought to be contented, and to seeke no further, but onely to haue the land of Ierusalem; which being granted to them, they should not incroch into their lands and kingdomes, whereto they had no right. This forme of peace, as it liked well the meaner sort of the poore souldiers and diuers others of the said counsell and nobilitie: so the proud earle of Artois the kings brother, in no case would assent thereto, but still required the citie of Alexandria to be yeelded vnto them. Which the Egyptians by no meanes would agree vnto.

The earle of Artois and the popes legat are against the peace offered.

From that time the French armie being compassed by sea and by land, began euery day more and more to bee distressed for lacke of victuals and famine, being driuen to that miserie, that they were faine to eate their owne horses in the Lent time, which they had serued them vnto other vses. Neither could any christian, nor Frederike being deposed by the pope, be able to send them any succo. Furthermore, the more miserie the christians were in, the more fiercely did the Saracens prease vpon them on euery side, detecting their forward wilfulnesse. Insomuch that diuers of the christian souldiers not able to abide the affliction, plainlie confessed themselues as they could, out of the campe to the Saracens, who were gladly receiued and relieued, and some suffered still to keepe their faith, some marrying wiues amongst them, and for hope of honor did apostatize to their lawe, and so brought no little harme to the christians. The Soldan being perfectly instructed by these fugitiues of all things belonging to the kings armie, sent him word in derision, asking where were all his mattocks, forkes, and rakes, his sithes, plowes, and harrowes, which he brought ouer with him, or why he did not occupie them, but let them lie by him to rust and canker. All this and much more the king with his French men were faine to take well in worth. It happened shortly after, that this Soldan died, being poysoned of his owne seruants, which was to the christians a more heaping of their miseries. For albeit the said Soldan had been a cruell tyrant to the christians, yet was he hated of his owne people, whereby his strength was the lesse: after whom succeeded an other much more cruell. Who as he was better loued, so he became much stronger by a generall confederacie of all the Saracens which were in the east parts, ioyning now together. So that when the christians desired now to haue the same of peace before proffered, he precisely denied them. And so the French host, which at first began to bee feared, by their pride and ouermuch greedinesse, grew more and more in contempt amongst their enemies: and now was vtterly despised.

The Soldan died an vnwise followeth.

The christians thus seeing all things to go backward with them, and how the infidell Saracens daily do preuaile, began to murmur against God, and some also which were well stirred before, to stagger in their religion, calling out these words of infidelitie: How is this (said they) that the Lord hath left vs, in whose cause we fight? How often within the time of remembrance haue we been confounded by these Saracens and infidels, who with sheading of our blood haue inioyed great spoiles and victories? First the citie of Damiata, which we christians had gotten dearely with effusion of so much christian blood, afterward was we were constrained for nought to resigne vp again. After that, the armie of the templaries, fighting for the holy temple against the Saracens, came to Antioch, was vanquished, and the standerbearer slaine in the fields. Againe, within these few yeers, our Frenchmen fighting in the maner against the Saracens at the citie of Gazera, were put to the worse, and many afterward out of captiuitie ransomed, by Richard duke of Creeter, brother to the king of England, Henrie the third. Then came in the Asoninozins sent by the Soldan of Babylon, which by a wile inuaded the christians in the citie of Ierusalem, where almost all the christian armie being in the holy land were destroyed. And now here a new christian king together with the whole nobilitie, is like to bee in danger, vtterly to bee ouerthrowne. And how is it, that the Lord thus standeth against vs, and fighteth with them? Hath he more regard of them, then of vs, &c. Matthaeus Parisiensis fol. 231. Such murmuring words of an vnfaithfull faith many there began to call out, as taking displeasure for the sufferings: but not considering on the other side what idolaters rings: but not considering on the other side what idolaters they were, how vnpure and bloody was amongst them, what cruelties and murther they had shewed at home in persecuting the poore Albingenses, what superstition they first brought out with them, with what idolatrie they proceeded, putting their trust in masses, in the popes indulgences, in worshipping of images, and praying to saints. And what helpe then could they look for at good hand, which had images in their temples, to fight against them which had none? Or what maruell, if the Lord of hosts went not with their armie committing such idolatrie euery day in their pauilions to their sacramentall bread and wine as they did, and fighting with the strength of their owne merits, and not onely by the power of the faith in Christ, which is onely the victorie that ouercommeth the world? 1 Iohn 5. Finally, hauing in their campe the legate of him whom the Lord taketh to be his enemie: as by example of Frederike the emperor may be well perceiued, who after hee was accursed by pope Gregorie a little before, comming the same time in warre against Saracens in Palestina, Gods blessing wrought so mightilie with him, that without any bloudshed he recouered

Causes why the Lord did not prosper the christians fighting against the Saracens.

Ierusalem

The occasion of the French kings power went to wracke, but also such a fire of mischiefe was kindled against christendome, as yet to this day cannot bee quenched. For after this ouerthrow of the French king and his armie, the christians of Antioch and of other christian regions thereabounts, being vtterly discouraged, gaue ouer their holds and cities. Whereupon the Saracens, and after them the Turkes got such an hand ouer christendome, as to this day we all haue great cause to rue and lament. Besides this, where diuers christians were crolled to goe ouer and helpe the French king, the pope for money dispensed with them to tarrie still at home.

But as I said, the greatest cause was, that the emperor which could haue done most, was deposed by the popes tyrannie, whereby all those churches in Asia were left desolate. As touching the which emperor Frederike, because wee haue diuers and sundrie times made mention of him before, and for that his storie is strange, his acts wonderous, and his conflicts tragicall, which he sustained against foure or fiue popes one after another, I thought (not out of place) in a whole narration to set forth the same, for the reader to consider, what is to bee iudged of this cathedrall see of Rome, which had wrought such abominable mischiefe in the world, as in the sequell of the story following faithfullie translated out of Latine into English is to be seene.

The occasion of the French kings power.

The whole tragicall historie of Frederike the second
emperor, translated out of the Latine booke of Nich. Cisnerus.

FRederike the second, came ant of the ancient house of the Weblins or Gibellins; which Gibellins came of the most famous stocke of the French kings and emperors.

Other house Frederike came of.

He had Frederike Barbarossa to his grandfather, whose sonne Henricus the sixth was emperor: after him, who of Constantia, the daughter (or as some write the neece) of Roger the first, king of Sicilie, begat this Frederike the second.

What father and mother.

This Constantia was fiftie yeares of age before she was conceiued with him: whom the emperor Henrie the sixth to auoide all doubt and surmise that of his conception and childing might be thought, and to the perill of the empire insue: caused his regall tent to be pitched abrode in place where euery man might resort. And when by time of his queene trauell approched, Constantia in presence of diuers ladies and matrons, and other gentlewomen of the empire, a great number) was brought a bed and deliuered of this Frederike, the seuenth day before the kalends of Januarie, in the yeare of Christs incarnation 1193, who by inheritance was king of Naples, Apulia, Calabria and Sicilia.

The time and manner of his birth.

Henricus his father shortly after hee was borne, obteined of the princes electors, that by their oth vnto him giuen, they would chuse his sonne Frederike for their emperor: after his decease, and so did, and immediately called him Cesar, being yet but in his cradle.

What patrons he had.

This Henrie when hee died (which was shortly after the birth of Frederike) committed the protection of him to Constantia his wife, to Philip his brother chiefe gouernor of Ituruia, and to the bishop of Rome, then Innocentius the third.

Constantia, not long after the death of Henry her husband being sickly and growing into age, and thereby not so well able to gouerne the troubles and broiles of the empire, resigned, and willed by her testament the safety both of his sonne Frederike, and also of his dominions to the protection and gouernement of Innocent the third, thinking thereby safely to haue prouided.

This pope Innocent, as some as hee had the protection of the yong emperor and his segniories, became in stead of a patron and protector to him and his dominions both an enemie and conspirator. The examples are many. One is, hee persuaded Sibyll the late wife of Tancredus (whom Henrie put from the kingdome of Sicilie, to recouer the same againe, and that shee should thereunto require Philip the French kings aide. Whereupon one Walther us being of a noble house of the cries of Brenne, which in the prouince of Barreneccis had great liuing: and marrying with Aceria the eldest daughter of Tancredus once king of Sicilia (as is said) now by the inticgation, counsell, and aid of the French king with the pope (well hoping to recouer the kingdom) entred and inuaded with great power Campania, and Apulia. At which time also, the same worthie protector Innocentius the third, sent his legats with letters of excommunication against all those that would not admit and take the said Walthcrus for their king.

The conspirators of pope Innocent against Frederike during himselfe.

The first conspiracie.

Another was, that where the princes electors and other nobles as before is said, had promised by their oth to Henricus, that they would make Frederike his sonne emperor: after his decease (whom the pope saw to put their indeuor thereunto to bring it to passe) absolued them all from the oth which they had taken and giuen for the election of Frederike the emperor, as one not content he should obtaine the same. And further, hee raised slanders and defamations against Philip, whom the electors had chosen to gouerne the empire during the minoritie of Frederike his nephue. Hee wrote his epistle (which is yet extant) to the duke Warthold of Zaringia to bee emperour. Who for, that he gaue place to Philip, hee went about to procure that Otho the son of Henry Leo should be made emperor, and that the princes and lords electors of Germanie should crowne him forthwith after the maner of Aquisgrane. He depined all such bishops as he knew to fauour Philip as emperor, in the defence of his nephues right. But Philip whose cause was better, his skill in martiall affaires greater, and in power and strength mightier, after diuers and great conflicts, the marueilous disturbance & ballation of the whole empire, by Gods helpe put the other to the worse. All which calamities and mischiefs Conradus Lichtenaus at that time liuing, in his annales most pitifullie complaineth of, and accuseth the bishop of Rome and his abbercats to be the chiefe authors and deuisers of this great and lamentable mischiefe, as such that for to make themselues rich by the spoile thereof, sought by all meanes and deuised the same.

The second conspiracie.

Not long after, a peace was concluded betweene Philip and Otho, and Philip reconciled againe to the pope, who within a while after betweene Otho and him was murthered in his chamber and slaine. And then was Otho againe brought to the imperiall seate, and new elected for emperor, with the counsell and consent of this Innocent the third, and so continued vntill that a great variance and discord chanced to arise betweene the said Otho and the pope. Whereupon Innocentius sought by all meanes, how against him likewise hee might worke mischiefe and bring him vnto his end. The occasion of this sudden change and alteration my author maketh no mention of, but that Otho (now being of great power) inuaded and dispoyled these dominions of Frederike, as Flaminia, Piscenum, Umbria, Petruria, but chiefly Campania, and Apulia, for that those properly appertained to the inheritance of Frederike.

The fifth conspiracie.

Philip slaine.

Marriage betweene Otho and the pope.

Thus you see, how first by the counsell and consent of pope Innocentius and by his instigation, besides his secret conspiracies, this good Frederike and his dominions were hurt and indamaged. Then againe though his default that damage he suffered by Otho, who by him and his meanes was made so strong as he was: notwithstanding the great trust he was put in for the protection both of Frederike and his dominions.

At this time Frederike was come vnto the age of twentie yeares, who in his youth by the prouision of Constantia his mother, was so well instructed in letters, and in other arts and vertues so indued, that at these yeares there appeared and did shine in him excellent gifts both of wisdome and knowledge.

What learning and knowledge he was of.

He was excellently well seene in the Latine and Greeke tongues, although at that time learning began to decay, and barbarousnesse to increase. He had also the Germane tongue, the Italian tongue, and the Saracen tongue. Hee daily exercised and put in practise those vertues which nature had planted in him, as pietie, wisedome, iustice, and fortitude: in so much that well he might be compared and accounted among the worthiest and most renowned emperors his predecessors.

What vertue he was indued with.

Frederike suspected for his grandfathers sake.

Fazellus (the historician of Sicilia in this time) writeth, that Fredericus was againe after this had in great honor and estimation with Innocentius; but yet notwithstanding he had no sure confidence in him, for that he had the suspected name of Frederike his grandfather often in remembrance, and for that occasion was much desirous to haue him far from Italie.

When Frederike had gathered his power, he purposed to set vpon Otho his enemie; of which thing Otho hearing (as he was painefull in trauell) came out of Italie with his armie into Germanie, thinking to haue met Frederike at the riuer of Rhene, and to haue stopped his passage; but hee was deceiued of his expectation, and Fredericus was crowned, as the maner of Aquisgrane is, before he came. And after that Frederike in the winter time toke his iourney to Frankford, and after many meetings in Norico had, and that Otho was dead, he set the empire in a stay, and the whole countrie of Germanie hee in a maner appeased. And then with all his nobles and princes hee returned to Rome, and of Honorius the third was with great solemnitie consecrated and called Augustus. Which Honorius succeded Innocentius the third in the papall see: and was a great helpe to Frederike (although hee loued him not) in this behalfe, to reuenge himselfe vpon Otho.

The coronation of Frederike.

The death of Otho.

The consecration of Frederike the emperor.

After the consecration of Frederike the second, hee gaue many great and liberall gifts, as well vnto the bishop of Rome himselfe, as also vnto the court of Rome besides. Also he gaue and assured by his charter to the church of Rome, the duke dome of Fundanum. For by the vnlatiable couetousnesse of the Romish bishops, this wicked vse and custome grew, that vnlesse the emperors elect and crowned would giue vnto them such like great and large gifts, they could not obtaine of them their consecration or confirmation, which for that intent they denied.

The liberall munificence of Frederike to the pope and church of Rome

Furthermore, Frederike the emperor willing to shew himselfe more bountifull and liberall vnto the church, neither yet to refraine any priuiledge that might benefit the same, gaue and admitted those constitutions which the pope himselfe would desire, and are yet extant in their ciuill law: by which his doings he deliuered to their hands a sword (as it were) to cut his Thomas Fazellus declareth the detestation or defiance to happen betweene them somewhat otherwise. There were (saith he) amongst those which were found traitors to the emperor, certaine bishops, which flying to the pope, requested his aid: whereupon the pope sent his legats to the emperor, and requested him that he would admit and receiue to fauor those bishops which he had banished and put from their offices, and that he would not intermeddle with any ecclesiasticall charge wherewith he had not to doe: and said further, that the correction and punishment of such matters pertained to the bishop of Rome, and not to him. And moreour, that the ouersight of those churches in that kingdome, from the which he had expelled the bishops, pertained and belonged vnto him.

Whereunto Frederike thus replieth; That forsomuch as now foure hundred yeres and more (from the time of Carolus Magnus) all emperors and kings in their dominions might lawfully commit to apt and fit men for the same, such ecclesiasticall functions and charges as within their territories and kingdoms fell: that he looked to haue the like priuiledge and authority also, that other his predecessors before him had. And further said, that he had the same and like authority in the empire that his father Henry and Frederike his grandfather, and other his predecessors before them had; neither had he so deserued at the handes of the church of Rome, either of Honorius himselfe, to be depriued of those priuiledges which his ancestors before him had and kept. And further, Frederike being chafed and moued with these demands of the pope, breaketh forth and saith; How long will the bishop of Rome abuse my patience? When will his couetous heart be satisfied? Whereunto will his ambitious desire grow? With such like words more, repeating certaine iniuries and conspiracies, both against him and his dominions, as well by Honorius as Innocentius the third his predecessor, as also other like iniuries of popes to his ancestors practised. What man (saith he) is able to suffer and beare this so incredible boldnesse and intollerable insolencie of so proud a bishop? Go, saith he (vnto the legats) and tell Honorius that I will hazard both the seignory of my empire, and crowne of my kingdome, rather then I will suffer him thus to diminish the authority of our maiestie. The strife betweene the pope and the emperor for the election and deposition of bishops.

Now because much disquietnesse and controuersie hath arisen (for the most part through all christendome in euery kingdome and realme seuerally) for and about the authority of chusing and deposing of bishops (as may be seene by the example of this Frederike) which the pope only and arrogantly challengeth to himselfe, and not to appertaine to another: I

synodall decree of Lateran touching the iurisdiction of the emperor for the election of the bishop of Rome and other ecclesiasticall persons. And because it came that those epistles were written of Leo in the 16 and 17 canon, and the same dilinatian, which also, as in the 9 can. and 10 distinction, made a profession, that at the same imperiall precepts should be kept in all ages. This Leo when he was reproued of reason and other causes, pleaded his cause before Iudoulcus the second emperor of Rome, and some of Lotharius above recited: 2 question, 7 can. 40.

Lest after this, as time grew on, the bishops of Rome nothing reknowledging their ambitious desires, Otho the first emperor of that name, deposed and put from the sea of Rome that most filthy and wicked bishop Iohn the thirteenth, both for diuers and sundry wicked and hainous acts by him committed, as also for his great treasons and conspiracies against his royall person, and did substitute in his place Leo the fifth, who calling a synod at Lateran in the same temple and place where the other before was kept, did promulgat a new constitution with consent of the senat and people of Rome concerning the election, ceasing iurisdiction in the foresaid election: which in the 23 canon is contained and 63 distinction. Wherby the old right and power of the emperors in the election of the bishop of Rome and other ecclesiasticall prelates, was against with more sharper and briefer sanction confirmed and ratified. Against Iohn the eighteenth whom Crescentius the Romane usurping the imperiall crowne, had made bishop by the consent of the people of Rome and the ecclesiasticall order, hauing his nose cut off, and his eies put out, and so thrust out of the capitoll, was against Otho the third ecclaimed and made bishop. But when as not notwithstanding, the bishops of Rome would not alter their old accustomed disposition, but with all their industry indeuored to abrogat that iurisdiction of the emperor ouer the bishop of Rome (as people loth to bee vnder subiection) Henry the third (then Leo the ninth being constituted bishop) did once again ratifie the same, and caused the bishop (which erroled himselfe before all his fellow bishops) to stoope and giue place to Good ordinis.

So after the death of Henry the third emperor, Nicolas the second, although in his decree (which in the 1 canon, and 23 distinction is recited) he gaue the primacy for the election of the bishop of Rome by the means of the priests & people of Rome, vnto the cardinals: yet he would after that, that the prerogatiue therein should be reserued to Henry the fourth the young emperor, from whom the empire afterwards was so, a time wrested and taken.

But now after this, when Hildebrand, which was called Gregory the seuenth, was pope, this prerogatiue of the emperors in their election, which before in the creation of Alexander the bishop was neglected and broken; the bishops of Rome not only did seeke to diminish the authority thereof, but also to extinct and quite vnto the same. For he not only aspired to that dignity without the consent and appointment of the emperor, but also made restraint, that no emperor, king duke, marques, earle, or any ciuil magistrat, should assigne and appoint to any, any ecclesiasticall function and charge; neither that any of his prelates so hardy, should take them at any of their hands: as quest. 6. can. 7, 9 and 10 may be seene.

But notwithstanding, after that this horrible monster Hildebrand was preferred and thrust out of the papall seat, and Clement the third put in his stead, Henry against challenged his imperiall prerogatiue of election. But yet, when the bishops which succeeded after this Hildebrand, and led by his example, began to derogat from the imperiall prerogatiue of election: and Henry on the other side by all the meanes possible, sought to defend and maintaine the same, by the subtill fraud and malicious policie of the bishops, which set the sonne against the father, and found meanes to steale from him the hearts of his nobles and subiects, and to set them all against him, and especially the princes of Germany, was deposed and disappointed of his purpose.

And although Henry the fifth (comming to Rome) brought Paschalis the second to that point, that he both in publike confession, and in writing sealed, and also by oth confirmed, refused against to the emperors of Rome the prerogatiue of election, and of giuing ecclesiasticall dignities: yet notwithstanding, after that Henry the emperor was gone from Rome, Paschalis the pope, greatly repenting and scrolding that he had done, in allowing and confirming the priuiledges of emperors through feare, touching the giuing and disposing of ecclesiasticall functions, excommunicated the emperor, and in a synodall councell at Lateran ordained and decreed, that he should be had and accounted a wicked enemy, that would take any ecclesiasticall function or preferment at the hands of a ciuill magistrat: vnto which decree were made these decrees, qu. 16, chap. 7, 13, 14, 15 and 16.

Therefore when these decrees touching the designation of bishops, in spight and contempt of the emperor, were practised and put in vre: and vnto that now especially by the means and procurement of the bishops iniustice and ciuill wars began to rise in the empire: the imperiall iurisdiction in this matter was not only weakned and much debilitat, but also in manner vtterly broken and lost. For when Henry the fifth emperor was sharply of Lotharius and his vallals the bishops beset, and laid vnto by the prouocation of the pope, and was mightily by the bishops that take his part on the other side, requested and intreated (in hope of publike peace & tranquillity) that hee would condescend and sone what yeld to the popes demands: he at length (the more was the pitie) that he might be reconciled and haue peace with pope Calixtus the second, in the citie of Tungis, departed from and with that his prerogatiue of iurisdiction of giuing ecclesiasticall preferments to the pope and his prelats, now more then three hundred yeres (from the time of Carolus Magnus) in the hands of the emperors of Rome, and until this time with great fortitude and princely courage conserued and kept: which resignation turned to no small detriment both of the church of Christ, and christian commonwealth.

Then first, and neuer before, obtained the bishop of Rome, and quietly inioied that prerogatiue of election and bestowing of benefices, which he so long before with such great policies (now secretly, now openly, and now with force) had sought for. And with what sufficient and good authority Gratianus will proue, that before this time the same authority was giuen to the elect of Rome for the election of the pope without the consent of the emperor, he sheweth, as in the 29 and 30 canon, and what good stuffe he putteth in the latter, and how subtilly that papisticall flatterer or pontifical parasit hath forged the same, both Carolus Molinaeus sufficiently in diuers places hath noted, and by the obseruation of times may of a meane historiographer that hath read the French and German histories, soone be espied and discerned. For first, fiue bishops one after another succeeded this Gregory the fourth, vpon whom the 29 canon is intituled or fathered; that is, Sergius the second, Iohn the eighth, Adrian the second, Iohn the ninth, and Adrian the third. Which Adrian by force, wresting the authority of the election from the people, was made pope, when as Gregory (specially to be noted) would not take on him the papacie, before that the emperor had consented to his election. After this, Stolanus compareth Raphael Volaterranus with the 30 canon, which against is suspected. For when Eugenius was bishop, who was the successor of this Paschalis, with whom Ludouicus Pius is said to haue made a league or paction, the same Ludouicus Pius with his sonne Lotharius, together with the helpe of the king of Romans, at Rome made lawes both to all his subiects in the empire, and also to the Romans themselues: speaking nothing of the renewing of the decree made by Lotharius. Then again, how could Leo the fourth write to Lotharius and Ludouicus emperors, that counterfet or forged decree beginning with Constitutio, &c? when in the same mention is made of Henricus Aucupes, and Otho the first, which reigned more then foure score yeres after them, and Leo the fourth bishop of Rome.

Now with what face dare this fond fellow Gratianus make Otho the first to be author of the 31 can. when as Otho deprined the same Iohn the twelfth of the papacie: and not only take nothing from the imperiall iurisdiction concerning the election, nor from the citie of Rome, nor any other bishops subiect to the Romane empire, but added somewhat more thereto, as was said before. And yet notwithstanding, so shamelesse and senselesse was this Gratian, that he durst obtrude and lay before the reader so manifest fraud and euident legerdemaine (fained and made of his owne braines in the compiling of this decree) being so necessary, as he thought for the dominion and primacie of the Romane bishops, in the stead of good and true lawes, neither fearing that the same might be after his deuise reprehended, neither to his great shame and discredit to him attributed. Where also by the way is to be noted, that as this graceless Gratianus to please these holy fathers, and to erect their kingdome, would giue so impudent an attempt to the blinding and deceiuing of all posterities, inserting so grounded truths and holy decrees such vnsound vnsaund detestable doctrine, what may be thought of the rabble of the rest of writers in those dates, what attempts shope of gaine might cause them to worke: by whom and such like is to be feared the falsifying of diuers other good works now extant, in those perilous times written.

Thus when the bishops had once wrested this authority out of the emperors hands, they then so fortified and armed themselues and their dominion, that although afterwards Frederik the first, grandfather vnto this good emperor Frederike the second, as also Ludouicus Pius, and Henricus Lucelburgensis (as men most studious and carefull for the dignities of the empire, brainned louers and maintainers of the vtility of the commonweale, and most desirous of the preseruation and prosperity of the church) did all their indeuors with singular wisdome and strength, as much as in them lay, to recouer against from the bishop of Rome this the authority of the imperiall iurisdiction lost, most cruelly and wickedly abusing the same, to the destruction both of the empire, binding of the commonwealth, and vtter subuersion of the church of God: yet could they not be able to bring the same to passe in those darke and shadowed times of peruerse doctrine and errors of the people; and most miserable seruitude of ciuill magistrates.

The same and like priuiledge also in the election of their bishops and prelats, and disposing of ecclesiasticall offices, as the emperors of Rome had, euery prince and king in their seuerall dominions had the like. For by the decree of the councell of Toletan, which in the 25 canon and 63. distinction is mentioned: the authorite of creating and chusing bishops and prelats in Spaine, was in the power of the king of Spaine. The like also by the histories of Clodoueus, Carolus Magnus, Ludouicus nonus, Philippus Augustus, Philippus Pulcher, Carolus quintus, Carolus sextus, Carolus septimus, kings of France, is apparant and well knowne: that all these kings had the chiefe charge and gouernment of the French church, and not the bishops of Rome.

And by our English histories also, as you heard, it is manifest, that the authority of chusing ecclesiasticall ministers and bishops, was alwaies in the kings of England, till the raigne of king Henry the first, who by the labor and procurement of Anselmus archbishop of Canturbury, was deprined and put from the same.

Also the princes of Germany and electors of the emperor, till the time of Henry the fifth, had all (euery prince seuerally in his owne diction and prouince) the same iurisdiction and prerogatiue, to giue and dispose ecclesiasticall functions to their prelats at their pleasure, and after that it appertained to the people and prelates together. And how in the raigne of Frederike, the prelats gat into themselues alone this immunitie, Iohannes Auentinus in his seuenth booke of the annales of the Boiores doth describe.

Also it is probable that the kings of Sicilia had the same faculty in giuing and disposing their ecclesiasticall promotions and charge of churches: Anderas de Isernia ad 1. Neap. no. 12. And that when Frederike defended him against the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, therefore (as Facelius saith) he was excommunicated of Honorius: but that Platina & Blondus alleage other causes wherefore he was excommunicat of Honorius, I am not ignorant: howbeit, he that will compare their writings with others that write more indifferently by twixt Honorius and him, shall easily find, that they more sought the fame of the Romish bishops, then to write a verity. But now again to the history of Frederike.

Nicolaus Cimerus affirmeth, that whilest Frederike the emperor was in Sicilia, his wife Constantia died at Catania or Catana. In the meane time the christians which with a great name, sailed into Egypt, and tooke the citie Heliopolis, commonly called Dalmatia, and long ago named Pelusium, being in good hope to haue driuen Sultanus the Soldan out of Egypt, had a great and marueilous ouerthrow by the ouerflowing of the water of the flood Nilus (which then ouerflowed into their campe) and were faine to accord an vnprofitable truce with the Soldan for certaine yeares, and to deliuer the citie again, and so departing out of Egypt, were faine to come to Acon and Tyrus, to the no small detriment and dishonor of the christian army. Whereupon king Iohn surnamed Beremus (being king of Hierusalem) arriued in Italie, and praied aid of the emperor against his enemies, in whom he had great hope to finde remedy of the euils and calamities before declared, and from thence he went to Rome to the pope, delaring vnto him the great discomfit and ouerthrow past, as also the present perill and calamity that they were in, desiring of him his assistence in. By whose mouth (as Cimerus saith) the emperor was reconciled again to the pope, and made friends together, to whom also king Iohn gaue Ioell his daughter in marriage, which came of the daughter of Conradus king of Hierusalem, and marques of Montferrat, with whom he had to dowrie, the inheritance of the kingdome of Hierusalem, as right heire thereunto by her mother. By whom also he after obtained the kingdome of Naples and Sicill, and promised that with as much expedient speed as he might, he would prepare a power for the recouery againe of Hierusalem, and be there himselfe in proper person: which thing to do, for that vpon diuers occasions he deferred (whereof some thinke one, some another) Honorius, vnto whom he was lately reconciled, purposed to haue made against him some great and secret attempt, had he not been by death betoy prouented, vpon whom were made these verses.

O pater Honori, multorum nate dolori,
Est tibi decori viuere, vade mori.

After whom succeded Gregorius the ninth, as great an enemy to Frederike, as was Honorius, which Gregory came of the race whom the emperor (as before we heard) condemned of treason which they wrought against him. This Gregory was scarsly setled in his papacie, when that he threatned him greatly with excommunication, vnlesse hee would prepare himselfe into Asia according to his promise, as we heard before, to king Iohn: and what the cause was why the pope so hastened the iourny of Frederike into Asia, you shall heare hereafter: In effect, he could not well bring that to passe which in his mischieuous mind he had deuised, vnlesse the emperor were further from him. Notwithstanding, Frederike it should seeme smelling a rat, or misthrusting some what (as well he might) alleaged diuers causes and lets, as lately and truly he did to Honorius.

Fagellus a Sicilian writer saith, that the speciall cause of the emperors stay was, for the oth of truce and peace during certaine yeres, which was made betweene the Saracens and christians as you heard, which time was not yet expired.

The same also Fagellus writeth thus of king Iohn of Hierusalem, that when his daughter was brought to Rome, the emperor and the pope were reconciled together. And being called by to Rome to celebrat the marriage, pope Gregory (as the manner of those popish prelats is) offered his right foote vnto the emperor to kisse. But the emperor not stoping so low, fearfully with his lip touched the vpper part of his knee, and would not kisse his foot; which thing the pope tooke in very euill part, and was therewith marueilously offended. But for that no opportunity at that time serued to reuenge his conceiued grudge and old malice, he dissembled the same as he might for that time, thinking to recompence it at the full, as time would serue, and fall out therefore.

After this, it fortuned that the emperor hearing how the christians were oppressed by the Soldan in Syria, and that from Asiatica there came a great power against the christian princes: he made the more haste, and was with more desire incouraged to set forward his iourny into Asia. Wherefore assembling the nobility of the empire at Rauenna & Cremona, he gaue in commandement to Henry his sonne (whom not long before he caused to be created Cesar) that he should perswade the nobles and princes of the empire, that they all would bee ready to put to their helping hands, in furthering this his iourny and enterprise. This writeth Facelius: but Blondus, and others affirme that these things were done in the time of Honorius. But howsoeuer the matter is, this thing is manifest; that Frederike to satisfie the popes desire, which never would lin, but by all means sought to prouoke him forward, gaue him at length his promise, that by a certaine time he would prepare an army, and fight himselfe against those, which kept from him the citie of Hierusalem (which thing he also confirmed himselfe in his epistles, and also how he desired, and obtained of the princes and nobility of the empire, their aid thereunto: as also to haue appointed a conuenient time when they should bee at Brundusium.

In the meane season, he with all his power and indeuour made speedy and hasty preparation for the warres: he rigged and manned a puissant nauy, he had the yelded men and best souldiers that were in euery country, and made warlike prouision and furniture, for euery thing that to such a voiage and expedition appertained. Neither was the matter slacked, but at the time appointed great bands assembled and mustred both of German souldiers and others, and vnder their captaines appointed, set forth and marched to Brundusium. Their generals were, Thuringus and Sigebertus, and Angustinus the bishop: where they long time lying, and attending the emperors coming, hauing by infirmity and sickues, great pestilence and many diseases molested them, by reason of the great heat and intemperance of that country: and many a souldier there lost his life, among whom also died Thuringus, one of their generals. The emperor, when he had somewhat recouered his health, with all his nauy lanched out and set forward to Brundusium. And when he came to the straits of Peloponnesus and Creta, being landed lying in the sea, and there for lacke of conuenient wind was stated, suddenly the emperor (his diseases growing vpon him again) fell sicke; & sending before all or the most part of his bands and ships into Palestina, promising them (most assuredly) to come after and follow them as soone as he might recouer and get neuer so little health: he himselfe with a few ships returned and came to Brundusium, and from thence, for want of health, went into Apulia.

When tidings hereof came to the popes eare, he sent out his thundring curses and new excommunications against the emperor. The causes wherefore, I finde noted and mentioned by his owne letters, that is; how that when hee had robbed and taken from Brundusius, prince of Thuring, his horses, his mares, and other rich furniture of his house at the time of his death, he sailed into Italy: not for the intent to make war against the Turke, but to conuay his prap that he had stollen and taken away from Brundusius, who neglecting his oth and promise which he had made, and fainting himselfe to be sicke, came home againe. And that by his default also Damiatta was lost, and the hoil of the christians sore affaied. Facelius besides these causes spoken of before, doth write that the pope alleaged these also: that he defiled a certaine damsell, which was in the queenes nurserp; and that he slew his wife when he had whipped her in the prison, for declaring the mischieuous act to her father king Iohn. But all the writers, and also Blondus himselfe doth declare, that this Ioell died after the publication of the prescript and excommunication: wherefore, the pope could not without great shame alleage the cause vpon the death of Ioell, for vndoubtedly the truth is, that the of her sonne Conradus died in childbed. Then Frederike, to refell and auoid the foresaid slanders, sendeth the Bishop of Brundis and other legats to Rome, whom the pope would not suffer to come to his presence, neither yet to the councels of the cardinals to make his purgation. Wherefore the emperor to purge himselfe of the crimes which the pope did so falsly accuse him of, both to all christian

The effect of the emperors letters.

He protesteth and declareth vniuersally, that hee had always great care for the christian common wealth, and that he had determined euen frō his youth to fight against the Turke and Saracens. And for that occasion he made a promise to the princes electors of Aquisgrane, how that he would take the war vpon him. Afterward he renewed his promise to Rome when he was consecrated of Honorius; then when he maried the daughter of the king of Hierusalem, which was an heire of the same. And for because that kingdome might be defended & kept from the iniuries of the enemies, and that he fauored it much as hee did his own, he prepared an huge nauy, and gathered togither a strong army of men, neither did he neglect any thing that belonged to the furniture of the war. But when the time was come, and his band was gathered together, his sickines would not suffer him to be there. And afterward when he had recouered the same, and came to Wundusium, and from thence without any disturbance went forthwith to the sea: he fell into the same sicknesse againe, by the which he was let of his purpose, which thing (saith he) he is able to proue by sufficient testimony.

The emperors purgation.

How the pope also both lay the losing of Damiata and other things which prospered notwel with him, vniustly to his charge, when as he had made great prouision for the same iourny, both of souldiers & other necessary things. But he wil vnderstand these things more plainly, among other epistles of Petrus de Vineis, written in the name of Frederike, let him reade these especially which begin thus: In admirationem, & inclitiam, & attentionem, & Lenate oculos. And truly euen as Frederikes the emperor declareth in his letters concerning this matter, all the old writers of Germany doe accord and agree in the same.

Matth. Parisiensis also briefly collecteth the effect of another letter which he wrote to the king of England, complaining vnto him of the excommunication of the pope against him, whose words are these: And amongst other catholike princes (saith he) he also wrote his letters vnto the king of England, embulled with gold: Declaring in the same that the bishop of Rome so flamed with the fire of auarice and manifest concupiscence, that not being content with the goods of the church, which were innumerable, but also that he shamed not to bring princes, kings, and emperors to be subiects and contributors to him, and to displeasure them and put them from their kingly dignities. And that the king of England himselfe had good experiment thereof, whose father (that is to say, King John) they so long held excommunicat, till they had brought both him and his dominions vnder seruitude, and to pay vnto him tribute. Also that many haue experience of the same by the earle of Tholouse and diuers other princes, which so long held their persons and lands in interdict, till they might bring them into like seruitude. I pretermit (saith he) the simonicke sinkes and sorts of exactions (the like whereof was neuer yet heard) which daily are vsed amongst the ecclesiasticall persons, besides their manifest vsury, yet so cloked and coloured to the simple sort, that therewithall they infect the whole world. They be sugred and embalmed simonists, the infatiable horse-leaches or bloud-suckers, saying: that the church of Rome is our mother and nurse, whereas it is indeed the most polling court in the vniuersall world, the roote & right mother of all mischiefe, vsing and exercising no motherly doings or deedes, but bringing forth the right exercises of a wicked stepdame, making sufficient proofe thereof by her manifest fruits to all the world apparant. Let the barons of England consider whether this bee true or not, whom pope Innocent by his bulls with one consent incouraged to rise and rebell against their soueraigne lord & prince king Iohn your father, as an obstinat enemy to the church of Rome. But after that, the king (farre out of square) remembring himselfe, had crouched vnto him and obliged both himselfe and kingdome to the church of Rome, more liker a woman then a man; and that the wife barons whom the pope had first maintained and stirred vp, without all shame either of the world, or feare of God had done the same, sought how hee might with gaping mouth deuour and consume the sweet fat from them, whom he had miserably to death betraied and dishe-rited, as the maner of the Roman bishops is. By whose greedy auarice it came to passe, that England the prince of prouinces was brought vnder miserable subiection and tribute. Behold the maners and conditions of our Roman bishops, behold the snares wherewith these prelats doe seeke to intangle men withall, to wipe their noses of their mony, to make their children bondmen, to disquiet such as seeke to liue in peace, being clothed with sheeps clothing, when in deed they be but rauening wolues, sending their legats hither and thither to excommunicat and to suspend: as hauing power to punish whom they list, not sowing the seed, that is the word of God, to sructifie, but that they may bribe and poll mens persons, and reape that which they neuer did sow. Thus commeth it to passe, that they spoile the holy churches and houses of God, which should be the refuge for the poore, and the mansion houses of Saints, which our deuour and simple parents to that purpose builded and ordained to the refection of poore men and pilgrims, and to the sustentation of such as were well disposed and religious. But these degenerat varlets, whom only letters haue made both mad and malipert, do striue and gape to be both kings and emperors.

Matth. Parisiensis also briefly collecteth the effect of another letter which he wrote to the king of England, complaining vnto him of the excommunication of the pope against him, whose words are these: And amongst other catholike princes (saith he) he also wrote his letters vnto the king of England, embulled with gold: Declaring in the same that the bishop of Rome so flamed with the fire of auarice and manifest concupiscence, that not being content with the goods of the church, which were innumerable, but also that he shamed not to bring princes, kings, and emperors to be subiects and contributors to him, and to displeasure them and put them from their kingly dignities. And that the king of England himselfe had good experiment thereof, whose father (that is to say, King Iohn) they so long held excommunicat, till they had brought both him and his dominions vnder seruitude, and to pay vnto him tribute. Also that many haue experience of the same by the earle of Tholouse and diuers other princes, which so long held their persons and lands in interdict, till they might bring them into like seruitude. I pretermit (saith he) the simonicke sinkes and sorts of exactions (the like whereof was neuer yet heard) which daily are vsed amongst the ecclesiasticall persons, besides their manifest vsury, yet so cloked and coloured to the simple sort, that therewithall they infect the whole world. They be sugred and embalmed simonists, the infatiable horse-leaches or bloud-suckers, saying: that the church of Rome is our mother and nurse, whereas it is indeed the most polling court in the vniuersall world, the roote & right mother of all mischiefe, vsing and exercising no motherly doings or deedes, but bringing forth the right exercises of a wicked stepdame, making sufficient proofe thereof by her manifest fruits to all the world apparant. Let the barons of England consider whether this bee true or not, whom pope Innocent by his bulls with one consent incouraged to rise and rebell against their soueraigne lord & prince king Iohn your father, as an obstinat enemy to the church of Rome. But after that, the king (farre out of square) remembring himselfe, had crouched vnto him and obliged both himselfe and kingdome to the church of Rome, more liker a woman then a man; and that the wife barons whom the pope had first maintained and stirred vp, without all shame either of the world, or feare of God had done the same, sought how hee might with gaping mouth deuour and consume the sweet fat from them, whom he had miserably to death betraied and dishe-rited, as the maner of the Roman bishops is. By whose greedy auarice it came to passe, that England the prince of prouinces was brought vnder miserable subiection and tribute. Behold the maners and conditions of our Roman bishops, behold the snares wherewith these prelats doe seeke to intangle men withall, to wipe their noses of their mony, to make their children bondmen, to disquiet such as seeke to liue in peace, being clothed with sheeps clothing, when in deed they be but rauening wolues, sending their legats hither and thither to excommunicat and to suspend: as hauing power to punish whom they list, not sowing the seed, that is the word of God, to sructifie, but that they may bribe and poll mens persons, and reape that which they neuer did sow. Thus commeth it to passe, that they spoile the holy churches and houses of God, which should be the refuge for the poore, and the mansion houses of Saints, which our deuour and simple parents to that purpose builded and ordained to the refection of poore men and pilgrims, and to the sustentation of such as were well disposed and religious. But these degenerat varlets, whom only letters haue made both mad and malipert, do striue and gape to be both kings and emperors.

Who be the resembling wolues in sheeps clothing.

The treasure of the church belongeth to the poore.

Doubtlesse the primitiue church was builded and laid in pouerty and simplicitie of life, and then as a fruitfull mother begat she those her holy children, whom the catalogue of Saints now naked mention of: and verily no other foundation can be laid of any other church, then that which is laid by Iesus Christ. But this church as it swimmeth and walloweth in all superfluitie of riches, and doth build and raise the frame in all superfluous wealth and glory, so is it to be feared lest the wals thereof in time fall to decay, and when the wals be downe, vtter ruine and subuersion follow after. Against vs he knoweth that is the searcher of al hearts, how furiously these catholikes rage and go to worke; Saying, and therefore excommunicating me, that I will not take vpon me the iourny I haue promised beyond the seas, whereas inexitable and most vrgent causes and perils as well to the church of God, as also to the empire, besides the annoiance of mine infirmity and sicknesse, do detaine me at home, and stay the same, but specially the insolencie of the rebellious Sicilians. For why? neither doe we thinke it safetie to our empire, nor expedient to the christian state, that we should now take our iourny into Asia, leauing behind vs at home such intestine and ciuill wars, no more then for a good surgeon to lay a healing plaister to a grieuous wound new stricken with the sword and made. In conclusion, also to this he addeth, admonishing all the princes of the world, that they would beware and take heed (by their auaricious iniquity) of like perill and danger to themselues, because that as the proue be is: Ie behoueth him to looke about that feeth his neighbours house on fire.

Christes church was builded in humility: the popes churches all superfluitie: Ergo, the popes church is not Christs church.

Thus much out of Parisiensis, pag. 69.

The emperor crowned king of Hierusalem.

But now, that Fredericus the emperor might in very deed stop the slanders of the cruell pope, which did perfist and go forward still in his excommunication against him; and that he might declare in the whole world, how that the last yeere he had fulfilled not his iourny by his owne voluntary will, but by necessity, when he had deuised and prepared all things meete for the war, and that he had gathered together and leuied a great army of men, he departed from thence to Wundusium, committing the gouernment of his kingdome to Reinaldus the sonne of duke Spoletus, and to Anselmus a baron of Iustingerfla, and came by sea to Cyprus with his host.

Another iourny of the emperor to Hierusalem.

From Cyprus, the emperour with his whole nauy sailed into Ioppa, which citie he fortified, for that the passages by land were stopped and kept of the enemies: and by sea might be not passe no trauell, by meanes of the extreame weather and tempest: wherefore it came to passe, that within short space they lacked victuals, and were sore afflicted with famin. Then fell they to prayer, and made their humble supplication to God, with whose teares his wrath being appeased, the great tempest and long continued foule weather ceased, whereby (the seas being now calme) they had both victuals great plenty, and all other necessary things for their need brought vnto them, whereby immediatly it came to passe, that both the emperor and his army, as also the inhabitants of Ioppa were greatly refreshed and animated: and on the other side, their enemies being disappointed of their purpose, were greatly discouraged; insomuch that the king of Egypt, who with great power (accompanied with Scarapho his brother, prince of Gaza, & the prince of Damascus their nephew, with many other dukes and nobles) hauing incampt themselues within one daies iourny of Ioppa, thinking to haue beseged the same, were contented vpon the commming of the emperors heralds vnto them, to intreat of a peace. Whereupon, ambassadors were sent vnto them with the emperors demands, right profitable to the christian common weale. The Saracens immediatly perceiuing vpon the same) granted thereunto; so that a peace for ten yeeres was concluded, and was confirmed by solemne oth on the behalfe of both princes, according to their seuerall vsages and manner: the forme and condition of which peace hereafter collected are these.

The emperor oppressed by famin, and by praier miraculously relieued.

A conclusion of a profitable peace during ten yeeres betweene the Turkes and the christians.

First, that Frederike the emperor should be crowned and annointed king of Ierusalem, according to the manner of the kings of Ierusalem before him.

The Articles of the peace agreed vpon.

Secondly, that all the lands and possessions which were sometime betwixt Ierusalem & Ptolomaida, and the greatest part of Palestina, and cities of Tyrus and Sidon, which were in Syria, and all other territories which Baldwinus the fourth at any time had and did occupy there, should bee deliuered vnto him, only certaine castels reserued.

Thirdly, that he might fortifie and build what fortresses and castels castles cities and townes hee thought good, in all Syria and Palestina.

Fourthly, that all the prisoners which were in the Saracens hands, should be ransomed freely and sent home: and againe, that the Saracens might haue leaue without armor to come into the temple where the Lords sepulcher is, to pray, and that they should hold and keepe still Chatarum, and the kings mount.

The letters of Frederike to the princes and pope of his faction.

Frederike now, for that he thought the conclusion of this peace to be so necessary, as also profitable for all christians, and had also gotten as much thereby as if the wars had continued he should: he sent his legats with letters into the west, to all christian kings, princes and potentates, as also to the bishop of Rome, declaring vnto them the circumstance and successe of his iourny and wars, as partly ye haue heard; requiring them that they also would praise and giue God thanks for his good successe and profitable peace concluded. And desireth the pope, that for so much as he had now accomplished his promise, neither that there was any cause now wherefore hee should be with him displeased, that he might be reconciled and obtaine his fauor.

The emperor crowned king of Hierusalem.

In the meane season the emperor with all his army marcheth to Hierusalem: where, vpon Easter day in the yeere one thousand two hundred twenty and nine, he was with great triumph and comfort of all his nobles, and also the magistrates of that kingdome (onely the patriarch of Cyprus the kings legat, and Oliuer the maister or captaine of the temple with his company excepted) solemnely and with great applause crowned king.

After this, he reedifieth the citie and wals thereof, which by the Saracens were beaten downe and battered. After that, he furnisheth it with munition, he builded vp the churches and temples that were ruinous, he fortifieth Nazareth mund Ioppen with strong garrisons, victuals, and all other things necessary.

Now see and behold I pray you, whilest Frederike was thus occupied in the kingdome of Hierusalem, what practises the pope had in Italy: not I warrant you any whit at all carefull in the affaires of the christian commonwealth, but studying and labouring what mischiefe and spight he might worke against the emperor, whom of set purpose he had so occupied (partly for hate, and partly to inrich himselfe) in Asia and Hierusalem, so far out of Italy ye may be sure. First, he caused the souldiers which the emperor sent for, out of Germany to the maintenance of the holy warres, to be staied as they passed through Italy, letting them of their iourney, and take from them, and spoiled them of all such prouision as they had. And not onely this, but he sent secretly also his letters into Asia to those that were of his owne faction: that is, to the patriarch of Hierusalem, and souldiers that kept the temple and the hospitall, inticing and inciting them to rebell against the emperor: which thing Blondus himselfe, that popish parasit & historiographer, dissembleth not hereof. But that he furthermore did: dissuaded the princes of the Saracens, that they should make no league nor take any truce with Frederike, neither deliuer vp vnto him the crowne and kingdome of Hierusalem. Which letters, as they were manifest testimonies of his trechery & treason towards him, whom God had instituted and made his liege lord and soueraigne, and mightiest potentate vpon earth: so was it his will that he should come to the knowledge thereof, and that those letters should fall into his hands. And that he kept the same letters for the more credible testimony thereof, in the same his last epistle vnto the christian princes he protesteth. The copie of which letter amongst his other epistles you shall haue expressed.

The first and fiercest practises of pope Gregory the ninth.

Neither were the popes letters written to that learned and factious sect in vain: for the patriarch and his collegioners, which take their name of the temple, did mightily repugne against Frederike. They raised a tumult in Ptolomaida against him, they accused him and his legats openly of treason, and did malipertly and boldly withstand the right worthy and good order he made amongst them. But as God would, by the helpe of the inhabitants of Pisa and the Genouaises, and the Dutch souldiers, both their false accusations were refelled, & also their seditious purpose and tumult repressed. And this was the cause that when at other men reioiced and were glad of the emperors coronation, they as wicked conspirators were heauy therefore, and bitterdoas of his worthy laud and fame.

The emperor withstandeth the secret treason which the pope had wrought against him at Hierusalem.

The second and manifest treason of the pope against Frederike.

The pope when he had thus conspired against Frederike, and had betrailed him to the publike enemy of all christian men the Turke, hee could not dissemble this his mischeiuous fact, nor content himselfe therewith, but that he would deuise and practise yet another. For by reason of those slanders (which a little before I touched) of the death and slaughter of his wife Iola, hee incited Iohn Brennus his father in law to make warre against him, who caused the subiects of his empire to withdraw from him their allegiance, as also the inhabitants of Picenum, & inhabitants of Lombardy. And thus ioining themselues together, created further aid of the French king, j whereby they made a great power. That done, they diuided their host in two armies, inuading with the one the empire, and with the other the proper territories and ditions belonging to the inheritance of Frederike; Iohn Brennus and Pandolph Sauellantus, leading the one (as generals) into Campania and the kingdome of Naples, and the other (with Iohn Columna cardinall his legat, and that Thomas before conuicted of treason, being his lieutenants) he sendeth into Piedmont.

Brennus, Diatpolphus, Iohannes Columna and Thomas the traitor, the popes generals and leaders of his host.

Of this treason of the pope against Frederike, both also Matthaeus Parisiensis make mention during his wars in Asia, who (saith he) purposed to haue deposed him, and to haue placed Alium quemlibet filium pacis & obedientie loco eius subrogare: That is; Any other he cared not whom (so that hee were the child of peace and obedience) in his stead. And for the more certainty thereof, the said Matthaeus Parisiensis, pag. 71. repeateth the letter which a certaine earle of Syria wrote vnto him concerning the same, which letter here vnder insueth word for word.

To the high and mighty prince Frederick by the grace of God emperor of Rome, and euer Augustus, and most puissant king of Sicilia, Thomas earle of Acran his faithfull and trustie subiect in all things, humble salutation. After your departure, most excellent prince, Gregory the bishop of Rome, and publike enemie to your magnificence, gathering togither a great power and host of men by Iohannes Brennus, late king of Hierusalem, and other stout captaines, whom he hath made generals of the same his host, as a forren enemy inuading your dominions and possessions of your highnesse subiects against the law of christianity, hath purposed and determined to vanquish and subdue you with the materiall or temporall sword, whom he cannot master and ouercome with the spirituall sword, hee saith. For the foresaid Iohn Brennus gathering out of France and other prouinces neere adioining, a great army; giueth vnto them of the treasure he hath gotten (by what meanes togither I cannot tell) great wages, in hope to recouer and get from you the empire. And furthermore, the same Iohn and others (the captaines of the sea apostolicall, inuading your land) burne and destroy all as they goe, driuing away and taking for their booties all that they can come by, as well cattell as other things, and such as they take prisoners, they constraine by afflicting them with greeuous punishments to ransome themselues for great summes of mony: neither spare they man, woman, nor child, but take and keepe your townes and castels, hauing no regard that you be in the seruice of Iesus Christ. And further, if any make mention of your maiesty vnto him, he saith, there is none other emperor but himselfe. Your friends and subiects, most excellent prince, much maruell heereupon; yea and also the clergy themselues of the empire doe maruell with what conscience, or vpon what confideration the bishop of Rome can doe the same, making such bloudy wars and slaughter vpon christian men; especially seeing that Christ commanded Peter, when he strooke with the materiall sword, to put vp the same into the scabbard, saying; All that strike with the sword, shall perish with the sword. Or else by what law he daily can excommunicat such pirats, burners of mens houses, and robbers, when he is the patron & maintainer of such himselfe: hereat they greatly muse and maruell. Wherefore most mighty and renowned emperor, I beseech your highnesse to consider your owne safety, for that the said John Brennus hath laid and fortified all the ports and hauens with no small company of men and souldiers: that if (not knowing thereof) your grace should arriue in any of them, the same garrisons of his should apprehend and take you as a prisoner; which thing to chance God forefend.

What meaning the pope had to send Frederike to fight against the Turke.

Thus whilest the host of this hellish enemy the pope was incamped in the dominions of Frederike, he receiued the letters which Frederike by his legats sent into Europa, as you heard, wherein he vnderstood the good successe he had in Asia: the which not only tooke no delectation at all therein, but was also in a vehement perturbation therewith. Whereby manifestly it may appeare, what was the cause and meaning of the pope, that he was so solicitous and vrgent to haue Frederike the emperor make a voyage into Asia. Doubtlesse euen the same that Pelias had, when by his instigation he procured Iason with all the chosen youth and flower of Grecia to saile into Colchus, to fetch away the golden fleece: and that by the opportunity of his absence he might vse, or rather abuse his power and tyranny; and that Frederike might either be long affliated and molested in the Asian war, or that he might perish and lose his life therein, was that he sought, and all that he desired.

How the pope cherished and receiued the mischeuous practise of the emperor.

And when he saw, that fortune neither fauored his fetches, nor serued to his longing lust, he was as a man bereft of his wits, specially at these tidings of the prosperous successe of the emperor. He tare and threw his letters on the ground, and with all opprobrious words rebuked and reuiled the legats for the emperor their masters sake: which thing also Blondus himselfe denieth not, though he write altogither in the fauor of the pope. And to the intent that he might couer this his rage and vnbridled furie with some cloke and colour of iust deserued ire, lo, he fained himselfe therfore so much to mislike therewith, as though the emperor therein had onely refreshed his olyne private commodities, not regarding the vtilitie of the christians: for that the Saracens had licence (although without armour and weapon) weapon) to haue repaire vnto the sepulcher of Christ, and had left for them somewhat where the same an hollome or longing place: for which occasion (saith Blondus) his lord pope rebuked the emperors legats by the name of traitors: such like or the opprobrious words. Now to go to friend Blondus, by what strong arguments proue you and your lord pope, that the peace which the emperor hath concluded, to be either against the christian commonwealth, or that the emperor was a traitor? But who is it that seeth not these things either by reading of old and ancient writers, or else partly by mee that haue gathered and collected the same out of diuers monuments and histories, and plainly perceiued not the conspiracies and treasons of your good lord the pope so notable and filthy, as also his manifest shame and infamie? What shere be diuers that write how the pope commanded these legats of Frederike to be made secretly out of the way, and also how he commanded diuers souldiers returning out of Asia, to be slaine, to the end that none should heare the report of those good newes which were in Asia, nor more go thither to tell the setches he had in hand at home. But I will make report of no more then of those things which all the writers with most consent agree vpon. This is most certaine, that the pope caused this rumor to be spred of the death and taking of the emperor: vpon this consideration, that he might allure vnto him the fidelity of those cities in the kingdom of Apulea, which yet bear their allegiance vnto Frederike, of whom they thinke now hope for no longer refuge. And of that doth the emperor in his epistle intituled Leuate oculos greatly against him complaine.

Great are these iniuries of the pope against Frederike, and most wicked treasons. But herewith could not the cruell and tyrannicall mind of him be contented, nor yet his thirsted. but so far exceeded, as is scarce credible that it could: for he perswaded not onely to set variance betweene Henry (whom Frederike his father had caused to be made king of Germanie) and him, but also by his allurements caused him to become an enemie vnto him. To whom when his father had assigned the duke of Bauoria (named Ludouicus) to be his ouerseer and counseller; neither knew he amongst all the princes of Germany a man more faithfull to him in his affaires and vnity, or else more vertuous, or else more graue and apt to be in authority. Henry fearing least hee should vnderstand and know of these secret counsels, which he with his conspirators had in hand against his father, or that he should vtter the same vnto him, or that he should go about to disswade him from that he was purposed to do by authority of the court and senat of Rome, he put him out of office. And this was the first of all the practises, that together and at one instance (but in diuers and sundry places for one from another) sharpe and cruell war might be made against the emperor, to that his power being distract to the appeasing of variable contention, might be himselfe the easier oppressed of a few.

When the emperor now vnderstood that sir the pope kept in all his dominions in his absence, and that he had somewhat reformed & appeased the troubles which he secretly had wrought him in the kingdome of Hierusalem, thinking to preuent the popes purpose in that he went about, and also to confirme the friendship towards him of them whom in his absence he found his trusty subiects: he left in Asia Renaldus with his garisons, commanding all the other bands to be vnder his appointment, and with all speed came forth certaine galies to Calabria. During the time of his there being, which maladies & sicknesse there he suffered his power and name with his friends all the while preparation that he might. From thence hee went to Reriera where he taried twenty daies, to whom came the duke of Spoletanum with all his garisons, and so from thence with all his power he came into Apulia, and remoued John Brennus his father in law from the siege of Calatia, and within short time by Gods helpe recouered against all his holds and dominions there. And from thence going into Campania, he winneth Beneuentum, and as many other townes and holds as the pope had there, euen almost to Rome, and so after that, Tiburia & Picena. And now although the emperor (being moued thereunto vpon good occasion, and vpon the popes worthy desert, had gotten & recouered this so likely an entrance vpon the popes domin ons, whereby he might haue reuenged him of all the iniuries done to him: yet notwithstanding for that he preferred nothing before the christian and publike tranquility, for the loue of which he refraining his wrath so vehemently biged and kindled) sendeth vnto him his legats to intreat a peace, declaring vnto him, that if no other conceiued grudge towards him were, then that he dissembled and pretended, he promiseth that he would make to him an account voluntarily of all things that euer he had done in his life, and that he would and was contented to submit himselfe vnto the church: and also for, that this cause he willingly offered vnto him both duty and obeisance. Furthermore to the intreating of this peace and deciding of all controuersies, hee sent to the pope eight or ten of the noblest and chiefest about him that were princes and dukes of the empire: as Bartolduit the patriarch of Aquileia, and his brother Otho prince of Dalmatia and Histria, Eberhardus Iuuanensis, Sigifridus, Reginoburgensis, Sibbotus, Augustanus a worthy prelat, Leopalons of Austria and Styria, and Bernhardus, being all dukes; besides others of the nobilitie to accompany them.

But yet so great was the insolencie and pride of the stubborne pope, that by no gentlenesse or beneficence he of those princes could be brought that peere to the pacifiable concord of the church and christian commonweale. O worthy head, that challengeth all authority to himselfe in the church of Christ, and in respect of his owne willfull reuenge, setteth nothing by the health and vtility of all christendome. Then therefore, when nothing could be done in the matter, and the most part of these nobile men departed from Rome, the next yer after, (with much adoe) a peace was made and concluded betweene them, by the helpe and industry of Leopalous of Austria, Hermannus captaine of the Dutch souldiors, and the president of Spetania. The pope then absoluing the emperor: Fredericus of his excommunication, take therefore of him 120000 ounces of gold, restoring vnto him againe the titles both of his empire, and also of his kingdomes. Now considering the vncourteous dealing of the pope with Frederike the emperor herein, who can sufficiently muse and marueil at the vnshamefastnesse of Blondus, which hath the face to write, that the pope (yet notwithstanding) had dealt more gently and courteously with Frederike then was meete, or beseemed him to doe) who is it that doth not see his manifest flattery, coloured neither with reason, nor secret dissimulation? But much more truly and better writeth Cuspinianus concerning this matter, which saith, that the pope doth occupy very profitable merchandize, which for so much money selleth that he receiued freely, paying nothing therefore, if he had received it of Christ for his, as he saith he had.

And yet although the emperor Frederike concluded with the pope this unpossitable peace for himselfe, yet he performed those things that were agreed vpon faithfully and diligently. But the pope, which thought it but a trifle to breake his promise, would not stand to the conditions of that peace he made. For by the way, to passe ouer other things, neither had he restored as he promised, the customes in the land of Sicili, neither yet the city Castellana, which by force before the peace concluded betweene them did occupy and inioy. And that doth both Frederike in his epistles testifie, and also Fazellus in his eight booke writing of the affaires of Sicilia. Yet notwithstanding, Frederike, for the quietnes and vtility of the commonwealth, purposed with himselfe to beare and suffer these small iniuries, and further, studied in all that he might, as well by liberall gifts as otherwise, to haue the pope to be to him a truely friend: as when the Romanes and others of the ecclesiastical number made war against the pope for certaine possessions which he kept of theirs, he comming to him at Neat, and as one that tendered the vnitie of the church, and thinking to help the pope at his earnest requeft in these matters, sent his legats vnto them, willing them to lay downe their armor: which against the pope they bare. And when that would not serue, at the popes further request and desire, he leuied an army against them at his owne charge, and brake them from the siege of Viterbium; with other such like assures tokens of amitie and friendship he shewed him. Who notwithstanding, so soone as the emperor was departed with a small company which he take with him into Sicilia, leaning with him the greater and most part of his army for the maintenance of his wars, concluded a peace with the Romans (vnknowing to the emperor) whom he by pursued to trouble and labor therein with great instance: affirming that without his will and commandement, the emperor had expelled them, and driuen them out of the territories of Viterbium. And hereof doth Frederike also himselfe make mention in his second and third epistle, where he complainth of the iniuries of the pope towards him.

Therefore greater commendation had Blondus deserued, if he had written of these treacheries of the pope, then that forgetting himselfe (as vnto liers often it chanceth) in that he writeth both contrary to himselfe in the effect of this matter, and contrary to the verity of Fredericus his story: which saith, that the Romans were incited to these new tumults by his inciting and setting on. As though simple men of vnderstanding could not both by the offering of his sonne in hostage, by the great preparation of the wars, and by the euent specially of the thing it selfe, gather the contrary. But to no impudent will Blondus needs shew himselfe.

Whilest that these things were done in Italy and Sicilia, great rebellions were moued in Germany against the emperor: by Henricus Celar and Frederike of Austria, his sons being the chiefe authors hereof. For Henry being disappointed and taken off from his lords pope, and other conspiratores by reason of the peace betweene his father and him (as ye heard) began now to make open challenge to the empire. And for that cause, he (as before is said) put from him Ludouicus, whom he knew to be vnto the emperor his father so loving & assured friend; who as willingly perceiuing and smelling what mischief he went about) forsooke his court, and came to Bolonia, who had not there remained a yere, but was as he walked abroade at a certaine time stabbed in with a dagger of one Belhemius and presently died, his seruants being not far from him; of whose death diuers diuerstly write. Notwithstanding the sequell doth shew them to write trulieft, that affirme the said stroker to be suborned suborned by Henrie Celar: who comming vnto him in the habit of a messenger, deliuered vnto him certaine letters which he fained to be sent from the emperour. And whilest Ludouicus was in reading the same, he stroke him in with a dagger and gaue him his mortal wound: and with speed fled vpon the same. After whose death succeeded in that bukedome his sonne Otho, who when solemnly according to the manor of the Boiores he them together as rebels, thinking to exclude themselues from the subiection both of him and the empire; and that such rebels as both had restrained the souldiers which the emperor sent for, when he was in Asia, and diuers others also (which for necessary causes he had called to him) they had so suckefully dealt with and abused, he (as they had deserued) should rather desire to be punished and reformed, then to maintaine them (vnder colour of peace) being so wicked and manifeft euill doers. And touching that he demaundeth of him, that he should commit and defer to great a cause, wherein the wealth and safetie of the empire consisteth, to his arbitrement, by him to be determined, without either allgnment of any time taken, or abiding thereunto a nie condition or exception for not doing the same, neither the diminishing and impairing the dignitie and regalitie of his empire considered, he could not but maruell: seeing that neither it appertained to his calling and faculties, nor to the benefit or commoditie of the empire. To this effect also writeth Frederike in his last epistle vnto the pope, the effect whereof amongst other especiall things may reade.

Albin in the same his letters he sheweth, that when the emperour at a certaine time had been with the pope, at his going away, he requested that when he came againe, he would come into Italie, but with his household band and familie; for that if he should come as before he did accustome with his armie, he should terrifie them ouermuch; amongst whom (saith he) you may assure your selfe to be in great iealosie, and find all things in euill quiet; when quite contrarie (as the emperour for a certaintie had tried) he had there all things readie and prepared for his destruction: so that when he pretended vnto him great friendship, he was busieft in conspiring his death. The certaine time when the pope had this exercise in hand against the emperour I cannot search out, neither may it be in his epistles vndated easily found out; but that of the certaintie thereof no man need to doubt, I haue alleged vnto the emperours epistle, where he maketh mention of the same.

The emperour then, as he had determined, prosecuteth his purpose and marcheth into Italie, where he brought vnder his subiection those cities that against him rebelled, as Mantua, Verona, Terminum, Patauium, and others. And then he afterward set vpon the great hoft of the Mediolanenses, the Brixians, the Placentines, and other confederates, to whom the popes great Magus Longomontanus had ioyned himselfe, of whom he take 1000 prisoners, and also their generall, being the chiefe magistrat in the citie of Mediolanum, and Petrus Tenopolus the dukes sonne of Venice, and sleu diuers captaines more, and take all their ensignes. And in this battel, specially at the recouering of Marchie and Terrisiana, he shed the friendly aid of Aristolinus.

The pope vnto somewhat dismaid at his ouerthow of his confederats and mates (though not much) began yet somewhat to feare the emperour, and whereas before, that which he did he wrought secretly and by others, now he goeth to worke with might and maine to subdue and deprive the emperour. And although the emperour saw and perceiued that inward hate and mortall malice he bare towards him, not only by that he sa perctly knew by his conspiratos against him, but also that on euery side he heard, and from all parts was brought him certaine word how greatly he laboured against him, as with opprobrious words, naughtie reports and flanders, to the intent to pull from him the hearts and fidelitie of his subiects, and make those that were his friends his enemies, neither that he meant at any time to take by and cease from such euil and wicked practises: yet notwithstanding for that there should be no default in him found for the breach of the league and peace betweene them a little before concluded, he sendeth foure legats to the bishop of Rome, which should answere vnto and refute those crimin ous objections which he laid vnto him, as also to make him priuie vnto his purpose, and what he meant to do, thereby to declare his innocencie towards him (in such causes) and simplicitie.

The bishop when he vnderstood these ambaffadors to be not farre off from Rome, and knew the cause of their comming, hee thought with himselfe, that in hearing the excuse and reasonable answere of the emperour, perhaps might be prouoked to desist from his purpose, & to degener at from others of his predecessors, refuseth to speake with them, and at the day appointed pronounceth the sentence of proscription against him, depriuing him of all his dignities, honours, titles, prerogatiues, kingdomes, and whole empire. And that hee had no occasion hereunto, as well Pandulphus and Colonucius, as the letters of the emperour himselfe do both right well declare. For it may appeare, hee dedicated as it were himselfe to his vtter ruine and destruction, when he did sollicitat against Frederi cus, Iacobus Tenopolus the Venetian duke. his sonne, was in good hope he should allure vnto him, he being in so troublous a time such a counsetter and aider vnto him, that as Blondus writeth in a certaine epistle gratulatory, he called him lord of the fourth part of Croatia and Dalmatia, and lord of halfe of the Romane empire. And calling vnto him the Venetian and Genowetian legats, made a peace betwixt them, which for certaine causes about their sea coasts were at variance: and couenanted with them vpon this condition, that at their publike charges, they should rig and man fiue and thirtie gallies, which should spoile and burne all alongst the sea coasts of the kingdomes and dominions of Frederike.

The pope vnderhandedly and hirelly like a thiefe stirreth the Italian gallies to spoile the coasts of the emperour.

But the pope when he saw the gods will and fidelitie which the duke of Venice bare vnto the emperour, and saw also what aid the emperour had of him, neither that he was like to winne him to his purpose: then had he recourse againe to his old craftie practises and subtilties. And further deuised to put forth an edict at Rome to the vniuersall church and people, the beginning whereof is. Ascendit de mari bellua bestia: wherein he declareth the causes wherefore he curseth and giueth the emperour to the diuell of hell, and hath reiect him from all his princelie dignitie. Vse in the same accurseth him of so manie and so huge a heape of mischiefes, as to nominat them my heart detesteth. And besides that he restraineth his souereigne lord and emperour of the appellation which euerie priuat man by law may haue. He slandereth him of treason, periurie, cruelti, sacrilege, killing of his kind, and all impietie; he accuseth him so an heretike, a schismatike and a miscreant: and to be briefe, what reuerend chiefe soeuer the pope can inuise, with that both he charge him and burthen him. All this doth he, saith the pope, that when he hath taught our holinesse and all the ecclesiasticall estate to beggerie, he might scoffe at, and deride the religion of Christ, which as a miscreant he detesteth. And now to that the pope had a great and speciall trust in Albertus Bohaunse of the noble house called Equestri (as erafte an apostle as the best) as one whom he saw redie to leane to his lust: to him the pope deuised two other mandats in seuerall letters sealed, in which he commanded all bishops, prelats, and other of the clergie, that they should solemnely recite the same in their churches in stead of their sermon, that by his decree he had excommunicated Frederike out of the fellowship of christian men, put him from the procuration or gouernment of the empire, and that had released al his subiects of their allegiance and fidelity towards him. And furthermore, charged them, and all other christian men vnder paine of cursing and damnation, that neither they succour the emperour, nor yet so much as wish him well. Thus he, being the popes speciall and trustie seruiter, made to his hand, caused a most horrible confusion and chaos of publike quietnesse, as shall after appeare.

Albertus Behaunse the popes one hand.

The pope threatneth to curse all those that wish well to the emperour.

Amongst all other noblemen of Germanie at that time towardes the emperour, was Otho the gouernor of Rhenus and duke of Bauaria, both most scrutreable, and also a prince of great honor, riches and estimation. This prince, both with faire promises and also rewards he enticed from him: for that being made by him to beleeue, that Ludouicus his father, of whom we spake before, was by the emperour murthered and slaine. And the same Otho againe caused three other princes and dukes to reuolt from the emperor to the pope, which were neighbours and nere adiourning vnto him, as Vincenclaus, and Belus, princes of the Hungarians, and Henrie duke of Polonia. To whom came also Fredericus Austriacus his sonne: who because he was proscript or outlawed of his father, and had his dukedome wasted and burnt, as you heard, was faine to come vnto the pope. These gathering a councell (when they had thought to haue translated the empire vnto the kings sonne of Denmarke, desired to haue the popes legats to be sent from him, to the effect of that election.

The emperour being at Patauium when these newes were brought vnto him, what the pope had done at Rome. Therefore he commanded Peter de Vineis his secretarie (vpon Easter day) to make a narration to the people of his great and liberall munificence to the bishops and church of Rome, and against of the iniquitie of them toward him in recompence thereof: of his vnsecurenesse also in that whereof he had accused him, and of the vnsemelinesse of such an act or deed, of the right vse of the ecclesiasticall censure, and of the errors and abuse of the church of Rome. By which oration of his, he to remoued the cloud from many mens hearts of blind superstition, and the corrected opinion of holinesse of the church of Rome, and bishops of the same, and also of their disused power and subtill persuasion, that both they plainly saw and perceiued the vices and filthinesse of the church of Rome and bishops of that see, as also their fraudulent deceits and flagitious doings, most lamentably lamenting and complaining of the same. Albertus maketh mention of certaine verses which were sent and written betweene the bishop of Rome and the emperour. The which verses in the latter end of this present historie of Frederike you shall find.

The emperour moreouer both by his letters and legats, giueth intelligence vnto all christian kings, to the princes of his owne empire, to the colledge of cardinals, and people of Rome; as well of the fained crimes wherewith he was charged, as also of the cruelnie of the bishop of Rome against him. The copie of which letter or epistle followeth here vnder inserted.

¶ The emperour to the prelats of the world.

The emperours letter to all princes to bidde the pope and restraine him of his will.

IN the beginning and creation of the world, the inestimable foreknowledge and prouidence of God (who asketh counsell of none) created in the firmament of heauen two lights (a greater and a lesse) the greater he created to gouerne the day, and the lesse to gouerne the night: which two so do their proper offices and duties in the Zodiake, that although oftentimes the one be in an oblique respect vnto the other, yet the one is not enemie to the other: but rather doth the superiour communicat his light with the inferiour. Euen so, the same eternall foreknowledge hath appointed vpon the earth two regiments, that is, to wit, priesthood and kinglie power: the one for knowledge and wisdome, the other for defence; that man, which is made of two parts (ouer wanton and dissolute) might haue two raines to gouerne and bridle him withall, that peace thereby and loue might dwell vpon the face of the earth. But alas, the bishop of Rome sitting in the chaire of pernerse doctrine or pestilence, that phariseannointed with the oile of iniquitie aboue the rest of his conforts in this our time, which for his abominable pride is fallen from heauen; indeuoureth with his power to destroy and vndo all, and thinketh (I beleeue) to stellifie againe himselfe there from whence he fell. His purpose is to darken and to shadow the light of our vnspotted life, whilst that (altering the veritie into lies) the papall letters flush with all vntruths, are sent into sundrie parts of the world: of his owne corrupt humor, and vpon no reasonable cause, blemishing the sinceritie of our religion. The lord pope hath compared vs vnto the beast rising out of the sea, full of names of blasphemie, and spotted like a leopard. But we say, that he is that monstrous beast of whom it is said, and of whom we thus reade: And there shall come another red horse out of the sea, and he that shall sit on him, shall take peace away out of the earth: let them therefore that dwell vpon the earth destroy him. For since the time of his promotion, he hath not bin the father of mercie, but of discord: a diligent steward of desolation in stead of consolation, and hath inticed all the world to commit offence. And to take the words in right sense and interpretation, he is that great dragon that hath deceiued the whole world: he is that antichrist, of whom hee hath called vs the forerunner: he is that other Balaam hired for money to curse vs: the prince of darkenesse, which hath abused the prophets. This is the angell leaping out of the sea, hauing his phials filled with bitternesse, that he may both hurt the sea and the land: the counterfeit vicar of Christ, that feteth forth his owne imaginations. He saith that we do not rightlie beleeue in the christian faith, and that the world is deceiued with three maner of deceiuers, which to name God forbid we should open our mouth, seeing that openly we confesse only Iesus Christ our Lord and Sauiour to be the euerlasting sonne of God, coequall with his Father and the holy Ghost, begotten before all worlds, and in processe of time sent downe vpon the earth for the saluation of mankind: conceiued, not by the seed of man, but by the holy Ghost: which was borne of the glorious virgin Marie, and after that suffered and died as touching the flesh: and by his Godhead the third day, he raised from death that other nature which he assumed in the wombe of his mother. But we haue learned, that the bodie of Mahomet hangeth in the aire, and his soule is buried in hell: whose workes are damnable and contrarie to the law of the most high. Wee affirme also, that Moses was the faithfull seruant of God, and a true teacher of the law: and that hee talked with God in mount Sinai, vnto whom the Lord said, Rubum, &c. By whom also God wrought miracles in Aegypt, and deliuered the law written to the Israelites, and that afterwards with the elect he was called to glorie. In these and other things our enemie and ouer of our state, casting our mother the church, to accuse her sonne, hath written against vs enormous and lying slanders, and sent the same to the whole world. If he had rightly vnderstood the apostles meaning, he would not haue preferred his violent will before reason, which beareth such swaie with him: neither would hee haue sent out his mandats to the suggestion of those which call light darkenesse, and euill good: which suspect honie to be gall, for the great good of opinion they had conceiued of that hoe place, which indeed is both weake and infirme, and conuerteth all truth into falsehood, and affirmeth that to be which is not.

Man being made of this parte hath two fleetall regiments, Gods word and the materiall sword.

The pope writeth vnto his lieutenants to persecute heretikes.

Truelie my opinion (so indifferent on euerie side) ought not in any case to be infringed and auerted from the faith, to such enemies of so corrupt a conscience. Wherefore wee greatly are inforced not a little to remoue, which thing also doth much disquiet vs to see: that you which be the pillers and assistants in office of righteous dealing, the senators of Peters citie, and the principal beames in Gods building, haue not qualified the perturbation of so fierce a iudge: as do the planets of heauen in their kind, which to mitigat the passing swift course of the great orb or sphere of heauen, draw a contrary way by their opposit mouings. In verie deed, our imperiall felicitie hath bin almost euen from the beginning) spurned against, and enuied at of the papall see and dignitie: as Simonides being demanded whie he had no more enemies and enuiers of his state, answered and said; Quianihil feliciter gessi: For because (saith he) I haue had no good successe in any thing that euer I tooke in hand. And so, for that we haue had prosperous successe in all our enterprises (the Lords name be blessed therefore) especially in the ouerthrow (of late) of our rebellious enemies the Lombards, to whom in their good quarrell he promised life and absolution with remission of their sins, is the cause wherefore this apostoliall bishop mourneth and lamenteth. And now, not by your counsels (I suppose) he laboureth to impugne this our felicitie, but of his owne power of binding and loosing, whereof he glorieth so much, he impugneth it. But presently where power and abilitie wanteth to redresse, there doth abuse take place. We see in him which was so mightie a king, and the worthiest prince amongst all the prouerbes, to desire and craue the restitution of Gods holy spirit, when he had polluted the dignitie of his office. But the prouerbe is, Vti indissolubilia non solemuntur, ita insolubilia non ligantur: As things indissoluble are not to be loosed, so things that cannot be bound, are not to be bound. Which thing manifestlie is proued in him. For why, the Scriptures of God do instruct men how to liue, they mortifie our souls which are immortall, and quicken the same which are dead for want of life. And doubtlesse he is able to humble and bring downe those that are vnworthie of dignitie, as much as him pleaseth, and when him pleaseth. Doubtlesse, if the bishop of Rome were a true bishop indeed, innocent, impolluted, and not associat with wicked liues and euill men, his life should declare him so to be. He would not then be an offerer of dissentious sacrifice, but a peaceable offerer of loue and charitie, and would cense, not with the incense of griefe and hatred, but with the sweet smelling incense of concord and vnitie, neither yet would alot Summum ponificium in malefficium: that is, make of a sanctified office an execrable abuse. If hee were such a bishop as he ought to bee, hee would not wrest or abuse the preaching of the word, into the fruit and gaine of his owne dissension, neither should we bee accused for such an enemie of our mother the true church, as is laid vnto her sonnes charge by such a bishop. Which true and mother church, with all reuerence we honor, and benignite embrace, so beautified and adorned with Gods most holy sacraments. Some singular parsons not withstanding, fayning themselues to be our brethren by that mother, and yet are not, but of a stumpet begot: such, I say, as are fubiect and slaues to corruptible things (putting them from amongst vs) we vtterly reiect: especially for that iniuries by them done, are not only transitorie and mundane, where with our maiestie is so molested, vexed and grieued. Wherefore we cannot so easily mitigat our mood, neither ought we in very deed so to do, and therefore are we informed the more to make the greater reuenge of them. You therfore that are men of graue and deliberat counsell, hauing the excellent gift (as from God) of wisedome and vnderstanding; refuse you that roring enemie of ours in these his proceedings, whose beginnings are so wicked and detestable, wisely comparing things past, with those to come. Otherwise, you that are leader our fubiection, as well of our empire as other our dominions, shall feele and perceiue (both of my chiefe enemie and persecutor, as also of the princes that are his fautors and adherents) what reuenge by sword Fredericus Augustus shall take vpon them, God so permitting.

The emperour vniuersallie reiecteth the pope and church of Rome.

The emperour called a parliament or councel to repulse the popes malice.

This done, he determineth a solemne parlement or councell of all the princes and other nobilitie of the empire at Aegra; whither came Conradus Cesar, Pogauntinus presul, the Sauon dukes, the lords of Wandenburg, Spitza, Thuringus, and the legats of all the nobles of Brabant to aid the emperor. But the princes of Boiemus and Palatinus being disluaded by the legats, into whom the Austrians had ingoned themselues, refused to come to the councell holden at Aegra. And being at their wits end, not knowing well what they might do, for take at last the emperour, and take part with the pope and the other conspirators. Then Fredericus Austriacus the emperours second sonne (whom he disherited as ye heard) by the aid of the Boiois and Bohemians, reconuered againe the dukedomes of Austria and Styria, putting to flight and discomfitting the emperours bands and garrisons which he had there. And although the cardinals (especially that honest man Albertus Boiemus) had allured to the pope Otho the duke of Boiozia, as ye heard, and diuers other noble men of Germanie: yet not withstanding certaine bishops in Boiozia (as Ebenhardus Iuuanensis, and Sigrefidus Seginoburgensis, being at that time the emperors chancello), Rudicenus Ratheuiensis, Conradus Frisingensis, and others) left not of yet for sooke the emperour. All which the foresaid Albertus not only did excommunicat, but also by processe sought to bring them vp to Rome before the pope, giuing commandement to their colleginers and clofterers, that they should deprive them of their offices, and chuse such others in their stead as would obey the pope. All which things the pope vnderstanding by Albertus, and of this their fidelitie to the emperour, corroborated and confirmed the same his doings, commanding them to chuse other bishops in their steads.

temeritie and also tyrannie which he vsurped against the churches of Germanie, and especially against the good emperour, that without his consent he durst be so bold as to meddle in churches committed to the emperours gouernment against the old and ancient customes, and that he had excommunicated the emperour without iust cause, that he had condemned the emperours faithfull subiects as enemies to the church for standing with their liege and soueraigne prince (which allegiance to violat, without horrible iniquitie they might not) and so had sought to disquiet them likewise in their charges and administrations, and had also in that quarrell giuen such defiance to the emperour. They accused and condemned the same Albertus also for a most impudent impostour and wicked varlet, and for a most pestiferous botch and sore of the christian common-weale: and giue him to the diuell they do, as a common enemie, as well of the church as of his owne naturall countrie; and further thinke him two; thie to haue his reward with the rest of the popes pursuants, being the most wicked inuenters and deuisers of mischiefe that were in all Germanie. This done, they make relation hereof to the emperor by their letters; and further, they aduertise all the princes of Germanie (especialie those which were of the popes faction or rebellion, and were the fauourers of Albertus) that they should take heed, and beware in any wise of his fubtill deceits and pernicious deceiuable allurements, no: that they should assist the pope for all his words against the emperour. And doubtlesse by the counsell of the high prelat or archbishop of Boiozia (whose name was Iuuanensis) and by his industrie and perswasion, Fredericus Antichristus was againe reconciled vnto the emperour his father, from whose aid and obedience after that (by no promises, threatnings, bribes, or gifts, no more so: the execrable curses of the popes olune holy mouth) he would be induced or removed. But Albertus prosecuteth still his purposed mischiefe, alluring and inciting by all means possible (and that not amongst the worst but the best) friends to the pope, and enemies to the emperour. Vnto some he gaue their tithes to fight against the emperour, to other some he gaue the glebe lands of benefices, and to other some he gaue the spoile of such colleages and monasteries as tooke part with the pope; and to some other also he gaue the colleges and monasteries themselues. And assuredly I find by Iohannes Auentinus, lib. 7. annalium Boiorum, that there were certaine of the popes olune birds, that had their ecclesiasticall tithes taken from them; and other some had the rents and reuenues of their colleges pluckt away by force to the maintenance of the popes quarrell against the emperour. Hereby was the fire of discord opened to do what they lusted (euerie man according to his rauening and detestable lust) and all things lay open vnto their greedie and insatiable desires. Who lusteth to heare more hereof, let him reade Auentinus in his booke before noted, and there shall he see what vsitation grew thereby to the whole state of Germanie, who largely intreateth of the same.

Whilst these things were thus in working in Germanie, Frederike leauing in Lombardie Aciolinus with a great part of his host (he passing with the rest by Apeninum) came to Hetruria and set the same in a stay, after that he had allaied certain insurrections there, and from thence to Pisas, where he was with great amitie and honor receiued and welcommed. This citie was always assured and faithfull to the emperours of Germanie. The pope vnderstanding of the emperours coming into Hetruria, and knowing what power the emperour had also left in Lombardie, he with a great armie besieged the citie Ferraria, that allwaies loued the emperour full well: which citie when the popes legat had assaulted sharpely the space of fiue moneths, and could not win the same; he deuised with himselfe to send for Salinguerra out of the totone, by way of a parle, promising his faith and truth to him for his safe returne. Who, by the perswasion of Hugo Rambertus, that said with-out perill he might do the same (being but by way of parle) was comming to the legat: who preuenting him in his tourney, tooke him as prisoner, contrarie to his truth and fidelitie. And thus got he Ferraria, and deliuered the keeping thereof to Azones Atensis. And that the popes legat thus falsified his truth, and circumuented the captaine and old man Salinguerra, the same is confessed of the popes friendly historiographer, to be but a stratagem of warlike policie. But to returne againe. About the same time also the Venetian nauie, at the mount Garganum chased twelue gallies of the emperours, which were appointed to the keeping of that coast, and spoiled, burnt, and wasted all the region: and further take one of the emperours great shippes, being driuen by tempest and weather into the hauen Spontium, fraught with men and munition.

The emperours gallies chased, and one of his shippe taken by the pope.

Fredericus againe getting on his side the Lucenses, the Idolaterans, the Genenses, the Aretines, and diuers cities besides in Hetruria to helpe that countrie, came to Pisas and Viterbium, which take part with him. Some say, that the names and factions of Gibellins and Guelphs sprang from Frederike, that by them he might stirre and inuie (hauing recourse to all the townes and cities in Italie) which tooke part with and fauoured the pope, and which the emperour; and called the one by the name of Gibellins, and the other by the name of Guelphs. But for that both Blondus, and Platina, and some others, bring no sufficient proofe thereof, but only by slender coniecture, I rather cleaue to the opinion of Nauclerus, Hermannus, Antoninus, Florentinus, and other such writers, which say: that these Guelphus and Gebelinus in Italie take their beginning of Conradus the third, Fredericus his great vncle being emperour; and that these Guelphs were dedicated to the pope, of Guelphs the yonger brother of Henrie the proud: and that those which were called the Gebelins, were appointed either of Conradus himselfe or else of his son, being brought vp in the lordship of Gaibingen. But to our purpose.

The pope afeard of the emperours coming into Italie.

The pope, when he vnderstood that Frederike was come to Viterbium, he was verie heauie: for that he feared he would come to Rome, the good will of which citie the pope much mistrusted. He therefore caused a supplication to be framed, prostraying about the same the heads of Peter and Paul, and with a sharpe and contumelious oration he much defaced the emperour: promising them euerlasting life, and gaue them the badge of the crosse, as many as would arme themselues and fight against the emperour, as against the most wicked enemie of God and the church. Holy when the emperour marching somewhat nere to Rome gates, beheld those whom the pope had with his goodly spectacle of S. Peter and S. Paul, and with his alluring oration stirred vp against him, and marked with the badge of the crosse to come forth in battell against him; disdaining to be accounted for the enemie of the church, who had been thereunto so beneficiall, giuing a fierce charge vpon them, put them some to flight: and as many as he tooke (cutting off that badge from them) he caused to be hanged. From thence he marching into Campania and his owne kingdoms, leuied a great masse of money, and mustered new bands, and augmented his armie: and in these bands he retained the Saracens also. And to the intent he might find the Saracens the more trustie vnto him; he appointed them to inhabit a castle named Luceria. For which thing, although the papisticall writers do greatly blame and opprobriously write of Frederike, yet notwithstanding, Nicolaus Machiauellus doth write, that therefore he retained them; lest that through the popes execrable curses he should be quite destitute of soulditers, as was Fredericus Barbarossa a little before, his grandfather, when that of Alexander the pope he was excommunicated, as ye haue heard.

The emperour hanged all the crossed soulditers.

The emperour retaineth the Saracens in his warre against the pope.

After this, when the emperour had greatly afflicted by battell the popes ecclesiasticall consorts, such as conspired with the pope against him, and that he had wasted and destroyed Beneuentum, the mount Casinum, and Soza, for that they take part with the pope against him; Frederike, when he had manned the citie of Aquilia, marched forth with a great host both of horsemen and footmen to Picenum, that he might banquish his enemies in Italie. And by the way, he besieged the strong towne of war named Alculinum, which was also conuerted to the popes faction and rebellion. He there hauing vnderstanding what the popes affients had done with the princes of Germanie and princes of Germanie, especially with Wincelaus king of Bohemia, and Otho Palatinus, writeth his letters vnto them. In the which, first he telleth how that those contumelies and spightfull words which the pope blustred out against him, are lighted vpon himselfe, and how the bishops of Rome haue taken to them of late such heart of grace, and are become so lofty, that not only they take to bring emperors, kings, and princes vnder their obedience, but also take how to be honored as gods, and say that they cannot erre, neither yet be subiect or bound to any religion, and that it is lawfull for them to do all things what they list, neither that any account is to be sought or demanded of their doings, or else to be made of them to any, so impudent are they in these their affirmations. And further, as princes they complain: and that vnder paine of cursing, that men beleeue euerie thing they say, how great a lie soeuer it be. In fe much that by this couetousnesse of his, all things gee backward, and the whole state of the commonweale is subuerted, neither can there any enemie be found more hurtfull or pernicious to the church of God then he. He wrote vnto them furthermore, that he (to whom the greatest charge and dignitie was in the whole commonweale appointed and committed) seeing and perceiuing to his great perill, their good hearts, wils, and practises towards him, would with all the power and abilitie that God had giuen him, do his indeuour: that he which in the likenesse of the shepheard of the flocke, and the seruant of Christ, and chiefe prelate of the church, hetherto himselfe so verie a wolfe, persecutor & tyrant; may be removed from that place, and that a true and carefull shepheard of Gods flocke may be appointed in the church. Wherefore he exhorteth them, that if they desire the safetie and preseruation of the whole state of the commonweale and empire; that they be vnto him no hinderers, but furtherers of his purpose and proceedings: left otherwise, their also perish happen to fall into the same state of feritude with the bishop of Rome. And further, he gaue them to wit, that if he should aspire to that he sought for (that is, to be an emperour and king ouer kings) yet should that be no stay of his insatiable desire, but would be as greedie and raueneus as now he is. Therefore if they be wise, to withstand him betimes, lest hereafter when they would, it should be to late, neither were able to withstand his tyrannie. The effect of this epistle I take out of Auentine, which more largely dilateth it, who also writeth that the emperour (by his legats) sent the same to Wincellaus.

Boiemus somewhat relenting at this letter, promiseth to accomplish the emperors biddings and precepts, and forthwith gathereth the assemblie of princes and nobles at Aegra; where, by common consent they thinke to renounce with the emperour a new league and couenant. And furthermore they bind Otho Boius (which was absent, and would not be at this their assemblie) to be the author of this defection, and an enemie to the commonweale. Otho then seeing himselfe not able to stand against Cesar and the other princes with whom he was associat, desiring aid of the pope by his letters, came with all speed to Boiemus his kinsman, whom when he could not perswade vnto him againe, neither would he to their parts also be wonne, obstinately notwithstanding yet thus much at their hands, that the league and couenant (which they were in hand to make with the emperour) might for a time be deferred, and that another assemblie might be made, wherein he also would be, and ioyne himselfe with them. Thus had they, who killed (as you heard) his father, bewitched also his sonne, and brought him to be both a rebell and a traytor. In the meane season the pope sent his rescript vnto the king of Bohemia and to Otho, tending to this effect: that in no case they should either forsake him, or else the church, to take the emperours part. And so much preuailed he by the meanes of Wolfelaus and Wabillaus (which were the chiefe left of that legall) and by his faire promises and bribes to such as he before had made to him, that against at Libusa by Boiemus and Boius new assemblies were gathered for the creation of a new emperour, in despite of Augustus the emperour and Cesar his sonne. And whilest that this was thus in hand, Conradus Cesar called Landshuta the wife of Otho being absent) in the teeth for great benefits and possessions which her husband had, and possessed by the ancestors of him, and that vnlesse her husband take a better way with himselfe and them, and his obedience to the emperour his father, that he should not enioy one foot of that land which now he had by his predecessors. The promotion and dignities which Otho had by the ancestors of Conradus Cesar came thus: Fredericus Barbarossa in the yere of our Lord 1180, at a parlement holden at Reginoburgh, condemned Henricus Leo of high treason, and depriued him of his dominions of Boiora and Saronie, and gaue Boiora to Otho Wittelspachius, for that he had done him so faithfull seruice in his Italian warres. After that, Ludouicus the sonne of this Otho, obtained of the emperour Fredericke the second, in recompence of his assured and trustie seruice the dittion of Palatinatum Rhen so called, which gaue also Agnetes the daughter of Henrie earle of Palatine to Otho his sonne in marriage. This Henrie was the sonne of Henric Leo the traitor, vnto whom Henrie the first the father of Frederike gaue in marriage Clementia his brothers sonne Conradus Duke time of Lotharius, and gaue vnto him the keeping of the palace of the same. And as touching the inheritance of Boiora, that he had also now long possessed by the heires of Otho Wittelspachius. Wat to our purpose againe.

By what meanes Otho attained so great possession by the emperour and his ancestors.

A great victorie on the sea against the popes confederate by the emperours nauie.

At the same time also the gouernour of Colonia Agrippina reuolted to the pope, who not long after in a skirmish betweene Wabantinus and him, was banquished and taken prisoner. And doubtlesse, Fredericus Austriacus after he was received into fauour againe with the emperor (keeping most constantly his promise and fidelitie renued) during this time made sharpe warre vpon the Hungarians, which take part with the pope, and greatly annoyed them. As these things thus passed in Germanie, the emperour when he had gotten Alcalinum and led his host into Flaminia, hauing Maucenia at his commandement, from thence came to Faucntia, which citie neuer loued the emperour: the circuit of whose wals is fiue miles in compasse, and pitched his campe round about the same. And although the siege was much hindered by asperitie of the time and weather (being in the verie head time of winter) yet notwithstanding through his great fortitude and courage, so animating his soulditers in the painfulnes of the laborious siege, he induced out the same, who thought it no little shame, hauing once made that enterprise, to come from thence without any assault giuen. And therefore when now the winter (so extreame cold and hard) was well neere ended, and the spring time now hard at hand, and by long battering had made the same in diuers places satiable: the citizens (being greatly discouraged, and in no hope of the defence thereof) sent their legats to the emperour, craning pardon for their offence, and that he would grant vnto them their liues, and so yeelded themselues vnto his mercie.

The gouernor of Agrippina reuolteth to the pope.

The emperour obtaineth another victorie by land at Ticinum against the pope and his confederats.

The emperour thinketh to make the pope afraid.

The emperours great leuities and elementie, but yet manifestly inforced.

The emperour hauing against them good and sufficient cause of reuenge, yet for that his milde heart thought it to be the best reuenge that might be, to pardon the offence of vanquished men: hee thought it better to grant them their requests, to saue the citie and citizens thereof, with innumerable people, then by armes to make the same his soulditers prey, to the destruction both of the citie, and great number of people therein. So both this good emperour in one of his epistles, Adacta nobis, confessio heart of so worthie a prince, if that with great and marueilous prouocations and wrongs he had not been incited. I thought good in the midst of the historie here to haue placed. But thus I haue kept you long herein, and yet not finished the same.

The emperour hauing spent and consumed almost all his treasure both gold and siluer, caused other money to be made of leather, which on the one side had his image, and on the other side the great eagle (the armes of the empire) and made a proclamation, that the same should passe from man to man for all necessaries in stead of other money, and therewith all promised, that whosoeuer brought the same money vnto his receiuer when the wars were ended, he would giue them gold for the same, according to the value of euerie coine limited: which thing afterward truly and faithfully he performed, as all the historiographers do accord.

The emperour preuaileth by making his money of leather.

Thus when the pope, as before is said, had stopped his eares, and would not heare the emperors legats that came to intreat for peace, but reiected and despised his most courteous and equall demands: neither yet had left any vnlikepolicie vnattempted or force vnpractised, that with his confederats he thought himselfe either able to reuenge or else resist the by his legats called to a councel at Rome, al such prelats out of Italy, France, and England, as he thought to fauor him and his proceedings, that hereby as his last shift and only refuge, he by their helpes might bepraise Frederike of his empire, as an vtter enemie to God and to the church. All which things Fredericus hauing vnderstanding of, and knowing that these assemblies should be put to the destruction and supplanting of him, determined to stop and let their passages to Rome, as well by sea as by land in all that euer he might. So that all the passages by land being now stopped and prouented, he commandeth his sonne Henrie with certaine gallies to go and keepe the coasts of Sardinia, which kingdome the Italians call Sntimum: and from thence to Pisas, and with the Pisans to rig out a nauie to meet with (if it were possible) such as should come to aid the pope at Rome. The popes champions vnderstanding that by land they could not safely repaire to Rome: they prouided of gallies and ships out of Genoa (hauing Guilielmus Boccio for their chiefe captaine or admirall) for the safe conduct of their cardinals, who by the meanes of Wolfelaus and Wabillaus (which were the chiefe left of that legall) and by his faire promises and bribes to such as he before had made to him, that against at Libusa by Boiemus and Boius new assemblies were gathered for the creation of a new emperour, in despite of Augustus the emperour and Cesar his sonne. And whilest that this was thus in hand, Conradus Cesar called Landshuta the wife of Otho being absent) in the teeth for great benefits and possessions which her husband had, and possessed by the ancestors of him, and that vnlesse her husband take a better way with himselfe and them, and his obedience to the emperour his father, that he should not enioy one foot of that land which now he had by his predecessors. This Henrie was the sonne of Henric Leo the traitor, vnto whom Henrie the first the father of Frederike gaue in marriage Clementia his brothers sonne Conradus Duke time of Lotharius, and gaue vnto him the keeping of the palace of the same. And as touching the inheritance of Boiora, that he had also now long possessed by the heires of Otho Wittelspachius. Wat to our purpose againe.

The popes sendeth for succor and aid and is prouented.

The popes rescript hasteth all the matter against.

The emperour ouerthroweth Otho at Ticinum, thus: There went forth vpon a time out of Ticinum into the borders of Genowaies, certaine bands to gather them tatums in the countrie: which bands, the seruiters of Bedolinum (where lay a great part of the popes) hearing, told the captaine of the towne, that now a brcie opportune and fit time was to giue an assault to Ticinum: for that (say they) the greatest part are now gone a foraging. Whereupon they immediatly calling together the captaines and such as had charge, set their soulditers in array and marched forward to Ticinum. And so by when they were come almost hither, the Ticinian bands (whom they thought to haue been far a foraging) were returned and met with them, and fiercely gaue a full charge vpon them: who, being dismaied at the suddennesse of the matter, fought not long but gaue ouer and fled. In which skirmish were taken (besides those that were slaine) three hundred and fiftie captaines, and two thought prisoners into Ticinum with all their ensignes with them.

The emperour ingreth forth a nauie to the sea.

Newes hereof was brought to the emperor not long after, who then was removing from the siege of Faucntia (as ye heard) to the citie of Bononium, thinking to haue destroyed the same. But vpon the hearing of these good newes, he altereth his purpose, and thinking to haue hereafter a more conuenient time thereunto, leadeth his armie towards Rome: and in the way he reconciled to him the citie of Pisarum. But Fauum, for that the townesmen shut their gates and would not suffer the emperour to come in, he tooke by force and destroyed. For the emperor, seeing that neither by petition made to the pope, nor yet by his lawfull excusation he could doe any good with him, thought, that by his sudden comming thither, and with feare of the peril vnminded, he might be brought to some vnitie, and caused to leaue off his accustomed pertinacie. And although the emperour was too strong for him, yet for that he regarded nothing more then the publike tranquillitie of the empire, and that he might then take the Tartarian warre in hand, the conuenient by many meanes conclude, he refused not to intreat a peace with him, as though he had been both in force and fortune much his inferior.

The emperour ouerthroweth Otho at Ticinum.

Whilest that this ruffle was betwixt the emperor and the pope, Ochodatus the emperour of the Tartarians his sonne, with a great power and prouision made, inuaded the borders next adioining vnto him, and there wan Voroloumm, Vodoium, Dundanum, with diuers other cities, townes, and villages, destroying, wasting, and burning the countries all about, killing and slaying man, woman and child, sparing none of anie sex or age. At whose sudden inuasion, the people being in such feare and perplexitie (hauing no citie, no refuge, nor aide to stand in defence for them) were faine to take all that euer they had, and disperse themselues into woods, and lie into marishes and mountaines, or wheresoeuer any succour else did offer it selfe to them. And by this time the Tartarian host was come as farre as Meatisauia, where Henricus of Polonia and the duke of Selesia with their armies met with them, who for the inequalitie of the number and small strength they were of, had soone an ouerthow, and almost all their soulders being slaine, they themselues were taken and put to the sword. From thence they came to Mozauia, and from thence to the kingdome of Bohemia: which countrie while the king kept himselfe in strong defenced forts, and durst not come abroad, he inuaded and suffred all Hungarie, putting to flight and banquishing Colmannus the brother of Belus the fourth king of Hungarie, by whom also was great spoile made in both the Pannonias, Dissarum, Bulgaria, and Seruia. When Belus the king of Hungarie had gotten to Pola (which is a citie of Istria) then to Otho the duke of Venetia, he sent his legats to Frederike the emperour, promising that if he would send him aide that the Tartarians might be expelled, then Hungarie should euer after be vnder the iurisdiction of the emperour: which thing if he refused to doe, that then the same were in great danger to be subiect to the Tartarians, to the no little peril of the whole empire. And laid further, that the cause wherefore he sent more instance vnto him for the emperour, was: for that many christian men and countries made such pitifull lamentation in this their great calamitie and miserie, and that there was none able to help them; which (saith he) is as great shame as may be to the whole christian state and empire. And also said, that if the malice of this barbarous people were not suppressed, that then he thought they would make inuasion vpon the empire and prouinces of the same.

The Turke inuadeth christendome with a great and mightie power.

The vnmercifull cruelties and the slaughter of christian men by the Turke.

The king of Hungarie reacheth aid of the emperour, for the which he offereth him his land.

The emperour although he thought it verie requisit, that with all conuenient speed this mischiefe should be remedied and prouented: yet notwithstanding his great enemie the pope with his confederats, was the only let and hinderance thereof. For when he saw and perceiued that he himselfe could do no good, and only laboured in vaine in seeking peace with the pope, he gaue commandement to Boiemus and Boius, to intreat and perswade with him. And (considering the imminent perill like to infue by reason of such ciuill dissention to the whole state of christendome) that he would take vp and conclude a peace, and mitigate some what his fierce and vnbathfull mood. Wherefore, when he saw further, that neither by that meanes of intreatie, nor any other, the pope would desist from his stubborne and malicious froward purpose, hee writeth againe to the king of Hungarie, that he was right sorie and greatly lamented their miserable state, and that he much desired to release the need and necessitie that he and all the rest stood in. But yet he perceiued well enough (he saw) that the pope, not hauing him in anie head, he blamed greatly the bishop of Rome, who refusing all intreatie of peace, could not without great perill to himselfe depart out of Italie, left that when he should come to the aid of him (by the popes mischieuous imaginations) hee should be in perill of losing all at home. Notwithstanding, he sent Conradus the king of Bohemia with other princes more of Germanie to resist and withstand the enemie, as much as in them lay to doe. The great armie and number of such soulditers as were the crosse by the popes assignement, deferred their iourney against the Tartarians, and had commandement giuen vnto them by one Albertus (the popes procurator) to tarie and bide at home, vntill they should be called for in battell to fight against the emperor. This was the louing zeale and affection of the pope and his adherents (to conclude) in this time of calamitie towards the christian state and commonwealth; that he had rather bend his force and reuenge his malice vpon the christian and good emperour, then either hee himselfe to withstand, or suffer and permit by conclusion of any profitable peace, that this most blodie and cruell Tartarian should be let and restrained from so great bauocke, spoile and slaughter of the christian men: and yet for soth these men will seeme to haue the greatest regard of all others to the christian preseruation, and thinke to haue the supremacie giuen therein:

what thing else is this, then manifest mockerie and deceiuing of the people? But notwithstanding, euen in the midst of this spoile and bauocke of Polonia, Bohemia, and Hungaria, was it determined: that at Lbulla, the princes confederat should be assembled about the deposing of the emperour and creation his repaire. The emperor also being enforced on his way, and come as far as Laurinum, sent before other messengers (as the maner of the French order, and Peter de Vineis) to giue them vnderstanding of the emperors comming, and that hee would prolongue the day of hearing, till that he might conuenientlie trauell thither. But for any thing that could be either said or done, or vpon hold will cause soeuer required, the pope would not giue so much as three daies space, in the which time the ambassadours assured them of the emperours presence; as though there had been no common prouiso for euerie man in that case, by the law to haue vsed vpon any reasonable let. What should I longer protract the time? When the day by them appointed was come, the pope with his confederats (whom for mante and bribes he had gotten to that councell) as gainst Gods law, against christian doctrine, against both the precept of the law of nature and reason, against the rule of equitie, against the order of law appointed, against the constitutions of emperors, and also the decrees of the empire, without any obseruation of the law, or granting dilatory daies, without probatis de any crime, or his cause suffered to be pleaded vnto, or heard what might be answered therin, taking vpō him to be both aduersarie and iudge, condemned the emperour being absent. What more wicked sentence was euer pronounced? What more cruell fact (considering the person) might be committed? Or what thing more brutish and beastly could haue bin imagined or deuised? And yet hereat were those bishops not a thing abashed; but meaning to leaue their doings in writing (as an impudent testimonie to their posteritie) established the same for a law to continue.

The terrenitie of the pope to the emperour.

Vengeance falleth vpon the pope for his false iudgement.

But marke what vengeance God take vpon this wicked iudge. The writers of the annals record, that when Fredericus the emperour, and Conradus his sonne being Cesar, were both dead, the pope gaping for the inheritance of Naples and Sicilie, and thinking by force to haue subdued the same, came to Naples with a great host of men, where was heard in the popes court manifestlie pronounced this voice, Veni miser ad iudicium Dei, Thou wretch come to receiue thy iudgement. And the next day after the pope was found in his bed dead, all blacke and bleu as though hee had been beaten with bats, as before in the historie of king John is declared.

When the emperour had vnderstanding of this cruell and tyrannical sentence of the pope, passed and pronounced against him, considering his furious purpose and mind therein, thought good by his letters, to let all christian princes vnderstand, as well what iniuries and manifold displeasures he had suffered by the foure popes in all their times, as also the cruelties and tyrannie of this pope, in pronouncing the sentence of indgement and condemnation against him (passing the bounds both of iustice, equitie, and reason) which letter as he wrote the same, here vnder followeth to be seene.

The letter of the emperor to the French king, and other princes, for the sentence giuen against him in the councell of Lions by the pope and cardinals.

ALthough we suppose not the contrarie, but that both by the certificat and common rumor you haue heard of the indifferency of our cause and good handling therof yet for that more credit is commonly giuen to that the eie seeth, then to that the eare receiueth, we thought good to prefent vnto you the naked truth of such things, which the popes successiuely haue put forth, and forged against vs. To the perusing and consideration of which my cause and letter, I beseech your gentlenesse amongst other times of leisure, you will spie out some fit and conuenient time therefore. And all other whatsoeuer that shall haue desire to heare princes counsels and affairs, let them in like sort attentiuely consider. First, whether our predecessors haue been destitute or not of godlie zeale, iust dealing, and righteousnesse: or whether we may not iustly auenge our selues, being so much prouoked, of such cuils and iniuries as haue been wrought against vs. Secondly, let the consider whether Christs vicar doth follow Christs steps or not; and whether Peters successors do follow his example or not; and also by what law, equitie and right, that sentence which they haue pronounced against vs, may be maintained and allowed: also what name they may iustly giue it, and whether that may be said to be a sentence which is giuen by an vnsufficient iudge or not. Although we acknowledge that the Lord hath giuen full power in spirituall things vnto his church, that whatsoeuer the same bindeth in earth is bound in heauen, and whatsoeuer the same looseth is also loosed: yet we read neither by Gods law, nor by any law of man, that wee ought of duetie to be subiect vnto him, or that an empire ought at his pleasure to be transformed and transposed, or that he may giue any such sentence or iudgement to punish princes temporallie, and depriue them of their kingdoms. For why? although our consecration belongeth vnto him by right and custome (as he challengeth) yet our deposing and depriuing doth no more belong to him, then doth that presumption belong to any other prelat of other realmes, which doe consecrat and annoint their kings, as the custome and maner is. Or put case it were so (we nothing hindred hereby) that he had such power: hath he that power to the intent to reuenge himself vpon whomsoeuer his malicious mind consenteth, and without all equitie and law to bring them vnder his iurisdiction? He hath proceeded of late against vs as is said, but not by the order of accusation, forsomuch as neither was there any sufficient accuser, neither went there out any inscription or processe before; neither yet by denunciation, forsomuch as there lacked a law full denouncer; neither yet by the way of inquisition, for that there went before it no manifest accusation. But hee peraduenture will say, that all things that hee laieth against vs were manifest and notorious. But that doe we denie, and nothing to be notorious but that which may by a sufficient number of witnesses be approoued and tried. Fourth may euery iudge himselfe (concerning the order of law) affirme what hee lust to be notorious, and thus condemne whom he lust. There were against vs (as well it may be said in counsell) certaine false witnesses, although not many, of whom the bishop of Calin was one, whose neere kinsman or nephue (by our laws condemned for treason to be hanged) maketh also to vs an infestiue enemie. ¶ To such like effect prosecuting the rest of his epistle, which for breuitie sake I omit.

This policie vsed the pope to vere and disturbe both the countrie of Germanie and the whole empire, and not so onelie, but also vtterly to destroy and subuert the same: by the ruinous decay whereof the pope and his prelats thought to make by their mouthes. And thus, whilest that Germanie was now newly againe diuided, some taking part with Frederike the emperor and Conradus Cesar his sonne and other nobles and princes of the empire; some with those that thould by the popes procurement be the electors of the new emperor, othersome with neither of both, as men not minding nor tending the publike vtilitie, but to serue their owne purposes, armed themselues; and thus was the publike peace and quiet broken and disturbed, and altogether in tumult and hurlie burlie. For whilest the one part laboured by all force to retaine the dominion by publike and common consent first to him committed, the other part in like sort indeuoured themselues with all their force and power to vse and occupie the same, according vnto the decree of the bishop of Rome, and to take it from Frederike, and thus great conflicts grew on all parts.

Germanie altogether in hurlie burlie through the popes malitious mind.

By these ciuil wars, Germanie suffered no little calamitie, in euery place was manslaughter and murther, the countrie spoiled, the townes and villages set on fire and burnt, the churches and temples violated and robbed, insomuch the husbandmen had put their goods and substance: houses were pulled downe, the goods drawen, & euery mans cattell driuen away. To conclude, in this turmoile and contention of deposing and chasing another emperor, in this faction of princes, in this liberte of wearing armour, in this licence of hurting and smiting, the impudent boldnesse of diuers priuat soudiers, and especially of such as were the hoselemen, then counted the better sort of soudiers, was so great, and their vnbridled and insatiable desire in robbing, spoiling, and taking of bootes, catching and snatching all that came to hand, so much, that nothing could be sure and in safetie that any good man inioyed. Therefore a little before the death of Guilielmus the king, three score cities & townes which were belonging to Ludouicus Palatinus duke of Bauaria and Rhenus, and Otho his sonne, and other princes, whose names Auentinus in his seuenth booke of the annals of the Boiens maketh mention of, ioyned themselues in a league for the expelling of these rebels and repelling of their so great iniurious rapine, and slaughter of men. Of which armie the said Ludouicus being captaine, chased and draue the whole rout of them to the vttermost parts of Germany, and pulled downe and ouerthrew their castles and fortresses, and euery other place where they had intrenched themselues.

The robbers and rebels chased out of Germanie.

Otho Saxus yet notwithstanding his oth & promise and faith most constantlie made before to the emperor Frederike and Conradus his sonne. Whereupon Philippus Iuuauensis, Albertus and others, calling a councell at Wildonius (by the popes commandement) sent for Otho vnto them, vnto whom they opend the popes pleasure and commandement. To all which, when he had heard, Otho answered: I cannot marueil at some of you enough, that when as heretofore your predecessors haue sworne to leaue & forsake the part I take with the bishop of Rome, whom you your selues affirmed to bee antichrist, and that I should take part with the emperor, why that you your selues will not kéepe your fidelitie and promise made vnto those good princes: and said that he perceiued in them a great inconstancie and leuitie, both in their words and deeds, which you call that wicked, brittle, and violent wrong, but lateile that they thought equall, iust and right. He said further, that they were ouercome with pleasures, corrupted with superfluitie, ouercome with bribes, gaping for honor and estimation: and that they neither regarded honestie, godlinesse, nor their dutie and office, but studied how to make dissention and commotions, and longed after war and bloudie battell.

The fidelitie of Otho to the emperour.

He said further, that for his part he would obay God and his prince, to whom he had sworne fidelitie; and that he nought esteemed the fained holinesse and detestable practises of such prelats. He said he beleeued in Christ, and would trust in his mercie; and that he beleeued how those whom they cursed and gaue gaue to the diuell, were in great estéeme with God. Howbeit, and notwithstanding those prelats to sise in good part this expostulation with him, and seemed to beare Otho no malice or grudge for: that he had said, but to be desirous of peace and vnitie: yet not long after Otho was cursed as black as all the rest, and counted as bad as the worst.

Albertus the popes champion now in Germanie playeth not ver only amongst the citizens, but also bethought him of a mischieuous deuice against Conradus Cesar the emperors sonne; when by fraud and subtilitie hee had gotten and taken many of the rich burgesses and citizens of Reginoburgh, which bare the emperour good will, and had sent them prisoners to Stassium. Conradus ioyning with other noble men of the empire (after he had spoiled and wasted much of his lands and others his companions) draue him so nére, that vpon certain other conditions he deliuered againe the citizens. And thortlie after comming againe to Reginoburgh, and being receiued and welcomned into the colledge of D. Hamerannus: Albertus with certaine of his confederats by the meanes of Viricus a chiefe officer of the monks, came in the beatime of the night into the chamber, where the Cesar with a few others about him did lie; and falling vpon them, some they tooke, and other some they slue; and finding no other bodie in the chamber or lodging, they thought that Cesar had been slaine among the rest. But by hearing the noise, forsooke his bed, and did himselfe vnder a bench and so escaped their hands. The next day he outlawed & proclaimed the bishop and his mates, and also the monks bailiffe of treason, and seized vpon all the goods of the house. But at the sute of the guiltelesse monks he released all to them againe, taking by way of fine 100. pounds. Viricus lost his office, and Albertus thereby to escape danger of punishment, tooke vpon him the habit of a monke. Conradus Vochenfolcus, which was the murtherer of these men (though he escaped the punishment of mans hand) yet the vengeance of God for the fact he escaped not. For as he rid in the day time abroad, he was suddenly stricken with a thunderbolt and died.

Cesar in danger of Albertus.

Albertus to escape punishment taketh the order of monkerie.

During all this busie and contentious time, it may well be gathered, that Frederike the emperor lay not still, but had his hands full: who notwithstanding (by Gods helpe) ouercomming and suppressing these or the greater part of these rebellious popish tumults, and had done strict execution on these especially that had conspired against his person, calling a councell, and setting in some stay the troublesome affaires of his kingdome, came to Cremona with Fredericus patriarch of Aquileia, Richardus earle of Cornwall, the generall of Flaunmirila, and Encius king of Sardinia, with a great number besides of soldiers and men of war. And besides, he take with him (which he sent for out of euerie part) the wisest, most vertuous, and best learned men that there were, thinking with them to haue gone himselfe to Lions to the pope, and there to haue with him communication, and full concerning the intercession of all: to about the conclusion of any peace, if by any meanes hee might. And when all things were prepared and readie, he take the iournie in hand, and came to Taurinum, hauing with him both a great armie of soudiers, and also a great company of legats and ambassadors. From thence sending his carriages before, within three daies iournie of Lions, he was certified that Parma was taken and kept by the outlawes of diuers and sundrie factions of the pope, his neere neighbors and frends; as by the popes legat and other citizens, as of Viricia, Placentia, and such like. Which thing when hee vnderstood, and that the pope therein was the onlie and chiefe doer, he fato manifestlie it should little preuaile, to attempt any further the thing hee went about, and then at length, when he saw no other remedie, putting from him all hope of peace, determined himselfe to the wars with all his force and might. Thus altering his purpose and iournie, hée take the straightest way into Lombardie, and with an armie of 60000. men hee besieged Parma. And to the intent he might more aptlie and neere the foresaid plant his siege and battrie without disturbance, first he intrenched his campe, and fortified the same about with bullwarks & other defensible munition. After that, he caused diuers victualling houses & tauerns in his campe to be sleightly builded of timber, and without the campe he appointed the place where the market should be kept, and al blaualers resort that would. He appointed places for their churches and temples, and in semelie maner ordered the same: and for the most part, their tents were builded with wood, so that it was like another Parma. All which things when he had finished, which was not long in doing, for his happy and prosperous successe he called and named it Victoria, and had thought to haue made the same to be in the stead of the citie Parma, the which he purposed to haue made level with the ground. And in the beginning, both there and elsewhere, all things prospered well with Frederike and had good successe; for hee charplie laid to their charges that defended and kept the citie of Parma. And further, Robertus Casilioneus, which was the emperors lieutenant in Picenum nere vnto Auximum, discomfited the popes armie, and slue of them more then 4000. and took many such as were of the confederat cities prisoners. And when the factions & companies of the Gibelines and Guelphs in Flozentia were at controuersie, when Fredericus of Vetruria came to the Gibelines, to whom they had sent for aid: the Guelphs therewith disdaind, fled from thence to Bononia, whose goods and substance came al to the emperors coffers, and Flozentia also it selfe to the emperors obedience. But this good successe and prosperous fortune lasted not long. For as at a time Fredericus to recreat himselfe (which seldome had his health) rode about the fields with certaine of his hoselemen to hawke and hunt: many of the emperors soudiers thinking nothing lesse then of such a matter to bee attempted of a many flaxenlings within the towne of Parma, wanded and ranged vnarmed out of their citie Victoria about the fields. The soudiers in Parma hauing this occasion offered, with all force and speed possible entred the emperors campe or rotaie Victoria, which being not frongthe fenced, nor hauing gates to shut against them, was a thing easie enough to doe. The sudden strangenesse of the matter much abashed the soudiers, and rang out their larum bell. The first assault was giuen vpon Marcus Salapina his charge, whom when the emperor returning in all haste found to be hard beset, had thought to haue rescued him. But when that was perceiued of the enemie, they bent all their force altogether on that side: insomuch that the emperor was inforced to take the trench, lest he should haue bin of the enemie inuironed, and from thence he retired into the citie or campe, where he had thought to haue gathered further aid. But the enemie giuing not so much time thereunto, with all force entred the citie Victoria. The emperor now, when the enemies were entred, left the campe and came to Dominium, who when they had killed and slaine a great number of the emperors soudiers, and had burnt and destroyed the same campe Victoria, came againe to Parma. The emperor then suspecting this thing to be wrought by treason, thereby the enemie had vnderstanding as wel of the emperors absence, as also of the negligence of his soudiers, imprisoned certaine of chiefest about him, amongst whom also was Petrus de Vineis. Yet whilest he was at Dominium, gathering together his soudiers & residue of his bands; Encius getteth a great victorie of the Spaniards, who comming to the rescue of Parma, lost fiftie of their ships, and all that they had in them.

The negligence of the soudiers offereth an occasion to the enimie.

After this also, Frederike in another conflict in Picenum, discomfited the popes soudiers, and slue their captaine Hugolinus, besides 2000. others slaine and taken prisoners. When now Fredericus had gathered againe, and new murthered his bands at Dominum, he marched forth to Cremona: and notwithstanding that there he vnderstood of the good successe and victorie of his soudiers had at Rhegium, yet did not he perceiue the defection and backsliding of all or most part of Lombardie from him, he determined to take his iournie into Apulia: and when he had there leuied a strong and sufficient power, he purposed to make his speedie returne againe into Lombardie. Therefore, in his iournie through Vetruria into Apulia, he tooke Spoletum for his sonne Fredericus, which besieged Capuam, and tooke the same vnder with him diuers of the chiefest captains prisoners, and after that subduing vnto the obedience of the empire Spiniatum, he came into Apulia.

The emperour thirsteth to go to Lions to the pope.

Capuam besieged and taken of the emperor.

When newes was brought him thither, that Encius his sonne (comming to aid the Sutinenses against the Bononians) was taken prisoner two miles from Spatina; and that in his absence, the popes captains with their bands and garrisons lwent throughout all Lombardie, Emilia, Flaminnia, and Vetruria, to stir and procure the cities to reuolt from the obedience of the emperor; and the same, partlie working by subtill policies, and partly by force and sinister means to bring them to his purpose: determined with himselfe, that with all the force and power he might by any means procure and make, to bano begun afresh, and prosecuted this war to the vttermost. Neither was it to be doubted (as Pandolphus Colonacius writeth) but that he would haue wrought some marueilous exploit and great attempt, but that he was of this his purpose (whereunto he was both willing and bent) preuented by beleeued for death. For when he fell into this agne, being at a certain castell of his in Apulia called Florentinum, and saw by the extremity thereof his dates to be shot, he remembred that which was once shewed him, how hee should die at Florence; whereupon, hee made and ordained his testament. And when vnto Conradus and others of his children he had giuen and appointed the great and innumerable nuttle of monie which he had collected and leuied for the maintenance of his wars, and godly purpose (as it is called) and vnto them also had giuen all other his kingdoms and dominions (to euery one according to their ages and pers) he departed this wretched and miserable world.

The emperour vpon disposition of treason imprisoneth diuers of his captains.

The emperour purposeth to make some great attempt.

The emperour preuented by death.

Pandolphus writeth, that Fredericus was very willing to die, and as they made certaine report to him which were sent at his death, that his mind was altogether set and bent on the heauenly ioy and felicitie. Which thing also Guilelmus Putteanus, Andreas Pandalus, and Manardus the bishop, being Italian writers doe all affirme, of whom this last writeth, that he all redie beleeueth Frederike to be one of the number of Gods elect.

Frederike one of Gods elect.

The writers not withstanding are of sundrie iudgements and opinions touching this good emperors death. Some write that he was traitorouslie poisoned by his cupbearer, being hired thereunto. Some others, that he was strangled with a pillow of Manfredo the sonne of Pherus. But Pandolphus as god a writer as the best, maketh no mention of any poison that was given him, but only that he died of an ague. The last opinion of Manfredus he manifestly refuteth, and that there is no manner of likelihood of the same: and further, that the contrarie is affirmed by diuers other writers that were of that time. He died in the yeere of our Lord 1268. the thirteenth day of December, in the fourtéenth and fiftith yeere of his age, and fourth and thirtith yeere of his raigne, whole corpse was brought to Panormum, and there interred.

Sundrie opinions of the death of Frederike the emperour.

The issue of Frederike the emperour.

Frederike had three wiues, the first was Constantia, the daughter of the king of Arragon, of whom he begat Henrie the duke of Suecia and king of the Romans: the other Ioane the daughter of Johannes Brennus king of Hierusalem, by whom he had the inheritance of Hierusalem, Naples and Sicile, of whom hee begat Conradus duke of Suecia, king of Hierusalem and Naples, being Cesar: the third Isabell the daughter of king Iohn of England, by whom he had a sonne named Henrie, which is said to doe in his childhod. This Frederike Frederike a man pollitique in matters of warres.
deserues had not his peere in martiall affaires to be compared vnto him, and warlike policies amongst all the princes of that age: a wise and skilfull souldier he was, a greater indurer of painefull labors & trauels, most bold in great & perils, prudent in foresight, industrious in all his doings, prompt and nimble about that hee tooke in hand, and in aduersitie most stout and courageous. But as in this corruption of nature, few there be that attaine perfection, neither yet is there any prince almost of such gouernement as godly institution, both in life and doctrine as is required of them: so either was this Frederike Frederike was not without his fault of humane fragilitie.
without his fault & humane fragilitie, for the writers impute to him some fault of concupiscence, wherewith he was stained and spotted. And it appeareth that he was not all cleare therof, for somuch as by sundrie concubines he had sundrie children; as Encius the king of Sardinia, Manfredus the prince of Sarentium, and Frederike king of Antioch. And this is all that I find of the discription of Frederike by Columnus, though hee affirmeth to haue gathered out of good and probable authors. But as touching the hainous acts and flagitious deedes, which the pope burthened him withall, and in his sentence against him maketh mention of; Fredericus not only purgeth himselfe thereof, but also diuers historicians (as well Germane writers as Italians) affirme the same to bee false and of the popes owne braines, to doe him stath and téene withall, inuented. Of which matter those things which Pandolphus touching the commendation or dispraise of Fredericus writeth) I thought good out of Italian to translate, whose woords be these.

The words of Pandolphus touching the praise and dispraise of the emperour.

Albeit the emperour Fredericus was indued with many goodly gifts and dertues, yet notwithstanding was he accounted an enemie of the church, and a persecutor of the same: of which, both Innocentius the fourth in his sentence hath pronounced him guiltie, and the same sentence haue other popes registred in their fire bokes of decretals, and stablished the same for a law, how that he ought to be taken for no lesse. Heresie peraduenture it should not become me to iustifie or call in question that, which others haue confirmed, or els to dispute and argue much of that matter. Yet notwithstanding as much as his acts and deeds in writing declare, and the bokes of the chiefest authors affirme, as also his owne epistles doe testifie: I cannot precisely say, whether the bishops of Rome so call him and vrge him therefore. Or else for that hee was sometwhat too bold in speaking and telling them but the truth, and reprouing the ecclesiasticall order of their great abuses. Or els, whether for that he would haue had them gone somewhat more nere the conditions and lines of the ancient fathers of the primitiue church and disciples of Christ. Or whether for that he defended and stood with them for the prerogatiue and dignities belonging to the empire, or not. Or else whether they stood in feare and awe of the great power he was of in Italie (which thing indeed Gregorie the ninth in a certaine epistle of his confesseth): but of these things let them iudge and discerne, that shall read the monuments and histories of Frederike. Truly (saith he) when I consider with my selfe that Christ whose vicar the Romane bishops boast themselues to be) said vnto his disciples, that they should follow him, and also imitat his example, as of their maister and teacher: and commanded them furthermore, how they should not beare the sword, but put vp the same into the slabberd: and further gaue them in precept that they should not only forgiue iniuries seuen times, but seuentie times seuen times to those that offended them; and when I now compare the liues of the bishops of Rome, how neere they follow him whose vicar they say they be: and consider so many and great conspiracies, treasons, rebellions, dissolaties, lyings in wait, and treacherous deuises, so many legats of the popes (being ecclesiasticall persons) which will néeds be called the shepheards of Christs flocke, to be sent with warrios and captains of bridders in all ꝑ parts of Italie, Campania, Apulia, Calabria (being the emperors dominions) in Picenum, Emilia, Flamminia, and Lombardie, to be sent out against him; and also when with my selfe I meditat the destruction of so many great and famous cities, the subuersion of such commonweales, the slaughter of so many men, and the effusion of so much christian blood; and lastly when I behold so victorious, prosperous and fortunat emperors to be, and so many miserable, vnfortunat and vanquished popes put to flight: I am perswaded with my selfe to thinke and beléeue, that the iudgements of God are secret and marueilous, and that to be true which Aeneas Sylvius in his historie of Austria writeth: that there is no great and marueilous slaughter, no notorious and speciall calamite (that hath happened either to the publike weale, or els to the church of God) of the which the bishops of Rome haue not bin the authors. Nicolaus Machiauellus also saith, that all the ruinous calamities and miserable chances that the whole christian common weale and also Italie hath suffered, haue bene brought in by the popes and bishops of Rome.

Many epistles of Fredericus there be, which he wrote vnto the bishops of Rome, to the cardinals, and to diuers other christian princes, al which I haue read: and in them is to be seene nothing contrarie vnto christian doctrine, nothing wicked and vngodly, nothing iniurious to the church of God, nothing contumelious or arrogantly written of Frederike. But indeede I deny not the same to be fraught and full of pitifull complaints and lamentations, touching the anaricious ambition of the ecclesiasticall persons, and pertinacie of the bishops of Rome, and that he would receiue and take no satisfaction no yet cease in the defence of the right and priuiledge of the empire, which he maintained: also of their manifold and infinit conspiracies which they practised both secretly and openly against him: and of the often admonitions which he gaue to the whole multitude and order ecclesiasticall, to attend vpon and discharge their functions and charges. And who that further is desirous to know & vnderstand the truth, and coueteth to search out the renowned vertues of magnificent princes, let them reade the epistle of Frederike dated to all christian princes, which thus beginneth: Collegarum principio, pontifices & Pharisæi &c. and another, wherein he perswadeth the colledge of cardinals to take vp the dissension betweene the emperor and the pope, which beginneth: In exordio nascentis mundi: and also another which thus beginneth: Infallibilis veritatis testem: besides yet another, Adreges & principes orbis christiani: with diuers others more, wherein may well be seene the princely vertues of this so worthie a peere: all which epistles collected together in the Latine tongue, the learned lot I wish to read, wherout they may picke no little benefit and commoditie to themselues. In his epistle last recited these are his woords: Non existimetis id me a vobis ideo contendere, ac si ex sententia pontificia priuationis maiestas nostra sit peruulsa. Cum enim nobis sit rectæ voluntatis conscientia, cùm ꝙ, Deum nobiscum habeamus, eundem testem inuocamus id nos spectasse, cùm totum ordinem ecclesiasticũ tum præsertim primores, nervis potentiæ dominationisque eorum succisis extirpatis ꝙ, tyrannidis radicibus, ad primitiuæ ecclesiæ conditionem & statum reuocaremus. That is: Thinke ye not that wee so earnestly desire or craue this peace at your hands, as though our maiestie were terrified with the popes sentence of deprivation: when as God (vpon whom we trust and inuocat) is our witnesse, and iudge of our conscience, that when we went about to reforme the ecclesiasticall state, but especially the ringleaders of the same, and should restraine their power, and extirpat their great tyrannie, and reduce the same to the state and condition of the primitiue church, we looked for no lesse at their hands. For these causes peraduenture, those which had the gouernement of the ecclesiastical dignitie, decreed and pronounced Frederike to be an enemie of the church: which I haue said & written others to iudge thereof. ¶ Hitherto Pandolphus Colonucius.

Frederike pursued with the hatred of the imperiall state to vtmost the church of Rome.

Deferreth commendation vpon the epistles of Frederike.

And doubtlesse examples to the contrary doe appeare, that Frederike was no enemie to the church of Rome, for that he both gaue large and great gifts thereunto, and also franchised the same with great priuileges and immunities, which things by his owne constitutions, statutes and customs may bee perceiued and vnderstood. But rather contrariwise, that the bishops of Rome most filthilie recompenced the same his great liberalitie and princelie beneuolence against, which hee gaue and bestowed vpon the same, as partly in the discourse of this historie you haue heard: who notwithstanding they so mocked and iested him with such and so many iniuries as you haue seene, he neuerthelesse forgiuing and pardoning al the same, for the great zeale he had to the common christian wealth (whereof he more feared, then of any other thing) sought by all meanes he might for to haue peace, although it were to his owne great hinderance. Therfore seeing he was of necessitie ꝙ by the bishops of Rome prouoked to that warr, if he did them any hurt in reuenge of his imperiall dignitie, let them thanke their owne selues, which might otherwise haue remedied the same. Notwithstanding vpon this occasion diuers (both Italians and Germans writers, which at that time sought for fat benefices, and euer since euen vnto these our daies haue done the like, by flatterie rather to obtaine that which they hunted for, then to beare true and faithfull testimonie of things as they were indeed) take great occasion to write and slander this good emperour. But let vs passe ouer these parasits, and returne to those, which although they themselues were of that calling, I meane of the ecclesiastical order: yet notwithstanding, for that they rather preferred the studie of veritie, and to reuerence the truth before popish popish authoritie, and flattering fruitlesse: greatly extolled and commended this good emperor Frederike. So did Nicolaus Cusanus a cardinall in his writing affirme this emperor to be an Alter Carolus Magnus, both for his wisdome and also diligent regard to the commonweale. So also writeth Aegidius Biturigum the bishop, in his bokes of the institution and bringing vp of a prince, which he wrote to the French king, exhorting him and all others, to take a paterne of this most worthie and excellent prince: in commendation of whose worthie praise and vertue these verses are written on his tombe.

Frederike himself no enemie but a friend to the church of Rome.

Si probitas, sensus, virtutum gratia, census,
Nobilitas orti possent resistere morti:
Non foret extinctus, Fredericus qui iacet intus.

Wherfore, inasmuch as it appeareth by the approued writers, of whom I haue made mention; who and what maner of prince Frederike this emperor was, and for that he diligently laboured as well in the preseruation of the christian commonweale, as in the conseruation of the imperiall dignitie, procured to himselfe the great hatred and displeasure of the Romane bishops, who haue bin to all good emperors for the most part vtter foes and enemies) and with what wicked slanders and other iniuries both by them and by their ministers they continually molested him withall: this lesson ought to be ours, that hauing the same in our memorie, we imitat and follow his vertues, hating and detesting the wicked and flagitious doings of those holy fathers that will so be called, and bishops of Rome; desiring God that he will so guide the hearts of all kings and princes, that they may by his grace aduance and set forth his glorie, and reforme the corrupt and vicious manner and order of the church to all sinceritie and puritie both of life and doctrine.

These verses which here insue were sent and written betweene the emperor and pope Innocentius the fourth, which for that to the learned they are both commodious and profitable, at the end of this historie I thought good to place.

As yee haue heard of the iniquitie and raging pride of the popish church against their lawfull emperour: now shall yee heare (Christ willing) how God beginneth to resist and withstand the corruption of that vnsaintly church, by stirring vp certaine faithfull teachers in sundrie countries as in the countrie of Saxonie about the time of this emperor, Anno 1240. or more vpon the same, where were many preachers, mentioned in the chronicle of Arspergensis, and also in Crantzius, lib. 8. cap. 16. & 18. which preached freelie against the pope. These preachers (as Crantzius saith) ringing the bels, and calling the barons in Hallis of Suevia, there preached that the pope was an heretike, and that his bishops and prelats were simoniacks and heretikes; and that the inferior priests and prelats had no authoritie to bind and lose, but were all seducers. Item, that no pope, bishop or priest could restraine men from their vsuie of seruing and worshipping of God, and therefore such cities or countries as were then vnder the popes curse, might notwithstanding lawfully resort to the receiuing of sacraments as wel as before. Item, that friers, Dominike and Franciscan, did subuert the church with their preaching. And that the indulgence of the pope and his popelings was of no regard; so that remission which they did preach vnto them, they preached it not from the pope, but as from the Lord. And thus much I thought here to recite, whereby it may appeare how the resisting of the popes vsurped power and corrupt doctrine is no new thing in these daies in the church of Christ, &c.

Certaine preachers in Saxonie.

Ex chro. Abbat. Vrsperg. Crantz. lib. 8. cap. 10.

Resistance against the pope no new thing in Christs church.

And not long after these aforesaid, rose vp Arnoldus De noua villa, a Spaniard, a man famous for learned and a great writer, Anno 1250. whom the pope with his spiritualtie condemned among heretikes for holding and writing against the corrupt errors of the popish church. His teaching was, that Iudas had seduced the world from the truth of Christ Iesus. Item, that the faith (which then christian men were commanded taught) was such a faith as the diuels had; meaning belike (as we now affirme) that the papists doe teach onlie the historicall faith, which is the faith Historiæ, non fiduciæ. Item, that christian people (meaning belike, for the most part) are led by the pope vnto hell. Item, that al clostrers are void of charitie and damned: and that they all do falsifie the doctrine of Christ. Item, that the diuines doe euill in mixing philosophie with diuinitie. Item, that males are not to be celebrated; and that they ought not to forbeare the bed. Certaine other opinions there be, which the slanderous sects of monks and friers doe attribute vnto him; but (as they are wont in all other to do) rather vpon enuious talking, then of any iust cause giuen.

And as this Arnoldus was condemned, so also the same time Johannes Semeca, the glosse-writer of the popes decrees, and pronoūst of Halberstat was excommunicated and depriued of his pronostship, for resisting pope Clement the fourth, gathering certaine oractions in Germanie, and therefore he appealed from the pope to a generall councell, and had many great fauorers on his side, till at last both the pope and he died.

Johannes Semeca the glosse-writer of the popes decrees excommunicated.

Consequently in this order and number followeth the worthie and valiant champion of Christ and aduersary of antichrist Gulielmus de S. Amore, a master of Paris, and chiefe ruler then of that Vniuersitie. This Gulielmus in his time had no small aduo writing against the friers, and their hypocrisie, but especiallie against the begging friers, both condemning their whole order, and also accusing them; as those that did disturbe and trouble all the churches of Christ by their preaching in churches against the will of the ordinaries and pastors, by their hearing of confessions, and executing the charges of curats and pastors in their churches. All the testimonies of scripture that make against antichrist, he appliеth them against the clergie of prelats, and the popes spiritualtie. The same Gulielmus is thought to be the author of the booke, which is attributed to the schole of Paris, and intituled, De periculis ecclesiæ: where he proueth by nine and thirtie arguments, that friers be false apostles.

Gulielmus de S. Amore.

Moreouer, he doth well expound this saying of Christ (If thou wilt be perfect, goe and sell away all thou hast, and come follow me) declaring there pouerty to be inioyned vnto Christ, Non actualem, sed habitualem; not in such sort as standeth in outward action, when no need requireth; but an inward affection of heart when need shall require. As though the meaning and precept of our Lord were not that we should call away actuallie all that we haue: but that when the confession of the name of God and the glorie of Christ shall so require, that then we be readie to leaue and renounce all things so euer for the sake of him, &c. As when he requireth in plaine the like phrase, hatred of father and mother, and of our owne liues: he biddeth vs not to dislhonor father or mother, much lesse to hate them: but that then, when case shall require, we set all things behind the loue of Christ. Many other worthie workes hee compiled, wherein albeit he vttered nothing but what was truth, yet not with stanting he was by antichrist and his rabble condemned for an heretike, cried, and his bookes burnt; whole heretical arguments, as they called them, that thou maist better iudge thereof, here vnder I thought good to place.

Against false prophets with signes to know them by, in these his words he followeth. For because these seducers (saith he) name themselues to be apostles, and that they are sent of God to preach, to absolue and dispense with the soules of men, by meanes of their ministerie, read the saying of the Apostle in his second epistle to the Corinthians, cha. 11. For such apostles are subtill and craftie workemen, disguising themselues to be like the apostles of Christ. Therefore, we meane to shew some certaine infallible tokens and probable, by the which false apostles may be discouered from the true preachers & apostles of Christ.

The first signe or marke is, that such as be true preachers do not enter into simple womens houses laden with sinne, and take them as it were captiue, as many of the false preachers do; as in the second epistle of S. Paul to Timothie the third chapter is manifest, saying: Of these sorts are they, which enter into womens houses, &c. Therfore those preachers which come into womens houses, to the intent they may take them captiue, be not true preachers, but false apostles.

The first signe and token is, that those that be true preachers doe not deceiue simple men with painted and flattering words, whereby they prefer their owne trash and traditions, as all false prophets doe, as in the last chapter to the Romans apeareth, saying: By their pleasant and fugred talk, and by their blessing and crossing they deceiue and beguile the hearts of innocent men and women. Glos. With gay glorious words they extoll and set forth their traditions, whereby they deceiue simple men. Very greatly do they deceiue the soules of simple men, which cause them to enter into their sect, which they terme religion. And they which before led a naughtie life, by reason of their ignorance or simplicitie; after their entrance, become subtill and false deceiuing hypocrits, entring together with the rest into poore mens houses: yea and oftentimes become wooers for the others. Whereupon Marke 12. Woe be vnto you Scribes and Pharises, hypocrits which goe about, &c. Therefore they which doe this, are no true messengers but false apostles.

The third signe is, that the true apostles if they be reproued, suffer the same patiently, 2. Cor. 12. saying: The tokens of my apostleship are accomplished among you, in all patience and sufferance, meaning that patience, which pertaineth to the maners of the preachers. Therfore they which suffer not correction or punishment, be no true apostles, but rather they themselues to be no christians at all: 1. Cor. 12. No man can say that Iesus is the Lord, but by the holy Ghost. Glos. It is meet that christians should be humbled, to the intent that they may suffer themselues to be reproued, and not to be holden by with yea and nay. And also such men do their themselues to be carnal, and not spirituall at all, although they faine themselues to be spirituall: Gal. 2. Therefore am I become an enemie vnto you. Notwithstanding the glosse saith: No carnall man will be reproued although he erre. Wherfore, those preachers which suffer not correction, seeme not to be true apostles, but false prophets.

The fourth signe is, that true apostles commend not themselues: 2. Cor. 4. For we dare not ioyne our selues, nor yet compare our selues vnto others which commend and boast many of their acts, when God alloweth none of them at all. Also true preachers although they be indeed praiseworthie for their good deserts, in the conferences of men are they praiseworthie, and not to the outward eye alone: 2. Cor. 3. We commend our selues saith the apostle, to the consciences of all men. Then they doe not commend themselues in comparision of others. Wherefore the glosse saith vpon the same place: Those that deserue no commendation but in comparison of others, doe challenge to themselues other mens deserts and praise. Wherefore in the second epistle of S. Peter the last chapter it is said: Seuen as our welbeloued brother Paul, according to the wisedome that God hath giuen vnto him, hath written vnto you. Glosa: The chiefest of the apostles hath here forgotten his papall authoritie, and also his deies that were deliuered vnto him: for he is attonted as it were at the great wisedome giuen vnto his brother Paul. For indeed it is the maner of the elect children of God, to be more in loue with the vertues of other men, then with their owne. Wherefore in the second chapter to the Philippians it is written: Let those that are superiors esteeme of themselues in all humilitie. They therefore that doe the contrary, saying that their state or doings be better then others, although they bee preachers, yet are they no true apostles indeed, but false prophets.

The fift signe is, that true apostles need no letters of commendation: nor yet desire to haue themselues praised of men: as in the 2. Cor. 3. the apostle saith, We need not the letters of commendation of any man; that is to say, of false prophets.

The sixt signe is, that true apostles doe not preach vnlesse they be sent, as in the tenth chapter to the Romans: How shall they preach vnlesse they be sent? Glosa: There be no true apostles but those that bee sent: for they haue no need of signes which are true witnesse bearers, but those that be not sent and doe preach are false prophets.

The seuenth signe is, so forsomuch as false prophets haue their authoritie in their owne names: wherefore in the second epistle of S. Paul to the Corinthians it is written: For we dare not boast of our selues or make comparison: Glosa: That is to say, with those that be false prophets, not taking their authoritie from God, but blurping the same, desirous to beare rule, claiming in their owne name their authoritie. And therefore although peraduenture by presumption they say that they are sent of God, as all heretikes will say: yet notwithstanding, vnlesse they shall proue their sending either by spirituall prophecie, as Iohn Baptist did, saying: I am the voice of a crier in the desert; as out of the prophet Ezay in the first chapter of S. Johns gospel is alleaged; or else by miracles, as Moses did, which turned his rod into a serpent, and againe from a serpent to a rod, as in the seuenth chapter of Exodus: they ought not to be excommunicated, till such time they ceale from preaching. Not notwithstanding a miracle ought not to be a sufficient testimonie of their sending, for so much as they be done oftentimes and that of euill and wicked men: 1. q. 1. Nec mirum. Therefore those preachers which preach for worldly gaine or honor, or else for the praise and commendation of men, be no true apostles but false prophets. But if it may be aleged, how shall men vnderstand when these god fellowes preach for their owne vaine glorie sake? It may be answered thus, when they preach before they be called, as in the 2. Cor. 1. Who soeuer boasteth, let him boast and reioyce in the Lord. Glosa: Which thing to do cannot be by any meanes that hath not his authoritie from God. For if any such prophet preach, he seeketh his owne glorie, and that may easily be perceiued. Because he is not called of God, he hath no such authoritie of him, that is to say, of his church or congregation, as to the Heb. 7. No man taketh to himselfe any dignitie, but he that is called of God as Aaron was. Glosa: He is called of God, that is lawfully chosen of the congregation.

The eight signe is, that false prophets pretending great workes done and boldnes to be in superstition, haue named their owne traditions to be religion, the which are rather to bee counted sacrilledge or church robberie, and do discerne vnto themselues for due deserts of other men by boasting and bragging among strange and vnknown people. Wherefore the apostle speaking of false prophets in the second chapter to the Colossians, saith: According to the precepts of men, which hauing a face of wisedome consist in superstition, interlaced with humilitie. Glosa: That is to say, mingled with fained religion, that it might bee called religion, when in very deed it is nothing else but sacrilledge, because it is contrary to all authoritie: that is, contrary to God himselfe, that any man should desire to haue gouernment of a multitude without publike commandement, as in Deuteronomium the three and twentith chapter: Thou shalt entred into thy neighbors vineyard. Glosa: That is to say, Into the church of another bishop. Say a man learne and admonith others, or els correct that congregation which is not subiect to him to gouerne, nor yet to take so great a charge on him: No. And that it is not lawfull to enter into another bishops diocesse, it is apparant, because it is not lawfull for the archbishop so to doe. To this effect appertaineth that which is read, 6. q. 3. And also it is written 9. q. 2. throughout. Therefore those preachers which against God and his diuine scriptures do call their owne traditions religion, are not apostles, but false prophets.

The ninth signe is, by the authoritie which they haue: for so much as they be no preachers of the gospell or ministers of the sacraments, yet they will liue by the gospell, and not by the labor of their owne handes, against the text in the 2. Thes. 3. Neither haue we eaten any mans bread for nought, or of free cost. Glosa: Then those false prophets ought much more to liue by their labour, which haue not that authoritie which we ought to haue: that is to say, to liue by the gospell. And S. Augustine speaketh of this more expressly in his booke De opere monachorum, by these words, Those our brethren do claime to themselues (here truly) as mee thinketh) that they haue any such authoritie, to liue by the gospell. If they be preachers of the gospell, I grant that indeed they haue such authoritie; if they be ministers of the altar, if they bee dispolers of the sacraments, they cannot well but take to themselues this authoritie, as also manifestly to challenge the same; if at the least they haue not where withall to sustaine this present life, without labor of their handes. As though he would haue said: If they be not such maner of men, then haue they no authoritie to liue by the gospell. Therefore those preachers which haue no authoritie to liue by the gospell, or else minister the sacraments, because they haue no congregation whereby to take charge of soules; yet for all that will needs liue vpon the gospell: they be no true apostles, but false prophets.

The tenth signe is, that false teachers reioyce more to bee commended themselues, then the word of God to haue the commendation and praise. But they that are true preachers and apostles, are farre otherwise minded, as to the 1. Thes. 2. Not seeking the praise of men, &c. And herein he toucheth those false prophets, which desire rather to bee commended themselues, then that the word of God which they preach should haue the commendation: but be is an apostle which not seeking the glorie of this present world, but for the glorie to come, doth abase himselfe, to the intent that the preaching and word of God might be commended and exalted. They therefore which desire to haue praise and to be commended of others, rather then that the word of God should haue the praise, be no true apostles, but false prophets.

The eleuenth signe is, that true apostles doe preach only for Gods cause, and for the health of soules, and for no temporall gaine, as in the 2. Cor. 4. saying: We preach not our selues, &c. Glosa: Our preaching tendeth not to our glorie and gaine, but only to the glory of Christ. But the preaching of Christ by those that are false prophets, tendeth to the contrary. Wherupon in the Philip. 1. is said: Whether it be vpon occasion giuen, or else for the veritties sake, let Christ be preached, &c. Glosa: False prophets do preach the gospell vpon some occasion, as either by seeking some commoditie at the hands of men, or else because of getting goods, honor, or praise among men. Which notwithstanding that they be readie and willing as it should seeme to beare and sustaine iniuries: yet they seeke not so much the health of him to whom they preach, as in verie deed they do their owne commoditie and gaine. Whereupon, 2. Corinth. 12. Because I seeke not the things that be yours, that is to say, not your treasure, as gold and siluer, but only you your selues. Glosa: For otherwise it could by no meanes be gathered that they should vnderstand him to speake or meane of their substance, because he more esteemeth them then their money, to the intent that they might vnderstand his great good will towards them. Therefore those euil and naughtie preachers which preach for worldly gaine or honor, or else for the praise and commendation of men, be no true apostles but false prophets. But if may be aleged, how shall men vnderstand when these god fellowes preach for their owne vaine glorie sake? It may be answered thus, when they preach before they be called, as in the 2. Cor. 1. Who soeuer boasteth, let him boast and reioyce in the Lord. Glosa: Which thing to do cannot be by any meanes that hath not his authoritie from God. For if any such prophet preach, he seeketh his owne glorie, and that may easily be perceiued. Because he is not called of God, he hath no such authoritie of him, that is to say, of his church or congregation, as to the Heb. 7. No man taketh to himselfe any dignitie, but he that is called of God as Aaron was. Glosa: He is called of God, that is lawfully chosen of the congregation.

The twelfth signe or token of a false prophet, is, because such prophets do counterfeit themselues to haue greater care and loue to mens soules, then those that be their verie gouernours and pastors haue, although they haue no charge at all of them, against whom the glosse speaketh, and the 1. Thes. 2. We are become meeke and louing towards you, euen as the nurse which giueth her child sucke. Glosa: A woman nurseth other mens children for wages, and not for loue alone; but she giueth her owne sucke of verie loue without respect of money. Therefore those preachers which faine themselues to haue a greater loue and affection to the soules of men, then they that haue the charge ouer them, seeme not to be true apostles. The apostles study not for eloquence, nor for the curious placing of their words, but false prophets do them both, as in the 2. Cor. 11. If the simple and vnelequent man, &c. Glosa: The apostles were not eloquent, but false prophets are full of curious eloquence. Also by on the same another glosse: The Corinthians were led away from the gospell by ouer nice eloquence: 2. Cor. 7. Let vs shew our selues before all men as the ministers of God. Glosa: The ministers of God do not flatter as false prophets do. And for this occasion those that be true apostles haue not their abiding in princes courts and noble mens houses knowing this saying of Christ in S. Matthews gospell; Behold, those that are clothed with silkes dwell in kings courts. And therefore true apostles are not conuersant in princes courts and noble mens houses. Glosa: Hard and strict life with the preaching of the gospell loueth not to come neere princes palaces and noble mens houses. Oftentimes it commeth to passe that courtiers are found great flatterers, therefore those preachers that haue their abode in princes courts, or that in any other place do vse to flatter, are no true apostles, but false prophets.

The thirteenth signe is, that true apostles or messengers do not circumuent or subtilly go about to deceiue men, that they should giue vnto them their goods, either in their life time or else at the time of their death as in the 2. Cor. 7. We haue falsifie deceiued no man. Glosa: By the subtill and deceitful getting away of your substance as false prophets do, which get away from you those things that be yours vnder pretence of great friendship. Also Matthew 22. Woe be vnto you Scribes and Pharisies, you hypocrites, which spoile widowes houses by your long prayers, which meane nothing else by your superstition, but that you may spoile and rob the people, as Luke 20; Which deuour widowes houses by dissembling of your long prayer. Glosa: The which make ouer long prayers, to the intent they may seeme more deuout, and that they may get both money and great commendation of all such as be sicke and troubled with the burthen of their sinnes. Whose prayers be turned into sinne, which neither are profitable for themselues nor ante other, but rather shall haue for making those prayers greater damnation, for so much as by the same they deceiue others: for by this that they receiue and take both gold and siluer, it appereth that they preach not for soules health sake, but only for filthie lucre & gaine sake: Mat. 10. Be ye possessors neither of gold nor siluer. Glosa: If they then haue these things, they cannot seeme or be thought to preach for the health of the soule, but for lucres sake. And so saith Hyerome vpon the prophet Malachie; Because some prophets take monie, their prophecie became diuination, that is to say, their prophecie appeared not to be prophecie, but diuination or inchantment: that is, that such prophecie proceedeth not from God but from the diuel. And this appereth in 1. q. 1. hauing this beginning. Nunquam diuinatio, &c. Therefore those preachers which circumcent & beguile men, to the intent they should giue them their goods, either in their life time, or after their death, are not true apostles, but false prophets.

The fourteenth signe is, that false prophets when any veritie is preached, which for the most part they are not acquainted withall, or that toucheth them: then begin they to chafe and barke against the same. Whereupon the apostle in the third chapter to the Philippians, saith: Behold the dogs. Glosa: Vnderstand you that they are not dogs by nature, but by their vsage and conditions, barking against the truth, to which they were neuer acquainted with. And so he compareth them right well to dogs, because dogs follow rather custome then reason: so false apostles do keepe the custome of the law, and do bite and barke against the truth, as though they were without the gift of reason. And also in the second epistle to Timothie, the fourth chapter, saying; They get them into tractors according to their owne desires. Glosa: Which may teach them what things they themselues are willing to heare, because the truth seemeth nothing pleasant vnto them. Therefore those preachers which barke against the late reuealed truth, which toucheth them very neere, and therefore cause the same to be hidden and kept vnder, are not true apostles, but false prophets.

The fifteenth signe is, that the true apostles do not inforce any to receiue or heare them which be vnwilling thereunto but send them away rather, left they should seeme to seek after some earthly and transitorie thing: Matth. 10. Whosoeuer will not receiue you, get you out of that citie, and shake the dust from off your feet, &c. Glosa: That you may thereby shew that the desire of earthly things hath no power in you. Therefore those preachers which striue and wrestle (as it were) to the intent they would be received and heard, are no true apostles, for so much as the apostle saith, 1. Corinth. 11. If any man appeare among you to be ouer contentious or full of strife, such custome haue we none, nor yet the congregation of Christ.

The sixteenth signe is, that the apostles did not procure the indignation of those princes, with whom they were esteemed and regarded, against such persons as would not receue them and heare them, according as we reade in the life of Simon and Iude the apostles. The chiefe ruler being very angrie, commanded a very great fire to be made that the bishops might be cast into the same, and all other which went about to defame the doctrine of the apostles of Christ. But the apostles fell downe before the emperor, saying: We beseech you sir let not vs be the authors or causers of this destruction or calamity; nor that we which are sent to be the preseruation of men, and to reuiue those that are dead through sinne, may be killers of those that be aliue. Therefore those preachers which seeke to stir vp the displeasure of princes against them (whose fauours now they enioy) that will not receiue and heare them, or rather whom they themselues hate, are no true apostles, but false prophets.

The seuenteenth signe is, that the apostles of Christ haue not only the knowledge of those things which God hath already done, but also of those things which he will hereafter do, as in the Apocalypse 3. chapter: The beasts were full of eyes both behind and before. Glosa: Obtaining the knowledge of those things which God had done, as also what he would do hereafter in the end of the world. Therefore those that say they know not the perils of the church in the latter time which are prophecied before, or that they care not for them, or else if they know them not, they haue not eyes behind no: before, and no true apostles, therefore what time as they call themselues apostles, they are false prophets.

The eighteenth signe is, that true apostles do not desire the riches and goods of them to whom they preach, whereby they are discerned from wolues, that is to say, from false prophets: Acts 20. I haue desired no mans gold nor siluer. Glosa: By this are wolues discerned, for they desire such things. And againe in the same place: For those things which I had need of, and to those which were with me, these hands haue ministred. Glosa: This example also of labouring is a spectacle for bishops whereby they are discerned from wolues. For such as aske or beg of those to whom they preach, or set any other to aske or beg in their names, do seeme to commit simonie like Gehezi of whom it is read in the 3. booke of Kings the fift chapter, that he craued certaine apparell of Naaman the Syrian, to whom his master Eliseus had restored the benefit of health, notwithstanding he had gotten those garments vnwitting to his master. Whereupon Gregorie Nazianzen saith, 1. q. 1. Quisti debetur. But some man perhaps will say, Cannot the preacher aske money or money worth of those to whom he preacheth? Or at the least, may not he beg? To this may be answered: If the preacher by authoritie preach and feed his flocke as a true pastor with the food of Gods word, he may take money or money worth; but then it is not begging or craning, but it is by authoritie, as the 2. to Timothie 2. chapter. It is meet that the husbandman that tilleth the ground, should first and afore others receiue the commoditie of his increase. Glosa: Hereunteth the vertuous preacher out of doubt, not preaching for that intent to make merchandize of the gospell; and againe him to vnderstand, that it is lawfull for him to take of them whom he feedeth as his flocke, what things soeuer he hath need of, and hath it not in begging or craning, but by good authority. It is manifest that it cannot in any place of the holy Scripture be found, that the preacher ought to beg. But begging is forbidden of all the epistles of Christ, and is abhorred of Salomon, and S. Augustine, and reproued by diuers other holy men. Therefore it is manifest that the true apostles do not desire the temporall goods of them to whom they preach, neither do they beg or craue the same. They therefore that require any thing of them to whom they preach, or else that any other man asketh for them, or in their names, do not seeme to be true apostles, but false preachers.

The nineteenth signe is, that true apostles are patient in tribulation, rather do they render euill for good: Paith. 10. Behold I send you as sheepe among wolues. Glosia: They that accepte the place of preaching, ought not to procure any euill toward their brethren, as the example of Christ teacheth, 1. Pet. 2. saying: Who when he was reuiled, reuiled not againe, but did submit himselfe to him that iudged him iniustly. They therefore that suffer not iniurie, but rather do wrong themselues, are not true apostles, but false apostles.

The twentith signe is, that true apostles at their first coming are euill intertained, as the Lord saith in the 24. of Mat. ying: He shall be hated of all men for my names sake; but yet at the length such get the victorie, according to that saying of the first of S. Iohn the 5. chapter; Euery thing that is of God ouercommeth the world. They therefore that in the beginning receiued are well intertained, but in the end are reiected, seeme not to be true apostles but false.

The twentie one signe is, that true preachers go not to preach vnto those which haue preachers appointed vnto them, because they haue not to receiue of a company belonging to another mans charge, as to the Romans the 15. chapter; I haue preached the gospell where Christ was not before preached, lest I should build vpon another mans foundation. And in the second epistle of S. Paul to the Corinthians, the 10. chapter, he saith; We are no boasters, nor bostle in other mens matters. Glosia: Where another man had laid the foundation. Likewise in the same chapter: Let hauing pleasure to boast of other mens labours, that is to say, of those which be committed to the gouernment of another man. Likewise Augustinus saith; Honor ought to seeke the, and not thou honor. Also Cyprianus: Authoritie is in leue with such a man as refuseth her, and yet abhorreth her not. They therefore that procure and haue a desire to preach vnto the people committed to another mans charge, which is an office of honor, especially in councels, synods and great assemblies, also in kings and princes courts, and prelats palaces, are not true apostles, but false teachers.

The twentie two signe is, that true apostles when they know themselues to do much good in the church and congregation of God; yet not withstanding are not puffed vp with pride: Ezechiel 3. O sonne of man I haue made thy face as an adamant stone. The adamant stone when it draweth iron vnto it, is not thereby either lifted vp or altered. Likewise a true preacher when he draweth sinners vnto him by his preaching (whose hearts were as hard as iron) is neuer the more lifted vp or higher minded therefore. But as in Luke the 18. chapter, When we haue done all that we can, and as well as we can, yet say that we are vnprofitable seruants: Psal. 115. Not vnto vs Lord, not vnto vs, but to thy name be giuen the glorie. They therefore that do arrogantly boast themselues of the fruit and benefit that they haue done in the church of God, saying: We haue giuen light to the vnmerfull church, which was blind before our time, and we haue put out the flame of sin in the church of God (when perhaps they haue more furthered hypocrisie then either truth or veritie) they are not true prophets but false, of whom it is spoken in the Psalmes, The mouth of them that speake proud things, &c.

The twentie three signe is, that true apostles do not seeke the fauour of the world, nor yet how to please men; as to the Galath. 1. If I should please men, that is to say, if I had a desire to please men, I should not be the seruant of God. Wherefore to Timothie the first epistle and second chapter; Not as men pleasers. Glosia: Seeking to please, because we haue not the pleasing spirit. Therefore those preachers that seeke the fauour of the world, and do labour to this intent that they might please men, are not true apostles, but false.

The twentie fourth signe is, that true apostles when they haue meat and drinke they are contented, neither do they desire ouer daintie fare, according to the saying of Mat. 10. chap. Eating and drinking those things that are set before them. Glosia: The gospell condemneth not altogether costly and delicat fare, yet so alloweth the same, that if we haue meat and drinke, we ought not to grudge, but to be therewith contented. Therefore those preachers, which although that neither they be sent, nor haue authoritie to preach, and yet are offended when they haue not fine & delicat fare, are not true apostles, but false preachers.

The twentie fifth signe is, that true apostles do loue more the law of God then their owne estimation amongst their neighbours, according to that in the 7. chapter of the Prouerbs; Keepe my law as the apple of thine eye, and bind the same vpon thy fingers, and write the same in the table of thy heart. Whereupon in the 119. Psalme: The law of thy mouth is dearer vnto me then thousands of gold and siluer. Glosia: Charitie doth more loue the law of God, then the desire of gold and siluer a thousand fold. He therefore that seeth the gospell of Christ troden vnder foot, which is the eternall glad tidings, to be taken away by that cursed one, and doth neglect and contemne the same, or else peraduenture consenteth vnto the same, to the outward appearance of the world: and yet because he will keepe his temporall dignitie and situation, refuseth not to stirre vp strife and contention about the same, and so to be euill spoken of, seemeth not to be an apostle of Christ, but rather a false prophet, if he be a preacher.

The twentie sixth signe is, that true apostles seeke not after such fine lodgings and wealthie habitations, where they may haue all things at their commandements; but rather such be neff resting places where they may haue necessarie things for themselues, with their good wils of whom they haue it. And they take nothing of such whom they see to be so rich and liberall in giuing, as to thinke the one doth him more pleasure in receiuing the gift, then the other doth in giuing him the same. According to that in the 10. of Matthew, saying: Into what citie or towne soeuer ye shall enter, inquire out those that be of good report in the same, & abide you with them so long as you tarie in the same citie or towne. Glosia: Your host with whom ye lodge, ought to be chosen by the good report of neighbours, lest your preaching be euill spoken of by reason of his infamie. Neither ought such men to run from house to house. But whom shall we call worthie of good report? Glosia: Him who knoweth better to do other men good, then to receiue a good turne of another. And this is he which giueth willingly for Christs cause, and not in respect of any commoditie. Also true apostles receiue nothing of such men as lie waltering in their sinnes, but rather of those that are washed and cleansed from their sins, whereupon the 2. to the Cor. the 7. chapter; They haue giuen themselues first to the Lord. Glosia: Because they neld amending their old errors and vicious manners haue bowed themselues vnto the Lord, and afterward gaue of that which they had to their brethren: for otherwise they ought not to haue taken any thing of them, because gifts do blind the eyes; but those that giue where there is no cause of reproofe in their doings, haue no suit cause to giue. Therefore those preachers that seeke how to come by daintie fare, & do receiue bribes and rewards of naughtie men that haue this world at will, to the intent that those preachers may couer and hide their faults, and get of others what they can by subtiltie, which giue indeed rather to remoue the shamefull importunitie of the crauer, or else for auoiding of present shame, then for any loue they haue to God, are not true apostles, but false prophets, according to that in the 2. to the Cor. the 9. chapter; The Lord doth loue a willing giuer. Glosia: He that giueth for present shame, or else for that he may be free from the importunacie of him that asketh, doth lose his substance and merit: therefore he that hath respect to these things, doth not seeke the fruit and profit of the giuer, but the gift it selfe, as the apostle to the Philippians the 4. chapter, saith; Seeke not the gift, but the fruit or benefit of the giuer.

The twentie seuenth signe is, that true apostles do not endeuour themselues to seeke and inioy the fruit of other mens labours that they may be fed thereby, because that the bellie is such mens god, according to that in the 2. to the Thessal. the 3. chap. We haue heard of some amongst you which walke inordinately, not labouring at all, but liuing delicatlie or idlelie. Glosia: Of other mens labours, and deserue they to be fed? The discipline of the Lord cannot away with that doing: for the bellie is their god, which prouide to haue more then necessarie dishes of meat. Therefore those preachers which so do, are no true apostles, but false.

The twentie eight signe is, that true apostles do not reioyce only of the miracles or other excellent workes, which the Lord doth by them; but they reioyce rather of the saluation which they loke for, from the Lord, then that by doing those miracles they desire any honor, according to that which is written in Luke the 10. saying: Reioyce ye not for that the spirits be subiect vnto you, but because your names are registred in heauen. They therefore that boast of their owne miracles, or of any thing that belong vnto them, for this cause that they are sauced by the doing of them, as many do say, seeme not to be true apostles, but false.

The twentie nineth signe is, that the true apostles do neuer seeke their owne glorie in this life, but the glorie of Christ; as in Iohn the 7. He that speaketh of himselfe, doth seeke his owne glorie, but he that seeketh the glorie of him which sent him (that is, of whom he is sent) is a true apostle. Therefore those which seeke the things that pertaine to the glorie of this world, of the which one is; to be assistant to those that beare rule and authoritie, according to that saying of Boetius De consolatione; Those that do desire to be ertolled, either they raigne and beare rule themselues, or else do desire to be more about them that haue such dominion. Another is, they desire to haue the same and bicause of that which they haue nothing at all deserued before God. Whereupon is written that saying of the apostle in the Gal. 5. Let not vs become desirous of vain-glorie, is, to haue victorie without any merit or desert. and those, I say, that do such things seeme not to be true apostles, but false.

The

The thirtith signe is, that true apostles care not for the solemnities of men, neither their salutations, nor feastings, nor any other benefit of theirs. They therefore which loue and seeke the company and fellowship of men, their feastings, and other their commodities, do not seeme to be true apostles, but false.

The thirty one signe is, that true apostles do not commonly resort to other mens tables, lest that they should for a meales meat become flatterers, as in the 2. Thess. 3. That we should giue an example to followe vs. Glosia: He that commeth oftentimes to another mans table being giuen to idlenesse, cannot chuse but flatter him which feedeth him; but Christs religion calleth men to libertie and to no such bondage: they therefore that resort to feastinges, and that of their owne minds, to other mens tables (liuing idlely) are not true apostles, but false.

The thirtie two signe is, that true apostles do not hate their enemies, and such as hate them; which doctrine the Lord taught, Matthew the first, saying: Loue your enemies, do well to them which hate you; but false prophets do both hurt and defame their neighbors, according as S. Hyerome 14. saith; The prophets of Hierusalem haue defiled the whole earth. Glosia: They are not contented only to hurt their neighbours, but also whom they before this time haue hated, they defame and speake euill of in euerie place they come: therfore those preachers which hate them whom they thinke are their enemies, and do defame them, are not true apostles, but false preachers.

The thirtie three signe is, that false prophets when they are reuiled and proued whether they be true apostles or lers, take that verie grieuously, and persecute all those that can proue them to be so, and also do stir vp and prouoke others to persecute the same men, which also ioyne themselues together by secular power, euen as certaine false prophets did in the primitiue church against the bishop of Ephesus: to whom the Lord said, Apoc. 2. I know, that is to say, I do allow thy workes and thy labour; that is, thy trauaile, because thou canst not away with those that be euill men. Glosia: But that thou hast a desire to amend them, or else to expell them, and hast examined those which say that they are apostles, and are but liers, and also hast suffered this patiently. Glosia: The euils which these false prophets ioyned together by secular power do bring in, are not the doings of true apostles, but false prophets.

The thirtie fourth signe is, that true apostles go not to preach to those which are conuerted alreadie by other men, but rather do conuert those which are not yet conuerted, lest that they should build vpon another mans foundation, as S. Paul, Romans 15. saith: I haue laboured so, that from Hierusalem to Illyricus, I haue replenished the gospell in euerie place. Glosia: That is, I haue preached the same abundantly, in whom the great vertue of the holy ghost appeareth, because so many nations, that is, the Gentiles haue receiued the gospell by my preaching. But I haue preached the gospell there where Christ was not preached before, lest I should build vpon another mans foundation. Glosia: I should not preach to those that were conuerted by another man. Also 2. Corinth. 10. We are not such as boast & glorie in other mens labours. Glosia: Where another man laid the foundation, for that should be to boast in order. Also in the same place, not thinking to boast where another man hath gouernment, but in those things which are put in experience. Glosia: Of other preachers. Because the apostle did preach, & those to whom the gospell was neuer preached that he might get praise by his owne proper labour. Therefore those preachers which go not to that people which haue need to be conuerted, but to those which are conuerted alreadie, which haue apostles of their owne, that is to say, bishops and priests, and yet do boast ouer another mans flocke, are not true apostles, but false prophets.

The thirtie fifth signe is, because true apostles when they are sent, go to their owne dioceese, and not to another mans dioceese, euen as Paul being sent, went to the Gentiles when he purposed to preach. Acts 13. Separat Paul and Barnabas for the businesse which I haue chosen them vnto. Glosia: According to the appointment and decree of James, Cephas, and John, went he forth to be a teacher vnto the Gentiles. But those preachers that stand vpon their feet; that is to say, those preachers which haue but smal worldly substance, for which cause they are more readie to go which way soeuer it shall please the Lord to send them, I say, the Lord hath sent them to preach, not to those which be sufficiently learned, but to those that are infidels, as we reade in Ezech. 2. After that, the spirit of the Lord set Ezechiel vpon his feet, In quam spiritus venus tangitur, and he said vnto him: O sonne of man, behold I send thee to the nations which haue start backe from their profession, which haue gone from me, that is, to the Iewish herettikes, and to those nations which sometime haue been christians, as the Egyptians, the Babylonians, and all those that obserue the law of Mahomet. Therefore, if such go to those that are alreadie instructed, and hauing both apostles, bishops, and priests of their owne; they go not into their owne dioceese, but into another mans dioceese, and are not true apostles, but false preachers. And it is greatly to be feared, lest the church be in hazard and danger by such, vnlesse they be thrust out of the same betime; euen as Jonas, which vnlesse he was sent to Niniuie of the Lord, which is interpreted large or wide, and leadeth to the hill: that is, to the infidels we spake of before. They go not to those infidels according to the commandement of the Lord, but they turne another way, take their iourney into Tharsis, which is interpreted, fishing after top and pleasure; that is, they go vnto those which receiue them with top and gladnesse, and do well prouide for them, that is to say, to godly and deuout christians: and therefore it is to be feared, lest the ship in which they be (that is, the church) be in great perill, vnlesse they be throwne forth. And therefore the apostle spake of such false prophets not without good cause, 2. Tim. 2. And thus thou shalt do. Glosia: That is, such men as those be.

The thirtie sixth signe is, because true apostles do not boast, neither do they attribute vnto themselues any other thing, but in that God hath wrought the same by them. Paul, Rom. 15. saith: I dare not say any thing but that which Christ hath wrought and accomplished by me. Glosia: That is, I speake only those things (which by me) that is, by my ministerie Christ hath wrought. They therefore that boast of many things, and do attribute much vnto themselues which they neuer did, are not true apostles, but false prophets.

The thirtie seuenth signe is, that true apostles do not applie themselues or leane to logicall or philosophicall reasons. Therefore those preachers which do indeuour themselues to such kind of reasons, are not true apostles, but false prophets.

The thirtie eight signe is, that true apostles do not loue carnallie or after the flesh, but hate what thing soeuer doth resist them in the seruice of God, as Luke 14. He that doth not hate his father and mother, his sonne and daughter, and also himselfe, he cannot be my disciple. Glosia: That is, he that doth not hate whatsoeuer doth resist or let him in the seruice of God, is not worthie to be a disciple, neither can be abide in that office. Therefore for so much as true preachers are the true disciples of the Lord, it must needes follow that those preachers which do prouide their nephewes and kinsfolkes (how vniwardlie soeuer they do) to ecclesiasticall promotions and liuings, contrarie to the will of God, or do any other thing that letteth or hindereth them in the seruice of God, are not true apostles, but false prophets.

The thirtie ninth signe is, that true apostles do not hunt for the friendship of this world: for he that is the friend of this world, is the enemie of God, therefore those preachers which purchase the friendship of this world are not true apostles, but false prophets. Therefore for so much as the scripture is infallible, as in the twentie fourth chapter of Matthew, saying: Heauen and earth shall perish, but my words shall endure for euer; and the holy Ghost which spake in the apostles cannot lie: for prophecie (for the most part) is not spoken by the will of man, but the holy men of God spake by the inspiration of the holie Ghost, as if it is read in the first epistle of Peter, the first chapter: it remaineth, that all men, which are bound to defend the church, may rise vp in the defence of the same, according vnto that in the 24. chapter of the Prouerbs; Deliuer those that are led to death, and cease thou not to rescue those which are drawen to destruction. Neither may he alleage saine accusations, because it is said in the same place: The say he is not able or strong enough, he that beholdeth the thoughts of mens hearts, shall know it, &c. What soeuer perisheth in the church of God for want of preachers, all that shall be demanded of them at the day of iudgement; as Jacob confesseth to Laban, whose sheepe he fed, Genesis 31. I did restore all thy losse, and that which was stolne I made answere for. I will demand his blod at thy hands, Ezechiel 3. This is said to the pastor or prelat. But if other things which we haue spoken of before could not moue the prelats and cardinals, this at the least should moue them; because that then the spirituall power which doth consist for the most part in the exercise of preaching, in hearing confessions, and enioyning of penance, shall be taken away from them by little and little, for by piece meale doth the wolfe deuour the poore and needie man. Quest. chap. 1. When the authoritie ecclesiasticall therefore shall be quite taken from them and disposed to others, such as either by their order apostolicall grant, do challenge to haue the same; then doubtlesse shall neither the iurisdiction of ciuill causes and pleadings, nor anie authoritie that such prelats haue yet remaining, neither yet the possessions of the temporall goods of the church, any longer remaine amongst them. Shall such haue the temporall goods of the church which minister not the spirituall treasure thereof? 1. Cor. 9. Know ye not that they which till the sacrifice, ought to eat of the sacrifice; and they that serue at the altar, are partakers of the altar? For as the bodie without the soule cannot stand, so corporall things without spirituall things cannot continue, 1 quest. 1. if any shall take away the same. Thus haue you had the 39 arguments, for the which both he the said Gulielmus was condemned, and his bookes burned.

In the dales of this Gulielmus, there was a most detestable and blasphemous booke set forth by the friers (mentioned also in Matth. Parisiensis) which they called Euangelium æternum, or Euangelium Spiritus sancti: That is, The euerlasting gospell, or the gospell of the holy Ghost. In which booke many abominable errours of the friers were contained. So that the gospell of Jesus Christ was vtterlie defaced, which this booke said, was not to be compared with this euerlasting gospell, no to more then the shell is to be compared with the kernell, then darknesse to light, &c. Moreouer, that the gospell of Christ shall be preached no longer but fifty yeeres, and then this everlasting gospell should rule the church, &c. Item, that whatsoeuer was in the whole Bible, was in the said gospell contained. At length the friers gospell was ascribed to the pope, and six persons choisen of the whole Vniuersitie to peruse and iudge of the booke: as Christianus canonicus Baluacensis, Odo de Doaco, Nicolaus de Baro, Iohannes de Sicca Villa Anglus, Iohannes Belim Gallus. Among whom this Gulielmus was one, who mightily impugned this pestiferous and diuellish booke. These sir, after the perusing of the booke were sent vp to Rome. The friers likewise sent their messengers withall, where they were refuted, and the errours of the booke condemned; but so, that the pope with the cardinals commanded the said booke to be abolished and condemned not publikely (tendering the efumation of the religious orders, as of his owne most chiefe champions) but that they should be burned in secret wise, and the bookes of the forsaid Guilehnus to be burnt withall.

The scholemen and their vnlearned gospell ous detractors.

The gospell and writings of the friers condemned with much ado of the pope.

Besides other his bookes, two sermons we haue of his yet remaining, one vpon the gospell of S. Luke, of the Pharisie and the Publican, the other vpon the epistle read in the church on May day: where in the first he resembleth the Pharisies to our monkes, and that he proueth by all the properties of the Pharisies described in the gospel. The Publican he resembleth to the lattie, such as for because the lower they are reduced to acknowledge their sinnes, the more hope they haue of mercie. The other, because they stand confident in their owne righteousnesse, are therefore further from their iustification. In the latter sermon he setteth forth and declareth what perils and dangers be like to fall vpon the church by these religious orders of monkes and friers.

Among the other besides of that age, which withstood the bishop of Rome and his antichristian errors, was one Laurence an Englishman, and master of Paris. Another was Petrus Iohannes a Monoit, of whom the forsaid Laurence was about the yeare of our Lord 1260, who in his teaching, preaching and writing, did stoutly defend the part of the forsaid Gulielmus and the rest of his side against the friers. Against the which friers he wrote two bookes; one in the defence of William afore mentioned: the other vpon this argument and title: To beware of false prophets, &c. Certaine other things also he wrote, wherein by diuers proofes and testimonies he argued and proued that antichrist was not far off to come.

Laurentius Anglicus commended of the pope. Desensa Gulielmi. Contendum a friende of reformation. The pope antichrist. The synagogue of the friers to be great Babylon. Ex Nicolao Eymerico in libro suorum inquisitorum. Petrus Iohannes burned after his death.

The other Petrus Iohannes was about the yeere of our Lord 1260, which taught and maintained many things against the pope, prouing that he was antichrist, and that the synagogue of Rome was great Babylon. He wrote vpon Matthew, vpon the epistles, and vpon the Apocalypse. Mention of this Petrus Iohannes is made in Nicolaus Emericus, in libr. Inquisitionum, &c. And saith moreouer that Michael Cesenas (of whom Christ willing shall follow hereafter) toke of him a great part of his opinions: and because the pope could not burne him alive after his death he caused his bones to be taken vp and burned.

To these and with these aboue specified, is to be added Robertus Gallus, who being borne of a right noble parentage, for deuotion sake was made a Dominike frier, about the same yeere of our Lord aboue touched, Anno 1250. This man, as appeareth by his writing, had diuers and sundrie visions, whereof part is annexed with the visions and prophecie of Hildegardis. His visions all tend against the spiritualitie of Rome, where in the first chapter he calleth plainly the pope an idoll, which hauing eyes seeth not, neither listeth to see the abominations of his people, nor the execsiue enormitie of their voluptuousnesse, but only to see to the heaping vp of his owne treasure, and hauing a mouth speaketh not, but saith: I haue set good men ouer them (which is sufficient for me) to do them good either by my selfe, or by some other. And it followeth in the same chapter: Woe to that idoll, woe to the mighty and proud, who shall be equall in all the earth to that idoll: he that exalted vp his name in earth, saying: Who shall bring me vnder? Is not my house compared with the mightie potentats of the land? I am higher then kings, knights on their horsebacke do service vnto me: that which my fathers had not before me, that haue I done to me. My house is stroled with siluer, gold and perle are the pauement of my palace, &c.

Robertus Gallus his prophesie against the pope.

Againe in the twelfth chapter and also in the first, vnder the name of a serpent he painteth out the pope, whom he declareth to extoll himselfe aboue measure, and to oppresse the few that be godly, and to haue many false prophets about him, which neglecting the word and name of Christ, do preach and extoll him only, obscuring the name of Christ. The church of Rome and the pope he describeth in these words: I was praying (said he) on my knees, looking vpward to heauen here to the altar of S. Iames in Paris, on the right side of the altar, and saw in the aire before me the bodie of a certaine high bishop all clothed in white silke, who turning his backe on the east, lift vp his hand towards the west, as the priests are wont in their masse turning to the people, but his head was not seene. And as I was considering aduisedly whether he had any head or no: I perceiued a certaine head in him all die, leane and withered, as though it had been a head of wood. And the spirit of the Lord said to me: This signifieth the state of the church of Rome.

The pope described. The bishop of Rome. The state of the church of Rome disabled.

Moreouer, the same author in his visions well describing the manner of the schole sophisters and Sorbonists addeth in this wise: Another day as I was in like contemplation as before, I beheld in spirit: and behold I saw a man apparelled like to the other before, which went about hauing fine bread and excellent wine that hanged about him on both sides, and the same hauing in his hand a long and an hard flint stone, was gnawing hungerly vpon the same, as one being hungrie is wont to bite vpon a loafe of bread: out of the which stone came two heads of two serpents, the spirit of the Lord instructing me and saying: This stone purposeth the friuolous, intricat, and curious questions, wherein the hungrie do trauell and labour, leauing the substantiall food of their soules. And I asked what these two heads did meane: And he said, The name of the one is vain-glorie, the name of the other is the marring and dissipating of religion.

The schole-men and their friuolous questions described.

Also, concerning reformation of the church, this vision he declareth: It hapned as I was (saith he) in the same citie in the house of a certaine noble man (a Britaine) and was there speaking with certaine; I saw a crosse of siluer very bright, much like to the crosse of the earle of Tholouse. But the fiue knops apples which did hang beside in the armes of the crosse were very vile, like the apples which the sea is wont to cast vp. And I said: What is this Lord Iesu? And the Spirit answered me: This crosse which thou seest is the church, which shall be cleare and bright in pureneese of life, and shall be heard and knowne all ouer through the shrill voice of the preaching of sincere veritie. Then being troubled with the apples, I asked what these apples so vile did signifie? And he said; It is the humiliation of the church, &c.

The reformation of the church prefigured.

This godly man did forewarne (as in a certaine chronicle is declared) how God would punish the simonie and anarice of the clergie with such a plague that riuers should run with blood, &c. It is said that there is remaining a great volume of his visions which are not yet abroad, for these that be abroad are but a briefe extract out of his visions and reuelations.

The simonie and auarice of the clergie de punished.

After that we haue thus long strayed in these forren stories of Frederike, and in the tractation of other matters pertaining to other countries, now after this sufficient digretion, it is time that we returne to our owne cauntrie againe. Where, in following the continuation of time and course of the church, we will now adioyne to these godfathers and writers, the historie of the learned bishop of Lincolne named Robert Grosthead, a man famously learned, as that time serued, in the three tongues both Latine, Greeke, and Hebrew, also in all liberall sciences: whose works and sermons yet to this day are extant, which I haue seene in the Queenes maiesties librarie at Westminster. Wherein is one speciall sermon written and exhibited in foure sundrie scrols to the pope, and to other foure cardinals, beginning Dominus noster Iesus Christus, &c. Nicolas Trinet in his chronicle writing of this bishop, affirmeth that he was borne in Suffolke, in the diocesse of Northfolke: who giuing him the praise to be a man of excellent wisdome, of profound doctrine, and an example of all vertue, withall, that he being master of arts, wrote first a commentary in libum posteriorum Aristotle. Also that he wrote tractations, De sphæra, & de arte computi, and that he set forth diuers bookes concerning philosophie. Afterward being doctor in diuinitie, and expertly seene in all the three tongues, drew out sundrie treatises out of the Hebrew glosses, also translated diuers workes out of the Greeke, as namely the testament of the twelue patriarches, and the bookes of Dionysius, commenting vpon the new translation of your owne glosse: Hæcille. Many other works and volumes besides were written by the said Grosthead, as De oculo morali, De dotibus, De cessatione legalium, paruus Cato, Annotationes in Suidam, in Boetium, De potestate pastorali, Expositiones in Gen. in Lucam, with a number more, besides diuers epistles, sermons & tractures sent to the pope for his vnmeasurable exactions wherewith he ouercharged & oppressed the church of England.

This godly and learned bishop after diuers conflicts and agonies sustained against the bishop of Rome, after the example of Frederike, of Guliel. de sancto amore, of Nico. Gallus, and other mainded; at length after great labors and trauels of life finished his course, and departed at Bugden in the moneth of October. An. 1252. Of his decease thus writeth Matth. Paris, pag. 278. Out of the prison and banishment of this world (which he neuer loued) was taken the holy bishop of Lincolne Robert, at his manor of Bugden in the euen of S. Dionyse, who was an open reprouer of the pope and of the king, a ruler of the prelats, a corrector of the monkes, a diuider of the priests, an instructer of the clerkes, a fauter of scholars, a preacher to the people, a persecutor of the incontinent, a diligent searcher of the Scriptures, a mill to the Romans, and a contemner of their doings, &c. Hitherto Matth. What a mall he was to the Romans, in the sequell hereof (Christ willing) shall better appeare. The storie is this:

The death of Robert Grosthead.

Matthæus Parisiensis Hist. Angl.

It so befell among other daily and intollerable exactions, wherein pope Innocent was grieuous and iniurious (manifold waies) to the realme of England, he had a certaine cosin or nephew (so popes were wont to call their sonnes) named Frederike, being yet yong and vnder yeares, whom the said Innocent

The troubles of Robert Grosthead with the pope.

Innocent the pope would needs preferre to be a canon or prebendarie in the church of Lincolne, in this time of Robert bishop of the said church; and vpon the same directed diuerse letters to certaine his factors here in England for the execution thereof. The copy of which letter by chance, yet not by chance, but by the opportune sending of God came to my handes, as I was penning this present storie written in the end of an old parchment booke, and otherwise rare I suppose to be found, as is this.

Pope Innocent the fourth of that name.

The pope vnreasonable letter.

Vnto our welbeloued sonnes the archdeacon of Canturburie, and to master Innocent our scribe abiding in England, greeting and apostolicall benediction. For so much as our welbeloued sonne G. of S. Eustace deacon cardinall, vpon our speciall commandement hath giuen and granted to our welbeloued son Frederike de Lauania (a clerke and our nephew) a canonship in the church of Lincolne with full power and grant of the same: inuesting him also corporally and presently with his owne ring in the said canonship, to be from henceforth canon of Lincolne, and to haue full power of the said canonship in the church, and a prebend when any shall fall in the church of Lincolne: from that time, since which our former letters of late, concerning this receiuing and prouision to be giuen to him in the said church, were presented and exhibited to our reuerend brother the bishop of Lincolne, or else after the next auoiding the said prebendship shall be giuen to any other man beside, and also denouncing the sentence of excommunication against all them that shall rebell and gainsay the same, as in the letters of the said cardinall is more fully contained.

Wherefore, egregiously inclined by the deuout supplication of the said Frederike, ratifying and gratefully approuing that which hath been done by the said cardinals in the premisses, haue thought good by the authoritie apostolicall to confirme. Wherefore we giue in commandement by our letters apostolicall to your wisedomes, that you will see the said Frederike (or his proctor in his behalfe) to be really and corporally possessed in the said canonship or prebend by our authoritie, and also defend the said partie being therein possessed, denouncing the sentence of excommunication against all such as shall withstand the same, all manner of customes or statutes to the contrarie notwithstanding, corroborated either with oth, or confirmations of the see apostolike, or by what stay or let soeuer; or whether that the said Frederike be not present to take the oth accustomed to be giuen for obseruing the customes of the said church, or whether it be giuen and granted by the said see to the forsaid bishop, or to the chapter of the said church iointly and seuerallie, or to what person or persons else, that no man by compulsion should haue admission or prouision for any person in their church whereby they cannot be interdicted, suspended, or excommunicat by the letters apostolicall obtained, or to be obtained hereafter, vnder what forme or words soeuer; yea although the whole tenour of the said indulgence bee inserted word for word in the said your letters, or by any other indulgences to what person or persons soeuer, of what estate, dignitie or place soeuer, vnder any manner or forme of words, granted hereafter by the see apostolike, by the which indulgences the effect of the said prouision may bee by any manner of waies hindered or deferred: yet of our certaine knowledge wee will that they shall want their strength in the prouision made or to be made for the said Frederike in the church of Lincolne. And if anie vpon the premisses or anie of them shall alleage against the foresaid Frederike, or his procurator, that you will cause them to be cited on our behalfe: so that they being cited peremptorilie, shall within the space of two moneths of your citation, personally appeare before vs there according to the law to make answere to the said Frederike vpon the premisses: any priuiledges or indulgences whatsoeuer giuen and granted either generally to the kingdome of England, or peculiarly to anie other person of what state, degree, and place soeuer, granted by the forsaid see, vnder whatsoeuer manner and forme of words for them not to be called vp beyond the sea, or out of their owne citie or diocesse by letters apostolicall, vnder whatsoeuer forme of words obtained, to the contrarie in any wise notwithstanding. Al which priuiledges and indulgences, we will in no case shall stand in any force or effect to the said parties. Moreouer, the day and soirne of the citation we will that ye faithfullie do intimat vnto vs by your letters containing the tenour thereof, and if both of you cannot be present at the execution hereof, yet we will notwithstanding that one of you doe execute the same without faile. Dated the 7. kal. Februarie, the 10. yeare of our popedome.

As there is no man which hath any eyes to see, but may easilie vnderstand in reading this letter of the pope, how vnreasonable his requestis, how vnpudently he commandeth, how proudly he threatneth, how wickedly he oppresseth and racketh the church of God, in playing boyes and strangers in the ministerie and cure of soules, and also in making them his prouisors, to raueu vp the church goods: so is it no great maruell, if this godly bishop Robert Grosthead was offended therewith, who in my mind deserueth herein a double commendation, not onelie that he so wisely did discerne error from sincerite and truth; but also that he was so hardie and constant to stand to the defence thereof against the pope, according as in this his answere to the pope against may appeare, as followeth.

A double commendation of bishop Grosthead.

The answere of Robert Grosthead.

The answere of Robert Grosthead to the pope.

SAlutem. Pleaseth it your wisdome to vnderstand, that I am not disobedient to anie the apostolike precepts, but both deuoutly and reuerently with the naturall affection of a sonne obey the same, and also am an vtter enemie to all those that resist such apostolike precepts, as a child zealous of his fathers honor. And truly I am no lesse then bound thereunto by the precept and commandement of God. For the apostolike precepts are none other, no cant be, then consonant and vniforme to the doctrine of the apostles, and of our Sauiour Christ being the master and Lord of all the apostles: whose type and person, specially in the consonant and vniforme hierarchie of the church, the lord pope seemeth to beare (the lord our Lord and Sauiour Iesus Christ, saying) Whosoeuer is not with me, the same is against me. Therefore, against him neither is nor can be the most diuine sanctitie of the see apostolicall. The tenour then of your foresaid apostolicall letter is not consonant to true sanctitie, but vtterly dissonant and disagreeing to the same. First, for that vpon the clause of this your letter and many such other letters like, which clause alwaies ye so much do vrge (Non obstante) induced and brought in vpon no necessitie of any naturall law to be obserued: both swarme and flow with all inconstancie, boldnesse, pertinacie, impudencie, lying, and deceiuing, and is also a sea of mistrust in giuing credit to no man. Which as it swarmeth with these, so in like manner with vnnumerable other vices which hang and depend vpon the same:

moouing and disturbing the puritie of christian religion and life agreeable to the same, as also the publike tranquillitie of men. Moreouer, neer after the time of Lucifer, which shall be in the latter time, to wit, of antichrist the child of perdition, whom the Lord shall destroy with the breath of his mouth; there is not nor can be any kind of sinne so repugnant and contrarie to the doctrine of the apostles and holie scripture, and to our Sauiour Christ himselfe more hatefull, detestable and abominable, then to destroy and kill mens soules, by withstanding them of the ministerie of the pastorall office, which by the ministerie of the pastor rightlie ought to saue and quicken the same. Which sinne by reason of the great authoritie and libertie, which the pastors haue in the most eminent places of the scripture such men are deserned and become to commit, which being in the authority of the pastorall dignitie, do serue their owne carnall desires and necessaries, with the benefit of the milke and wooll of the sheepe and flock of Christ, and do not minister the same pastorall office and charge to the benefit and saluation of those their sheep. The same thers to the testimonie of the scripture is not the administration of the pastorall ministerie, but the killing and destruction of the sheepe. And that these two kind of vices be most vile and wicked (although after a differing sort) and far exceeding all other kind of wickednesse, hereby it is manifest: for that the same are directly contrarie to two verines most chiefly god (although differing in themselues) and iustlie together. For that is called most wicked, which is contrarie to a thing most best. So much the more is such the offenders, the one of their offences is directlie against the deitie, which of himselfe is alwaies essentiallie and supernaturally god: the other is against the verification and the image of God in man, which is not alwaies, but by the participation of Gods legitimate grace essentially and naturally good. And for so much as in things being good, the cause of euill is worse then the effect; and like as against in euill things, the cause of euill is worse then the effect of euil proceeding thereof: hereby it is manifest, that the inducers of such wicked pestors of Gods image and deification in the sheepe of Christ (that is, the church of God) are worse then those chefe destroyers, to wit, Lucifer and antichrist.

How much then and in these degrees of wickednesse how much more excellent such be, who hauing a great charge committed to them of God to edification and not to destruction) are more bound to keepe away and exclude such wicked destroyers from the church of God: so much is it also off that, that this holy seat apostolicall, to whom the Lord Jesus Christ hath giuen all maner of power (to edification as the apostle saith, and not to destruction) can commend, or will go about any such thing, by reason whereof so great wickednesse, so odible, detestable and abominable to our Lord Jesus Christ, and also so pernicious to mankind should be a great defection, corruption, and abuse of the said seat and fulnesse of power, and an vtter separation from the glorious throne of our Lord Jesus Christ, and a neere neighbourhood vnto the two most principall princes of darknesse, sitting in the chaire of pestilence, prepared to the paines of hell. Neither can any man which is subiect and faithfull to the said see (and not cut away from the bodie of Christ, and from the said holy see) with sincere and vnfeigned conscience obey such maner of precepts and commandements, or what soeuer other attempts proceeding, yea though from the high order of angels themselues, but rather ought of necessitie with all their strength to withstand and rebell against the same. Wherefore my reuerend lord, I like an obedient child vpon me bound duetie of obedience and filiolitie which I owe to both the parents of this holy apostolike see, and partly for loue of vnitie in the bodie of Christ coupled with the said see, do not obey but withstand and vtterly rebell against these things in the said letter contained, and especially which urge and tend to the foresaid wickednesse, so abominable to the Lord Jesus Christ, so repugnant to the holinesse of the holie apostolike see, and so contrarie to the vnitie of the catholike faith. Neither for this cause can your discretion determine my reuerence to me, because all my doing and gainsaying in this matter is no resistance nor rebellion, but a childly obedience to the diuine precept, and honor due both to father and mother. Wherefore repeating my words I say, that this holy apostolike see cannot do any thing but to edification, and nothing at all to destruction: for this is the fulnesse of power, to be able to do all things to edification. But these which you call promotions be not to edification, but to manifest destruction. The holy apostolike see therefore cannot nor ought to attempt any such thing, because that flesh and blood which cannot enter into the kingdome of God hath reuealed the same, and not the father of our Lord Jesus Christ which is in heauen.

Then followeth it in the storie both of Matth. Parisiensis, and of Florilegus, in these words: That when this epistle came to the knowledge of the pope, he fuming and fretting with anger and indignation, answered with a fierce looke and proud mind, saying: What old doting frantike wretch is this, so bold in and rashly to iudge of my doings? My maister S. Peter and Paul were it not but that vpon our whole clemencie and good nature we are refrained, we would bridle him downe to such confusion that we would make him a fable, a gazing stocke, an example and wonderment to all the world. For is not the king of England our baffall? and to say more, our manciple or page (to vse the very words of mine author) which may at our pleasure and becke both hamper him, vnpoison him, and put him out of hurt? This when the pope in his great fury and rage had vttered amongst his brethren the cardinals, who were scarce able to appease the furious violence of the pope, with milde moderation of words they said vnto him; that it was not expedient for them to proceed against that bishop in such rigorous manner. For, said they, to confesse the truth to your holines, it is but verie truth that he affirmeth, neither can we condemne him therefore. For is not a catholike man, yea also a holy man? more holie and also religious then we our selues? a man of excellent wit, and excellent life? so as it is wrought, among all the prelates he hath not his better, nor yet his like. This is not vnknowne both to the French and English clergie vniuersallie, neither can our contradiction preuaile against him. The truth of this his epistle perhaps is knowne now to many, and shall dir vp many against vs: for he hath the name to be a great philosopher, and singularly seene in all the tongues, both Greeke, Latine and Hebrue: zealous in iustice, a reader of diuinitie in the schooles, a preacher amongst the people, a lourer of chastitie, and a persecutor of simonie. These words spake L. Giles a Spanish cardinall to the pope, and others more mouued by their conscience to speake. And this counsell they gaue to the pope, that he should dissemble and winke at the like things, as one not seeing or regarding them; lest otherwise perhaps some tumult might rise and spring thereof: especially seeing this is manifest and knowne to all men, that once must needs come a defection and parting from the church of Rome.

Giles cardinall dissuadeth the pope but vnwisely to the contrarie.

The pope accused of sundrie grosse enormities.

Not long after this (about the canicular daies) this reuerend and godly Robert bishop of Lincolne lying at his manor place in Buggden, fell grieuously sicke; and thereupon within few dayes departed. In the time of his sickenesse he called to him a certaine frier of the preaching order, named S. John Giles, a man expert and cunning both in physike and diuinitie, partly to receiue of him some comfort of his book, and partly to confer with him in spirituall matters. There vpon vpon a time day, the said bishop entering with the foresaid S. John, and reciting to him the doings and proceedings of the pope, did grieuously rebuke and reprehend his fellow brethren the preaching friers, and the other order also of the minorits; that for so much as their order being planted in wilfull pouerty of the spirit, to the intent they should more freely carpe and reproue the vices of the mightie, and not to flatter or spare them, but sharpely to rebuke and reprehend the same: the said friers contrarie to their profession did not boldly enough crie out and inueigh against the abuses of their superiours and men of power: nor did procure no detect their faults and wickednesse; and therefore, said the bishop, I iudge them to be no better then manifest heretikes. And addeth moreouer, demanding of S. Iohn, what is heresie: and that he should giue him the true definition thereof. Whereat when the frier did stay a pause, not remembring the solemne definition of that matter; the bishop thereupon inferreth, giuing this definition in Latine by the true interpretation of the Greeke word: Heresis Grece, electio Latine, est sententia humano sensu electa, scripture sacre contraria, palam dicta, pertinaciter defensa. That is: Heresie is a sentence taken and chosen of mans owne head, owne braine, contrary to holy scripture, openly maintained, and stifflie defended. And this definition giuen, consequently he inferred, sharpely reprehending the prelats of the church, but especially the Romans, which commit the charge of soules vnto their kinsfolkes, being both in age vnworthie and in learning vnsufficient. To giue (saith he) the charge of soules to a boy, is a sentence of a prelat chosen after a maner of mans owne head, only for carnall and worldly respect, and also is contrarie to holie Scripture, the which forbiddeth any such to be made ministers or pastors, which are not sufficient to driue away the wolues. And moreouer it is also openly maintained, because it is manifestly borne abroad and commanded, that charges imbulled both with war and lead; and finally is suffred to withstand the same, he is sus- pended and excommunicated, and open war cried out against him: therefore to whom the whole definition of an heretike doth agree, he is a verie heretike. But euery faithfull christian man ought to set himselfe against an heretike as much as he may. Wherefore he that can resist him and doth not, he sinneth, and seemeth to be a fautor thereof, according to the saying of Gregorie; he lacketh not conscience, of secret societie, which ceaseth to resist open iniquitie. But the friers both Franciscans and Dominikes are most chiefly bound to withstand such, seeing both of them haue the gift of preaching committed to them by their office, and be more apt to the said office, by reason of their pouertie: and therefore doe not only offend in not resisting such, but also are to be counted maintainers of the same, according to the sentence of the apostle to the Romans, saying; Not only they which commit such things, but also they that consent are worthie of death. Wherefore it may be concluded, that as well the pope (vnlesse he cease from that vice) as also the same friers, vnlesse they shew themselues more earnest and studious in repelling the same, are both worthie of death, that is perpetuall damnation. Item saith the canon decretall, that vpon this vice of heresie the pope both may and ought to be accused. After Bishop Grosthead's letter to the pope.

The pope accused of sundrie grosse enormities by bishop Grosthead. The craftie practise of rescriuers. 295

After this the vehemencie of his disease more and more increasing, and because the nights were some what longer: the third night before his departure, the bishop feeling his infirmitie to grow vpon him, willed certaine of his clergie to be called to him, thereby to be refreshed with some conference or communication. Vnto whom the bishop mourning and lamenting in his mind for the losse of soules, though the auarice of the popes court, said on this wise, as by certaine apothegmes.

Grosthead's sicknesse and last words against the pope.

1 Christ came into the world to saue and win soules: Ergo, he that seareth not to destroy soules, may he not worthilie bee counted antichrist?

2 The Lord created the whole world in fiue daies, but in reforming of man he laboured more then thirtie yeres. Wherefore he that is a destroyer of that, about which the lord so long laboured, is not he worthie to be counted the enemie of God, and antichrist?

3 The pope hath not impudently to abnihilat and disanull the priuiledges of his holy predecessors of Romane bishops, by this obstacle (Non obstante) which is not done without the preiudice and manifest iniurie of them. For in so doing he doth repugne and destroy that which so many and so holy men haue builded vp before, and thus seemeth he to bee a contemner of the saints. Worthilie therefore he that contemneth shall bee contemned, according to the saying of Esay: Woe to thee that dost despise, for hast not thou thy selfe bespoken? And who shall keepe his priuiledges, which so breaketh the priuiledges of others?

The pope abnihilateth the priuiledges of his predecessors.

4 The pope auowering thereunto thus defendeth perhaps his error: He that is equall, hath no superioritie ouer his equall: Therefore, no pope hath power to binde me being pope as well as he. To this answer againe (quoth the bishop) it is enough to me, that he that now presently is falling in the dangerous seas of this world, and hee that is safely arriued in the haven, hauing all at ieopardies, are not both like and equall. Graunt that some popes be saued (God forbid any should say contrarie:) Then saith our sauior: He that is least in the kingdome of heauen, is greater then Iohn Baptist, a greater then whom there neuer rose amongst the children of men. Is not there some pope greater, being a greater and confirmer of priuiledges then this that is aliue? Truely me thinks he is greater, therefore he hath dominion ouer his inferiors.

The pope accused for abrogating the acts and constitutions of his predecessors. Proued that the pope alone is not licensed to his predecessors before him, and therefore to haue no authoritie to infringe the priuiledges of other popes.

5 Doth not the pope thus say, speaking of all his predecessors to the most part: This our predecessor, and this our predecessor of most worthie memorie, &c. And againe, (Ille, saith hee) cleauing to, or following the steps of our predecessors, &c. And why then do such popes as come after, destroy these foundations which their predecessors haue laid?

6 Many apostolike men coming after, haue confirmed some priuiledge being granted by others before; and be not many bishops being alreadie saued by the grace of God, to bee counted greater and better then one bishop which hath not yet attained, but standeth in danger to obtaine that which the other haue got alreadie?

Preuised by the example of Dennis, that men more ancient in time ought to be preferred in higher reuerence.

7 Also other former fathers and bishops of the apostolical see, in preferment of time go before the others which in time come after. And those whom the estimation of ancient time doth aduance, such are we bound to esteeme and to haue in more reuerence. This did the holy man Benedict well consider, who in his rule preferreth such as came first in time, what soeuer men they were before them, which (albeit being more ancient in yeares) came after them into the order, and commandeth them to be their superiors, and to haue the pre-eminence. Which being so (as it is) true and certaine, how commeth then this iniurious and rash presumption, which dare reuoke and disanull the old priuiledges of many ancient holy bishops, in time and in reuerence going before them?

Heresie quid.

Definition of heresie.

The pope vpbraided for violating of Merit.

8 Moreouer, and though many popes haue been grieuous to the church, yet this pope most specialie hath brought it most into seruitude and manifold wales hath dammified the same. For these Caursini, these open pillours, whom our holy forefathers and doctors, whom we haue seene, and namely our learned maister in France preacher, alio the abbat of Flay a Cistercian, maister Iacobus de Veteri, and maister Stephan, archbishop of Canturburie in the time of his banishment, and also maister Robert Curcum, with his preaching, banished out of France, for before that time these kind of vsurers were neuer knowne in England; the same Caursini, these wicked vsurers, I say, were by this pope induced, supported and maintained; so that if any doe speake against them, hee is miserablie tolled and trounsed by his labour, whereof partly Roger bishop of London hath some experience.

The pope reuiued here an heretike.

Against vsurers.

9 The world doth know, that vsurie is counted a detestable thing in both the testaments, and is forbidden of God. But now the popes vsurers or exchangers, the verie Iewes crying out against them, being openly suffered in London to exercise their vsurie, to the great damage and detriment of all ecclesiasticall persons, but especially bodies of religion, compelling such as bee in pouertie to counterfet and to put to their seales to forged writings, which is no lesse then to commit idolatrie and to abrenounce the veritie which is God himselfe. As for example: I borrowed 100. marks for a yeere in stead of a hundred pounds; I am compelled to make my writing and to seale the same, confessing that I haue receiued and borrowed one hundred pounds, to the repaid againe at the yeeres end to such a man, &c. And if it shall chance that your occupying be such, that within a month you bring againe the principall to the popes vsurer, hee will receiue no lesse notwithstanding then his full hundred pounds: which condition of vsurie is much woorse then that of the Iewes. For to the Iew what principall you bring, hee will require no more then proportionallie for the commensuration of so much time, wherein his monie hath been out of his hands.

The popes vsurers woorse then the Iewes.

10 Moreouer, to haue seene and knowne the pope to haue giuen in charge and commandement to the friers preachers, and minorits, to inquire diligently for such as lie sicke and like to die, and so comming to them diligently to perswade them to make their wils and testaments laudable to the profit and subsidie of the holy land, and to take the croise vpon them, that if they doe amend, they may bring them in the land: and if they die, they may well get the monie from their executors.

Crosse taken to the holy land, sold for money by the pope.

11 To haue known likewise and seene men that haue taken the vow and signe of the crosse vpon them, to bee sold vnto lay men, as cheape and oft as were wont in time past to bee sold in the temple.

Remission of sinnes sold for monie.

We haue seene with our eies the popes letter, in which we haue found this to be written: That they which bequeath any thing to the behoofe or subsidie of the holy land, shall receiue so much indulgence as they haue disbursed monie.

The pope accused to be vniuersall to the churches in his promotions and reseruations.

12 Ouer and besides all this, the pope in diuers and sundrie his letters, hath willed and commanded prelats to receiue into ecclesiasticall benefices, and to prouide some such liuing in their churches, as shall be sufficient to such and such a stranger (being both absent and also vnknowne) which haue neither learning, nor yet the behoofe of the countrie: whereby they are neither able to preach nor to heare confessions, nor to keepe residence for, to refresh the poore and wayfarers.

The pope accused to be vniuersall to the abbat of S. Albans.

13 Item, we know and haue seene our selues, that the pope hath written to the abbat of S. Albons, to prouide for one called Iohn de Canezana whom he neuer saw, in some competent benefice. Whereupon, in few daies after, when prouision was made for him in a certaine church, worth fortie marks by the yere and more, the partie being not therewith contented, complained to the pope; who then writing to the foresaid abbat commanded him to prouide for the foresaid S. Iohn in some better thing, reserning notwithstanding the gift of the former benefice to himselfe.

The pope accused for violent exception.

14 Againe, not long after came also to the house of the foresaid abbat, two other persons like begging vagabonds, bringing with them the popes letters: in the tenor wherof the abbat was commanded, that incontinent vpon the sight thereof, he should giue and disburse to the said persons for the expedition and dispatch of his affaires ten marks in hand, without any delay or defeating: the which persons returning vnto the abbat proud and threatning words, he was faine to agree with them and send them away.

The pope accused for reuocation and confirming former acts of the predecessor with a temporall affaires.

15 Item, of men which are both holy and well learned, which haue left the world for the following of God in such order as they ought not to turne backe againe, the pope of them maketh his tollers and banners to get in his monie: the which charge they are compelled against their wils to take vpon them, lest they should seeme to be disobedient. And so of spirituall men are made more secular then the most secular. And so the baseneſſe of their chimmers and scapilers which they weare, doth proue them to be liers: whilest vnder the habit of pouertie and humiliation there lurketh the spirit of pride and elation. And because no legat may be sent into England, but being first required of the king the pope sendeth sophisticall legats and such as bee disguised and counterfet in apparell, and are garded with great might and power: neither is it hard to bring forth examples thereof: For so many such daelie do come into the realme, that to heare the names of them recited, it would be tedious for any man to heare.

The pope accused for vnlimited dispensations.

16 Furthermore, as we haue seene our selues: the pope graunteth to a secular fauour, that a man may haue a bishoprike, and yet be no bishop consecrated, Sed electus sempiternus, that is, elect for euer. Which is as much to signifie, to haue the milke and the wooll of the sheepe, and not to keepe the wolues away from the sheepe: to retaine the rents of a bishop, and not to discharge the function of a bishop.

And when this godly bishop had thus reproued these and such other detestable enormities of the court of Rome; as all kinds of auarice, their sturie, their simonie, their extortion, all kinds of filthinesse, fleshlie lust, gluttonie, and their sumptuous apparell raigning in that court: then saith hee, this old verse may be truelie verified vpon it:

Eius auaritie totus non sufficit orbis,
Eius luxurie meretrix non sufficit omnis.

All the world cannot suffice their greedie couetous mind,
Nor all the drabs and naughtie packs their filthie lusting kind.

Afterwards he went about more to prosecute, how the foresaid court like a gulfe neuer satisfied, euer gaping so wide, that

The death of Robert Grosthead bishop of Lincolne.

And for so much as mention hath been made before of the insatiable auarice of the popes court by his inordinat prouisions and reseruations, it is testified by the said author Matthæus Paris, that the foresaid Robert Grosthead being bishop of Lincolne, caused to be viewed and considered diligentlie of his clerks what the reuenues of forreners and strangers within England sent in by the pope, came to by the yeere, and it was found and euidently tried, that this pope now present, Innocentius the fourth, did vnpourcith the vniuersall church three hundred thirteene dosme, more then all his predecessors from the time the pope first began. So that the reuenues of forreners and clerks placed by him here in England, vnto the reuenues of the seuen and ten thousand marks and aboue, whereas the mere reuenues of the crowne came not to thirty thousand.

What the reuenues of the popes of Rome yeerelie were in England in the time of king Henrie the third by the priest.

Ex Ceffrenſi. lib. 7.

Of this Robert Grosthead writeth Ceffrensis in his seuenth booke of his historie, that partly for that it grieued him to see the intollerable exactions of the pope in this realme, and partly because he refused to admit a certaine young nephue of the pope to be canon of his church (as hath been before recited) hee therefore writing vnto the pope, and signifying that he could not admit any such persons into his church, which neither knew themselues nor the tongue of the people, nor the charter knew themselues nor the tongue of the people, nor the charter committed vnto them: was called by to Rome, and there excommunicated, who then appealing from the pope, shortly after departed, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1253. It chanced within two yeeres after his decease, the said pope Innocent being asleepe, a certaine bishop apparelled bishoplike, appeared vnto him, and striking him with his staffe on the left side, said, Surge miser veni in iudicium: that is, Rise wretch and come to thy iudgement. The next day after, the pope was found amazed, as a man stricken on the side with the stroke of a staffe. This Robert though he was greatlie commended for his sanctimonie, and as Ceffrensis saith, for his miracles: yet was he not permitted in the court of Rome to bee aduanced in the catalogue of saints. And this much out of Ceffrensis concerning this matter. But Mat. Paris and the author of Flores historiarum, prosecuting this storie more at large, addeth this more vnto it and saith, that pope Innocent the next yeere following, which was An. 1254. being passing angrie, contrarie to the mind of his brethren the cardinals, would haue the bones of the foresaid bishop of Lincolne cast out of the church, and purposed to bring him into such spite and hatred of the people, that he should be counted an ethnike, a rebell, and disobedient person through the whole world. And thereupon caused his letters to bee written and sent downe to the king of England, knowing that the king would gladlie ferue him therein, to haue the spoile of the bishop and of his church. But in the night following the said bishop of Lincolne appeared vnto him as comming in his pontificall vs, and with a seuere countenance, sterne looke, and terrible voice speaking vnto him being in his bed, and smiting him on the side with a vehement stroke with the end of his crosse staffe thus said: O thou seruile, lasie, old, bald, lousie, wretched, doting pope: hast thou purposed to cast my bones out of the church to the shame and slander of me? How commeth this rash vnaduisednesse in thy head? It were more meet for thee being thus aduanced by God, and honored, to make much of the zealous seruants of God, although departed. The Lord will not suffer thee henceforth to haue any more power ouer me. I haue written vnto thee in the spirit of humilitie and loue, that then (houldest see my manifold errors; but thou with a proud eie and disdainfull hart hast despised my wholesome admonitions. Vnto to thee that despisest, shall not thou also be despised? And so the bishop departed from the pope, stricken, as is said, on the side, left him for halfe dead, and so living in sorrow and lamentation. Whereupon his chamberlains being amazed, hearing these things, came running to the pope to know what him ailed. To whom the pope much troubled and vered in his spirit, said: that great terrors in his sleepe vehemently disturbed and mol-fred him, in such sort that he thought he shuld neuer retoure it, nor bee restored to himselfe again. Oh saith he, how sore is my fire, and how egerlie it vexeth me, as being run through with a speare! Neither did the pope eat or drinke all that day, but fainting himselfe to be sicke of a burning ague, kept in. And yet the vnd gination of the vnsull hand of God (saith the storie) so left him not.

The popes new and vniust stile giuen to the Scottish bishops by the pope of Lincolne.

The pope displeased in his mind.

For after the wholesome admonitions giuen to him by the seruant of God, the pope not regarding them, but all set vpon war, suppression of his enemies, and secular affairs, gaue his mind wholie vnto them; and yet all his labors, counsils, and deuises bestowed vpon them, could neuer prosper after that day in that he went about. For the pope the same time hauing war with the Apulians, all his armie fighting vnder the popes nephue their captaine, were slaine and confounded the number of many thousands: whose lamentable slaughter all the countrie of the Romans did much bewaile. The pope not yet quiet in his mind, directly his iourny towards Naples, although sore vexed in his side like a man sicke of a pleurisie, or smitten rather with a speare, neither could any physicke of his cardinals helpe him. For Robert of Lincolne (saith the story) did not spare him; and bee that would not heare him gentlie correcting him being aliue, his stripes did he feele when he was dead, so that he neuer after that inioyed any iuckie or prosperous day, till the time of his death, nor yet any prosperous or quiet night vntill the morning. And so continued he vnto his death, which shortly after insued: he being at Naples, An. 1255.

Anno 1255

A note to the reader concerning the appearing of dead men.

Or as N. Triuet recordeth, An. 1254. And thus haue ye the whole discourse betweene Robert Grosthead and pope Innocent.

In the which storie is to bee noted, gentle reader, that although in the storie of Ceffrensis, of Matthew Paris, and of Flor. hist. it is expreslie testified and reported, that the pope was smitten with the staffe of Robert the foresaid bishop of Lincolne; yet thou must wisely vnderstand, that howsoeuer Gods hand dealeth here in this world in punishing his enemies, or howsoeuer the image of things not seene but fantasied, offer themselues to the secret cogitation of man, his senses bring a sleepe, by the operation or permission of God, working after some spirituall influence in our imaginations: certaine it is, that no dead man materially can euer rise against or appeare, before the iudgement day, to any man with his staffe or without his staffe, to worke any feat, after he haue once departed this life.

A prebendship of Paules giuen both of the pope and of the king at one time to two seuerall persons.

Differsion betweene the archbishop of Canturburie and the church of Lincolne.

After the death of this Robert Grosthead bishop of Lincolne, great dissension fell betweene the archbishop of Canturburie Boniface, and the canons of the said church of Lincolne, about the right of giuing prebendships, and about the reuenues of the said church, in time of the bishops see being now vacant. Which right and power the archbishop claimed to himselfe, but the canons of that church (maintaining the contrarie side) stood against him, and for the same were excommunicated of the archbishop. Among whom one maister Woolde resisting the archbishop, to the face, in the name of all the other canons, made by his speciale to Rome, where much money on both sides was spent. At length after this Grosthead, was elected Henrie Leruton in the see of Lincolne.

About which time the wicked Jewes at Lincolne had crucified, whipped, and tormented a certaine child named Hugo of nine yeeres of age, An. 1255, in the moneth of August. Ex Guak. Gisburne. At length the child being sought and found by the mother, being cast in a pit; two and thirtie of those abominable Jews were put to execution. Whereof Mat. Paris reciteth a long tale. The same or like fact was also intended by the like Jewes at Dosweth twentie yeres before, vpon a certain child, whom they had first circumcised, and detained a whole yeere in custodie, intending to crucifie him, for which the Jewes were sent vp to the towne of London, of whom eightene were hanged, and the rest remained long in prison: Ex Cestrenſi. lib. 7. Of this wicked Jewish people I find also in the booke Flor. hist. that about this yeere of our Lord 1255. they began first to be expelled out of France, by the commandement of the French king, being then in Palestina, warring against the Turks: by the occasion that it was obieted then by the Turke against him and other christian princes, for the retaining the Jewes amongst them, which did crucifie our saiuour, and warring against them which did not crucifie him. Ex Flor. hist. For these Jewes moreouer king Henrie the same yeere, 1255. caused to be giuen vnto him eight thousand marks in paine of hanging. Who being much grieued therewith, and complaining that the king went about their destruction, desired leaue to be giuen them of the king, that they might depart the realme, neuer to returne againe. But the king committed the doing of that matter vnto earle Richard his brother, to inforce them to pay the monie whether they would or no. Moreouer of the same Jewes mention is made in the storie intituled Eulogium. Of the Jewes in Northhampton, who had among themselues prepared wild fire, to burne the citie of London, for the which diuers of them were taken, and burned in the time of Lent, in the said citie of Northhampton, which was two yeeres before, about the yeere of our Lord 1253. Ex Eulogio. And so forsmuch as mention here is made of the Jewes, I cannot omit what some English stories write of a certaine Jew, who not long after this time about the yeere of our Lord 1257. fell into a pitte at Denkesburie vpon a sabbath day, which for the great reuerence he had to his holy sabbath, would not suffer himselfe to be plucked out. And so lord Richard earle of Glocester, hearing thereof, would not suffer him to bee drawne out on sunday for reuerence of the holy day. And thus the wretched superstitious Jew remaining there till monday, was found dead in the dung.

Pope Alexander to make spite to monsir maker the king beleeue his son should be king of Apulia.

Richard the kings brother made king of Almaine.

Hereunto moreouer might be adioyned, how pope Alexander abusing and mocking the kings simplicitie, made him beleeue that he would make his sonne Edmund king of Apulia, so that hee would sustaine the charges and cost thereof, to maintaine the war which thereto should appertaine. Whereby the king cast in a sudden hope, caused his sonne incontinent to bee proclaimed king of Apulia; and vpon the same sent vp to the pope all the riches he could well make in his realme. And thus was the realme inuaded with wastes miserable impouerished to inrich the pope: Ex. Flor. hist. About which season, Richard earle of Cornwall the kings brother, was made king of Almaine by the electors.

What ciuill discord worketh.

Here might be shewed moreouer and added to the stories aboue, how the next yere following, which was 1259. as Nicolas Triuet writeth, the king entring into France, required the restitution of such lands in Normandie and Anion, as of old right were due vnto him, and wrongfullie withholden from him. But the French king against alleaged saying, that the countrie of Normandie by old time was not giuen away from the crowne of France, but vsurped, and by force extorted by Rollo, &c. In conclusion, the king fearing and suspecting the hearts of his nobles, and taking for none other but for rebellion at home, durst not trie with them, but was compelled to agree with them vpon such peace and conditions as hee could get, which was this: That hee should haue of the French king thirteene hundred thousand of Turen pounds, with so much landes else as came to the value of twentie thousand pounds in peerelie rent: so should he resigne fullie and purelie to the hands of the French king, all such lands and possessions which he had in France. Whereby the king giuing ouer his stile and titles which he had in those parts, ceased then to bee called duke of Normandie, or earle of Anion.

Resignation of the ca. tesons of Normandie and Anion.

Albeit it be true that Gilburne writeth, the king afterward repenting of his deed, did neuer receiue the monie in all his life, neither did he cease during his life to intitle himselfe duke of Normandie. But after him, his sonne Edward and his successor in their stile left out the title to bee called duke of Normandie, &c. Ex Gisburn.

The conflict and skirmish betweene the Northerne Welchmen, and the Southern betweene Oxford.

Besides many other matters omitted, here I ouerpasse also the sore and vehement conflict, not betweene the frogs and the mise which Homer writeth of, but the mightie pitched field fought in the yeere of our Lord 1259. betweene the young students and scholars of the Vniuersitie of Oxford, hauing no other occasion, as I read in Mat. Paris, but onelie the diuersitie of the countrie where they were borne. For the Northerne men men ioyning with the Welchmen, to trie their manhood against the Southerne part, fell both parts together in such a battle, with their ensignes and warlike aray, that in conclusion diuers on both sides were slaine. This hearie and bloudie conflict burning and increasing among them, the end was this: that the Northerne lads with the Welch had the victorie. After that furie and fiery fiercenesse had done what it could, the victors bethinking at length with themselues, partly what they had done, partly how it would be taken of the higher powers, and fearing due punishment to fall vpon them, especiallie seeing the brother of Leolin prince of Wales, and sonne of Simon Mountfort, was newlie dead in prison, drawing their counsell and helps together, they offer to king Henrie 4000. marks, to Edward his sonne 200. and to the queene 200. to bee released of their trespasse. But the king answering them against that hee set more price by the life of one true subiect, then by all which by them was offered, would in no wise receiue their money. And so the students without hope of peace, went home with small triumph, hearing what the common prouerbe meaneth, Dulce bellum inexpertis. Notwithstanding, the king being then occupied in great affaires and warres, partlie with Leolin and the Welchmen, partlie inwrapped with discord at home with his nobles, had no leisure to attend to the correction of these Vniuersitie men, which was, An. 1259. Ex Matt. Parisiensi. Likewise concerning the dissention following the next yeare after, in the Vniuersitie of Paris betweene the students there, and the friers, the number of whom then did so much increase, that the commons vneth was able to sustaine them with their almes. Also betweene the Vniuersities both of Oxford & Cambridge, for a certaine prisoner taken out of prison by strength, and brought into sanctuarie the same yeare, as is testified in Matthew Paris, An. 1259. In like manner touching the variance betweene the archbishop of Canturburie, and the chapter of Lincolne. Againe, betweene the said archbishop of Canturburie, and the chapter and bishop of London; and how the said bishop at his consecration would not make his profession to the archbishop but with this exception, Saluis iure & libertate ecclesiæ Londinensis, quæ pro posse meo defendam in omnibus, &c: recorded in Flor. hist. All which wranglings and dissensions, with innumerable others raigning daily in the church at those daies, if I had so much leisure to prosecute them as I find them in stories remaining, might sufficiently induce vs to vnderstand what small peace and agreement was then ioyned with that doctrine and religion in those daies, during the state and raigne of antichrist.

Little peace in the popes church.

These with many such other matters more, which heere might bee discoursed and stored at large, being more foreen then ecclesiasticall, for breuitie I doe purposelie contract and omit, cutting off all such superfluities as may seeme more curious to write vpon, then necessarie to be knowne.

Discoues good rules for example.

This that followeth, concerning the pitifull and turbulent commotion betweene the king and the nobles, which lasted a long season: because it is lamentable and contayneth much fruitfull example, both for princes and subiects to behold and looke vpon, to see what mischiefe and inconuenience groweth in common weales, where ſhame of mutuall concead lacketh, that is, where neither the prince regardeth the offending of his subiects, and where the subiects forget the office of christian patience, in suffering their princes iniuries by Gods wrath inflicted for their sinnes: therefore, in explaining the order and story thereof, I thought it not vnprofitable to occupie the reader with a little more variance in perusing the full discourse of this so lamentable a matter, and so pernicious to the publike weale.

The occasion of ciuill discord betweene the kings and the nobles.

And first to declare the occasions and first beginnings of this tumult, here is to be vnderstood, which before was signified, how king Henrie married with Eleonor, daughter of the earle of Prouans a stranger, which was about the yeere of our Lord 1234, whereupon a great noze was opened to strangers, not onelie to enter the land, but also to replenish the court: to whom the king seemed more to incline his fauour, aduancing them to more preferment, then his owne naturall English lords, which thing was to them no little grieuance. Moreouer, before was declared how the king by Isabell his mother, who was a stranger, had diuers brethren, whom hee nourished vp with great liuings and possessions, and large pensions of monie, which was another hart sore to diuers, and also an hinderance. Once and beside hath also been declared, what vnreasonable collections of monie from time to time, as quindecims, subsidies, tenths, mercements, fines, paiments, loues, and taxes, haue been leuied by the king, as well of the spiritualtie, as of the lay sort, partlie for maintaining the kings wars against Wales, against Scotland and France, to recouer Normandie; partlie for helping the kings debts, boinges, and other expenses; partlie for the kingdome of Apulia, which was promised the kings sonne by the pope: partlie for monying and supporting the pope in his wars against the emperour. By reason of all which sundrie and importable collections, the common wealth of the realme was vtterlie exhausted, to the great impouerishment of vore Englishmen. Neither did it a little vex the people, to see the king call in so many legats from Rome euery yeere, which did nothing else but transport the English monie vnto the popes coffers. Besides all this, what variance and alteration hath been betweene the king and his subiects about the liberties of Magna charta, and De foresta, granted by king John, and after confirmed by this king, in the former councell holden at Oxford, hath been before declared.

Perhaps this might be also some peece of a cause, that the king considering and bearing in mind the old iniuries done of the lords and barons to his father king John before him, did beare some grudge therefore, or some priuie hatred vnto the nobilitie, to reuenge his fathers quarrell: but of things vncertaine I haue nothing certainelie to affirme. This is certaine by truth of histoire, that the peeple rent inuaing, which was 1260. thus writeth Nic. Triuet, that the kings iustices called Itinerarij, being sent thither to execute their office, were from thence repelled: the cause being alleaged, for that they were against the king in proceeding & enterprising against the forme of the prouisions enacted and stablished a little before at the towne of Oxford.

✠ In this yeere it pleased the king after sute to him made, to licence a Vniuersitie or academicall schole to bee planted in the towne of Northhampton; and of a speciall fauour (which he pretended to beare (and like inough did indeed) vnto the scholars that went there to seat themselues, and to professe the exercises of studies, wrote his letters inmanerie vnto the cheefe officers and others of the said burrow, in the said students behalfe; the tenor whereof followeth agreeing with the record.

The kings letter to the maior, bailiffes, and others the inhabitants of Northhampton, in the behalfe of certaine scholars minded to plant themselues there as in an Vniuersitie.

Turris Lond.

R*Ex dilectis & fidelibus suis, maiori, ballinis, & ceteris probis hominibus suis de Northampton, salutem. Cum quidam magistri & alij scholares proponant, &c.* In English thus.

The king to his beloued and trustie the maior, bailiffes, and other honest men his subiects of Northhampton, greeting. Whereas certaine masters and other scholars doe purpose to tarrie in your towne corporat, there to exercise scholarlie discipline, as we heare: wee heereupon regarding the seruice of God, and the greater profit of our kingdome, taking in good part the comming thither of the said scholars, and liking well their abode there, doe will and grant that the said scholars in the said towne corporat vnder our protection and defence, doe safelie and securely abide, and there exercise and doe such things, as to such scholars shall belong. And therefore we command you and straitly charge you, that when the said scholars shall come vnto you, to tarrie in your said corporat towne, you receiue them courteouslie, and as becommeth the state of scholars vse them, not doing or suffering to bee done vnto them any impediment, molestation, or grieuance. In witnesse whereof, wee haue caused these our letters patents to bee made. Witnesse the king at Windesore, the first day of February, in the fiue and fortith yeere of his raigne.

Touching a Vniuersitie to bee kept at Northhampton.

It befell moreouer in the same peare, about other times (as Gualter Hemingford writeth) that a great number of aliens comming out of France and other prouinces, resorted into England, and had heere the doing of all principall matters of the realme vnder the king. Vnto whom the rewards and reliefs, and other emoluments of the land did most chiefly redound: which thing to see, did not a little trouble and vex the nobilitie and baronage of England. In so much that Simon Mountfort earle of Leicester, offering to stand to death for the liberties and wealth of the realme, conferred thereof with other lords and barons vpon the matter; who then comming vnto the king after an humble suit of petition, declared vnto him how all the doings of his realme, and his owne affaires, were altogether disposed by the hands, and after the wils of strangers, neither profitable vnto him, nor to the weale publike: for so much as his treasures being wasted and consumed, hee was in great debt, neither was able to satisfie the prouision of his owne house, but driuen to tallie for his owne cates, to no small dishonor vnto his owne state. And now therefore, said they, pleaseth your highnesse to be informed by our aduice, and to commit your house to the guiding and gouernment of your owne faithfull and naturall subiects, and we will take vpon vs to discharge your whole debt within one peare of our own proper goods and reuenues, so that wee within fiue yeeres may cleare our selues againe. Neither will we diminish your familie, but rather increase it with a much greater retinue; prouiding so for the safetie and seeing to the custodie of your roiall person, as your highnesse shall find and vnderstand our diligence most trustie and faithfull vnto you in the end.

Strangers hauing all the wealth of the realme vnder the king. Ex Gualt. Gisburn.

The lords tender their seruice to the king.

To these words so louingly declared, so humblie pretended, so hartily and freely offered, the king as willinglie condescended, assigning vnto them both day and place where to confer and to deliberat further vpon the matter, which should be at Oxford the fifteenth day after Easter. At which day and place, all the states and lords, with the bishops of the realme, were summoned to appeare at the said towne of Oxford for the behalfe of the king and the realme commented together. Where first of the king himselfe, then of the lords, an oth was taken, that what decrees or lawes in the said assemblie should be prouided to the profit of the king and of the realme, the same vnto them should be kept and obserued to the honor of God, and vtilitie of his church, and wealth of the realme. Besides these lords and the king, were also nine bishops, which sweare ring vnto the same, did excommunicat all such as should gainstand the said prouisions there made, the king holding a burning taper in his hand, and the lords openly protesting to rise with all their force against all them that shall stand against the same.

The king sweareth to the prouisions made at Oxford.

There were at that present in the realme foure brethren of the kings (moll part of them by the mothers side) which would in no case agree heereunto, but in anger departed priuilie vnto Winchester. The nobles hearing thereof, in all speedie wise pursued them, fearing lest they should take the citie of Winchester and for ceable keepe the same. Wherefore the lords preuenting their purpose, and seeing them stiffe to perſist in their stubborne sentence, wrought no other violence against them, but returning to Oxford again, preserued to them these conditions, that they departing the realme should repaire to their owne lands and possessions, which they had beyond the sea: and that forthwith they should put this inunction in execution. Notwithstanding that the king made for them great intercession, yet it take no place. And because this should seeme to proceed of no speciall displeasure against them, they enacted moreouer, that all strangers and aliens of what state or condition soeuer, should forthwith auoid the realme in paine of death. Diuers other prouisions the same time were ordained & stablished; that if any did hold of the king in whole or in part, and should chance him to depart (his heire being vnder age) the wardship of him should belong to the king, as hath partlie before been specified.

Moreouer, it was there decreed, that the wall of England should be wrought only within the realme, neither should it be transported out to strangers.

Item, that no man should weare any cloth, but which was wrought and made onely within the realme.

Diuers in this councell impoſed.

Item, that all excessiue and prodigall expences wasted vpon pleasure and superfluitie, should be eschewed of all persons.

Many other lawes and decrees (saith the author) in this assemblie were ordained, wherein they continued the space of fiftene daies; and many of them were impoſoned, of whom was the abbat of Westminster, a man in that order, much commended. Also William brother to the earle of Glocester, also the earle himselfe being impoſoned, hardly escaped with life, his haire and nailes falling off his bodie, wherevpon the author not long after was taken, and dulie executed at Winchester. In the meane time, the nobles considering those dangers and ieopardies, were constrained to breake off for that time, appointing the fourteenth day of October next following to consuent together at London with weapō and harnesse, to prosecute and finish the residue that was in the said councell to be concluded. All which at the time and place appointed was fully accomplished, and the acts thereof in order of writing promulgated, and so committed to execution.

The king repenteth of his oth. Anno 1261

After the promulgation whereof many things therein displeased the king, and it began to repent him of his oth. But because he could not at that present otherwise chuse, he dissembled for a season. Thus time passing on, within a peare following, which was in the peere of our Lord 1261. the king seeing himselfe more and more to grow in debt, and not to bee relieued according to promise made, but especially being egged (as may be thought) by his brethren taking it to stomach, sent vp to the pope, both for him and his sonne Edward to bee released of their oth made before at Oxford. The benefit of which absolution being easilie obtained (or rather bought at the popes hand) the king stepping backe from all that was before concluded, calleth another parliament at Oxford: where hee before the lords and nobles declared, how in the late councell of Oxford they had agreed among themselues for the common vtilitie of the realme and of the king, as they pretended, for the increasing of his treasure, and his debt to be diminished. And therupon bound themselues with an oth, causing alſo himselfe and his sonne Edward to bee bound vnto the same. But now by experience proouing and trying the matter to bee otherwise then their promise was; and that they contrarie to their couenant made, sought not so much the profit of him and of the realme, as their owne, taking him not as their lord, but going about to bring him vnder their subiection as an vnderling; and for that moreouer his treasure greatly decreasing, his debts increased, and his princely liberalitie was cut short and troden vnder foot: they should not maruell therefore, if he henceforth would bee no more ruled by their counsell, but would prouide himselfe of some other remedie, such as hee might. And moreouer, as touching the oth wherewith he and his sonne stood bound vnto them, he had sent alreadie to Rome, and had obtained absolution and dispensation of the same, both for him and his sonne Edward alſo, and for all others that would take his part. And therefore hee required of them to be restored againe to that state and condition he had inioyed in times past.

The popes abolition abated.

The answer of the nobles against the king.

To this againe gaue answer the state of nobilitie on the other side, being in the same place present: in the number of whom was Simon Mountfort earle of Leicester, Richard Clare earle of Glocester, Humfrey Bonne earle Ferrence with a great number of barons, as lord John Fitz John, lord Hastings, lord Geffreie Lucie, lord John Uescie, lord William Segraue, Hugh Spenser, lord Robert Uesmont, with diuers and many more; whose answer to the king againe was this: That the prouisions made at the councell of Oxford (thereunto they were sworne) they would hold, defend and maintaine to their liues end: for so much as they did found, and also were agreed vpon, both to the honor of God, to the profit of the prince, and stable wealth of the realme, &c. And thus warres on both sides discording amongst themselues, would so haue departed, had not certaine of the bishops comming betweene both, laboured betweene them to take vp the matter. Vp whose meane (saith Gualter Gisburne) and procurement, the determination of the cause was brought in compromise, and referred to Ludouike the French king to iudge betweit them; who hearing both the allegations (saith he) like no equall iudge but a partiall friend, inclined wholly and fullie to the kings sentence, and condemned the nobles. But the author of Flores historiarum saith, that by the mediation of discreet men, two were chosen, one for one side, the other for the other, to whom the third also was annexed, who hearing as well what was brought of the kings part, as also what was answered of the other, should define betweene them both, and so peace was betweene them concluded till the comming of Edward. All this while as yet the popes absolution for the king, although it was granted and obtained at Rome, yet was it not brought downe in solemne writing, neither was prince Edward as yet returned out of France into England.

The centrouersie betweene the king and the nobles put in compromise.

The pope reuoketh the losing of his oth.

At length, the writing of the kings absolution being brought from Rome, the king ecclesons commanded the same to bee published throughout the realme, and lendeth to the French king and other strangers for helpe; moreouer seiseth all his castels into his owne hand, reciting the counsell of the lords, to whose custodie they were before committed; also removing the former officers, as iustices, and the chancellor, with other placed afore by the lords, hee appointed new in their stead.

To this foresaid absolution procured from Rome for the king and his sonne, Edward returning out of France, at that time did not giue his consent, but held with the lords. Who then putting themselues in armes, with a great power repaired vp to London, keeping there in the suburbs and places about, while the king kept within the towre, causing the citie gates to bee watched and lockt, and all within the said citie being aboue the age of twelue peeres, to be sworne vnto him. But at length though the meanes of certaine comming betweene, this tumultuous perturbation was some what appeased, at least some hope of peace appeared, so that the matter was taken vp for that time without war or bloudshed. Notwithstanding, some false pretenced dissemblers there were, which secretly discloſing all the counsels and doings of the lords vnto the king, did all they could to hinder concord, and to kindle debate. By the means of whom the purpose of the lords came not to so good effect, as otherwise it might. Ex Flor. hist.

Ordinances in a parliament holden at London against the kings right.

✠ In this peere the archbishop of Canturburie with his suffragans (after their wonted manner) standing against the king, had made their appeale to Rome: whereupon the king was faine to answer by proxie, as appeareth by this briefe note drawne out of record. Rex constituit Johannē Hemingford procuratorem suum in causa appellationis, &c. The king hath appointed and made John Hemingford his proctor in a cause of appeale which is mooued in the court of Rome, betweene the king on the one part, and the archbishop of Canturburie with his suffragans on the other part, about certaine ordinances, constitutions, and decrees lately in a councell piouincial at Londō by them published, to the preiudice of the king's right, his dignitie royall, the liberties, lawes and customs of his kingdome.

This matter no doubt was laboured verie diligentlie by the said John Hemingford, who was to that end authorised by the king to make his abode at Rome, during the time that any manner of processe was held and maintained against him, to the impeaching of his voialtie. Wherof the king had a speciall regard, perceiuing the waiwardnesse of his owne clergie, or rather rebellionsnesse in daring to decree and ordaine lawes against him. And therefore he was the more carefull to haue all matters depending in the court of Rome concerning him and his, to be earnestlie followed. In so much as he stopped to the foresaid Hemingford in the charge of procuratie on, one Roger Louell: vnto which two residing at Rome, the king sent his letters, charging them so to manage his affaires, as that nothing might passe to the derogation of his roiall title: the copie of the said letter followeth agreeing with the prototypon or originall.

Rex magistris Johanni de Hemingford & Rogero Lovell procuratoribus suis in curia Romana agentibus salutē, &c. Cum vobis tanquam fidelibus nostris &c. In English thus.

The king to master John of Hemingford, and Roger Lovel his proctors pleading in the court of Rome, greeting. Forsomuchas vpon our true zeale and vowed care vnto the defence of our right and honour doth lie and as we haue, certaine of our realme pleading in the court of Rome, doe moue diuers matters to the preiudice of our right and honour, presuming and intending to preuaile against vs, we command you, and straitlie charge you, that on our behalfe you straitly forbid all and euery of them, that they presume not any further to vndertake such things as tend to the hurt of our maiestie, and the derogation of our honour, but wholly forbeare to so do, as they will auoid our indignation, and the perill of them and theirs. This inhibition also we will by you all and euery of you (so often as you shall see needful) to be made knowne, and thereupon by you or some of you to bee certified of the contemners of the same. Witnesse the king at Westminster the six and twentith of March, in the six and fortith yeere of his raigne.

Bishops going about to recouer benefices appropriated vnto religious houses. Ex Herridge Hist.

In this present yeere also (as affirmeth the forenamed author) it was rumored abroade (as Flores historiarum reporteth) that all the bishops of England went about to recouer againe out of the hands of religious men, all such churches and benefices, which were to them impropriated or appropriated: and that they, for the expedition of the same, had sent vp to Rome both messengers and money, nothing mistrusting to obtaine their purpose. But as little good fruit in those daies vsed to spring out of that see, so I doe not find that goodlie suite and labour of the bishops to take any fruitfull effect. The same yeere died pope Alexander, after whom succeeded pope Urban the fourth.

Pope Alexander dieth. Pope Urban. Anno 1262. A new release of the kings oath from Vienne, with the epitaph.

Hic pedes Hypocrita Pereūdis Gemefacta Vbiffi. Anno Christi, Mccclxxxvi. Vienne situs, Hic Treuirensis erat.

The Welchmen breake into the borders of England. The prouisions of Oxford granted by the king.

Of the which pope Vrban the king also obtained (or rather renued) a new releasement from his oth made to the prouisions and statutes of Oxford. Which being granted, hee commaunded incontinent all the foresaid lawes and prouisions through England to bee dissolued and broken. This done, the king with the queene taketh his voiage into France, where he fell into great infirmitie of sickenesse, and the most part of his familie taken with the feuer quartane, of which many died. In the number of whom beside others, died Richard the sonne of the earle of Glocester and Hereford, after whom succeeded Gilbert Clare his sonne.

The Welchmen this yeere breaking into the borders of England, did much annoiance in the lands of Roger lord Mortimer; but mightily against hy him were expelled, not without great slaughter of the inuaders. A cert which time, the king the high sonne diuerse counsell about him, incline to peace and ordered the nobles, granting of his meere voluntarie will the constitutions and prouisions of Oxford to take place in the realme, directing his commandement to euerie shire. Albeit the realme yet was not altogether pacified for all that.

The kings palace at Westminster burnt with fire.

In the latter end of this yeere, the kings palace at Westminster was burnt, and for the most part was all consumed with fire, which seemed to many an euill prognostike against the king. Ex Flor. hist.

Three pointed for taking about two pence a weeke in a pound. Anno 1263.

In some English chronicles it is also recorded, that the same yeere, fiue hundred Iewes at London were faine for taking vsurie more then two pence a weeke for twentie shillings, being before forbidden by the king to take aboue that rate by the weeke.

After the Easter tide of the yeere 1263. in which the barons of England confederating themselues together, for maintaining the statutes and lawes of Oxford, and partly mooued with old grudge conceiued against the strangers (maintained by the king and the queene, and Edward their sonne, in the realme of England towned polwers in all forceable wise, and first inuaded the said strangers, namelie them which were about the king. Their goods and manors they walled and spoiled, whether they were ecclesiasticall or temporall. Among whom, besides others, was Peter a Burgundian (bishop of Hereford a rich prelat) with all his treasure apprehended and spoiled: also his countriemen, whom he had placed to be canons of the same church. With like order of handling other aliens also, to whom was committed the custodie of diuers castels, as of Glocester, of Worcester, of Bridgenorth, were spoiled, impaisoned, and sent awaie. Briefly, whatsoeuer he was in all the land that could not speake the English tongue, was of euery rascall disdained, and happie if he might so escape. By reason wherof it so came to passe that a great number, as well of other forreuners, as especiallie religious men, and rich prelats (which here had gathered much substance) were vrged to that extremitie, that they were glad to flie the land. In the catalogue of whom was one most principall, named John Mansuell, a priest notoriously growne in riches and treasures not to bee told, hauing in his hand so many and rich benefices, that neere no bishop of this realme might compare with him in riches. Who notwithstanding he kept with the king at London, yet was compelled priuilie to voide the realme, and was persued by Henry the sonne of Richard king of Almaine. Certaine other strangers there were, to the number of 200. and more, which hauing the castell of Windsor, there mumured and intrenched themselues, to whom at length prince Edward also adioyned himselfe.

John Mansuell a rich priest.

In the meane time while this fire was abroad, the king lucking the Tower, and seeing the greatest part of his nobles and commons with the Londoners to be set against him, agreed to the peace of the barons, and was contented to assent againe to the ordinances and prouisions of Oxford; albeit the queene by all meanes possible went about to persuade the king not to assent thereto: who as it seemed, was a great worker in kindling this fire of discord betweene the king and the barons. Insomuch that when as the said queene Elenor should passe by barge from the Tower to Windsor, the Londoners standing vpon the bridge, with their exclamations, cursings, and throwing of stones and dirt at her, interrupted her course, causing her to returne to the Tower againe. Notwithstanding, the peace yet continued with the nobles and the king, the sonne whereof was this. First, that Henrie the sonne of Richard king of the Romans should bee deliuered by the king and queene. Secondly, that the castles againe should be committed to the custodie of Englishmen, not of strangers. Thirdly, that the prouisions and statutes decreed at Oxford, should as well by the king, as by all others inuiolable be obserued. Fourthlie, that the realm henceforth should be ruled and gouerned not by forreuners, but by personages borne within the land. Fiftly, that all aliens and strangers should void the land, and neuer returne againe; except only such, whose abode should by the common assent of the kings trustie subiects be admitted and allowed.

The king a gaine with the nobles.

The queene a great cauſer of this debate.

The foure ſet peace betweene the king and the nobles.

Thus the king and the nobles ioyning together after this forme of peace aboue prefixed, although not fullie with heart, as after appeared, put themselues in armes with all their power to recouer the castell of Windsor out of the strangers hands. But Edward in the mid way betweene London & the castell, meeting with his father and the barons, entred communication vpon the matter. Which being finished, and he thinking to returne into the castell againe, by the policie of the earle of Leicester, and William bishop of Worcester, was not permitted to retorne. Whereupon the strangers within the hold (destitute of all hope to withstand the great force approching) rendred the castell vnto the king, in the forme vpon this condition: That with horse and harnesse they might be suffered safe to depart the land, not to returne any more. Which being granted, certaine of the barons conducted them in their iourny towards the sea side, and there they left them.

The castell of Windsor rendred vnto the ſelfe hands of ſtrangers.

In the same yeere about the beginning of October, the king and queene made ouer to France, with Simon Mountfort and other nobles, as heard and said to the entertainment of Lewis the French king, concerning the controuersie betweene the states of England, and all through the procurement of Elenor the queene. For she not forgetting the old contumelie of the Londoners reclaming against her vpon the bridge, wrought alwaies what reuenge she could against them. Concerning the arbitrement of this matter put to the French king, partlie hath been said before, and more shall be said (Christ willing) hereafter. Some stories do also moreouer, that the king determining long in France, word was sent to him out of England, that vnlesse he returned againe to the realme, they would elect a new king. Whereupon the king returning out of France to Doner, would haue entred the castell, but hee was stopped. Wherfore the king in fierce anger and great indignation prepared his power towards London; where Simon Mountfort the sonne the earle of Leicester, though a fubtill traine was almost betrawed and circumuented in Southwarke, by the subden pursuing of the kings armie; had not the Londoners with more speed breaking bars and chaines, made way to rescue him, by the meanes of whom the earle at that time escaped the danger.

Now to come to the sentence of the French king. Forsomuch as the arbitrement of this matter was committed to him, as hath before been specified; he in a great frequence both of French and English persons about him, conferring and pecuing the cause on both sides, betweene the king and the nobles: clearelp and solemnelie pronounced on the kings side against the barons, ordaining that the king of England all this while had suffered wrong, and that hee should be restored againe to his pristine state, notwithstanding the prouisions made at Oxford, which her ordained to be repealed and abrogated. *Ex Flor. hiſt. The ſentence of the French king, with the king of Englands againſt the barons.

The ſtudents of Oxford ſpared.

The sentence of the French king thus awarded, as it graue to the king of England with his retinue no little incouragement, so it wrought in the nob'es hearts great indignation; which, notwithstanding that partial decreement of the French king, fled themselues home out of France to defend themselues with all their strength and power. And not long after followed also the king, by whose traine Simon Mountfort earle of Leicester, (as is aboue recited) was well neere circumuented uented in Southwarke. Then the king calling his councell together at Oxford (from whence hee excluded the Vniuersitie of students for a season, who were then at Northhampton, as you haue heard before) there consulted, conferring with his friends and counsellors what way was best to be taken. And hearing that the barons were assembled in a great number at the towne of Northhampton, went thither with his host and with his banners displaied, accompanied with Richard his brother king of Almaine, also with Edward his sonne, John Cosmin of Scotland with many other Scots, John of Dalriolo lord of Galoway, Robert of Buse, lord Walter of Alnmo, Roger of Clifford, Philip of Parmion, John of Maus, Roger of Laiburne, Henrie Persie, Philip Basset, Roger of Mortimer, and William of Valence, and many others. Therefore the king commanded the barons, that were within, to yeeld vnto him presently the citie and the pledges, or else hee would immediatlie destroy them. Vnto whom they counselling with the younger Simon De Monte fort, (which by his fathers commandement had got the refidue thither to take counsell together, for his father & the earle of Glocester were not yet come) boldlie and with one mind answered, that they would not obay the kings will, but would rather defend themselues and the citie if nede were euen to the death. Which the noble men of the kings part hearing, sent word againe, that at the least they should come to the wall of the citie to speake to the king, if by any meanes peace might be made. And they suspecting no deceit, followed their counsell, and leauing their holds, came to the wall towards the medow, for there lay the king and his strong host hard by. But in the meane space, whilest diuers matters were reasoned and intreated of betweene the king and the barons, lord Philip Basset (which before was appointed to watch that feate) with mattocks and other instruments of iron and men prepared for the nonce, came to the masonrie of S. Andrew, did vndermine the wall of the citie: and by this meanes, the wall fell downe lightly, and there was made a great plaine, so that in one foresight there might haue gone together on a rou fortie horsemen. And of this subtilitie the alien monks that were there, were thought to be the workers, because they made way and entrance for them that came in. But when they that passed by saw this, and the kings banners were erected readie to enter in; there was a great howling made, and the noise of the people came to the eares of the barons, and they made speed to resist them: but it was all in vaine, because they were alreadie possessed of a great compasse of their enemies. But Simon Mountfort the younger, after he had hallanced a while in the middell of his enemies with Peter Mountfort, and a few that were with him, when Edward the kings sonne came, was by his commandement taken and led away prisoner. But the clerks of the Vniuersitie of Oxford (which Vniuersitie by the barons commandement was translated thither) did work against the kings men more hurt then the other barons, with their slings, long bowes, and crossebowes: for they had a hanter by themselues, and that was set vp on high against the king. Wherewithall the king being greatly moued, ware at his entring in, that they should all be hanged. Which when they heard, many of them shaued their crownes, and they that were able ran away as fast as they could. And when the king entred the citie, many fled in their armor into the castell; others left their horse and harnesse and ran into churches; and so all were taine, and those were of the common people: but there was not much bloudshed, because all things were done as vpon the sudden. When the city was at length set in quiet, the king commanded his oth to bee executed vpon the clerks. But his counsellors said vnto him: This be far from thee (O king, for the sonnes of thy nob'es, and of other great men of thy kingdom were there gathered together into the Vniuersitie; whom if thou should suffer to be hanged as slaue, doubtles that noble stocke thy part would rise vp against thee, not suffering to the vttermost of their powers the bloud of their sonnes and kinssolks to be shed. And to the king was pacified, and his wrath against the clerks was staid.

In the same day, after little more then an houre, the kings host assaulted the castel, and the new bold keepers were afraid, for that they had not victuals and other things necessarie for their resistance, therfore they sent immediatly in messengers vnto the king, and yeelded themselues to the kings mercie. There were taken that day these knights and barons vnder written: lord William de Ferrers, lord Peter Mountfort companion of the said Simon de Mountfort the younger, lord Baldwin de Wake, lord Adam de Newmarch, lord Roger Bertram, lord Simon the son of Simon a valiant warrior, which first erected his banner against the king, lord Wergrane, lord Walter Tirrule, lord Hugo Gubium, lord Thomas Mainsell, lord Roger Bolemam, Nicholas Wake, lord Robert de Neuton, lord Philip de Dabie, and Grimbald de Pauncefot. All these aforehand did the king take prisoners and many more, of whom he committed some to the lord Nicholas of Dauersam to be kept in the same castell well defenced: some he led away with him, and some hee sent to diuers castles, and appointed Simon Mountfort to be cast into Wallingford castle. And al these things as touching the taking of Northhampton were done on the Saboath day in passion week, being the third of April, in the yeere of our Lord 1264. and the king went forward euen to Nottingham, burning and wasting the manors of the lords and others his enemies, and there he gathered together his nobles, and greatly increased his number.

The king ſtirreth London.

When this ill lucke was told of them that there were run away to Earle Simon, which was comming towards Northhampton with a great host, he was in a great rage, yet was not discouraged: but immediatly going to London, caused a chariot to be made him after the manner of litters or coches, wherein he might ride as though he were sicke: for he feined himselfe to be feeble and weake, whereas he was indeed a stout and valiant warrior: and there gathered to him other noble men that were confederat with him, earles and barons, euery one bringing with them their seuerall armies, and preparing their engins of wod, they went to besege Rochester: for the earle of Worcester in the kings behalfe kept both the towne and castell. When they had gotten the first gate and the bridge, they were partly wounded and compelled to retire, and there that valiant knight Roger de la Bourne was wounded, and very ill handled. And whilest they continued segge there a while, it was told them that the king was comming towards London with a mightie host. And they sat done to an other. If the king at his comming should take London, he shall be shut in as it were in a strait corner: let vs therefore recurne vnto London, that we may keepe in safetie both the place and the people. Therefore appoin.ng certaine persons to keepe the segge, they returned to London. At the length when the king came, they went forth with the citizens to meet him, not with bowes and quiuers in their hands, but with swords & speares. The king of Scots then, and after he had wonne the castell of Kingston, whereof was the earle of Glocesters, he went from thence to Rochester, where after he had killed a few, he brake the segge, and from thence the king went to Cunbridge, and the towne and castell now being giuen vp to him, he take there the countesse of Glocester, and put her into an abbey, not to be kept in hold, but to go at liberte whither she would. And he left for the custodie of the castell and citie a great part of his host to the number of aboue twentie picked out enfignes, for that it was commonly said that the earle of Glocester would come out of hand to assault them. Which being done, he continued on his iourney to Winchester, where he received to peace the seamen of the hauen townes. And three daies after, vpon the sunday following, he came to the towne of Lewis, and was received into the abbey, and his sonne Edward into the castell. Then the barons sent letters to the king the twelfth day of May, the tenor whereof followeth.

Earle Simon Mountfort taketh Rochester.

Rochester besieged by the barons.

The letter of the barons to the king.

TO their most excellent lord Henry by the grace of God king of England, lord of Ireland, and duke of Aquitaine, his barons and others his faithfull subiects, being willing to keepe their oth and fidelitie to God and him, send greeting and due obedience with honor & reuerence. Whereas by many experiments it is manifest, that some of your graces affistants haue reported to your maiestie manie lies of vs, working mischiefe, as much as in them lieth not onlie against vs, but against you also, and your whole realme: be it knowne to your highnes, that wee haue beene alwaies willing to defend the health and safegard of your person with all our power & fealtie due to your grace, purposing to extend to the vttermost of our power and estate not onelie all ill willers, but also your enemies, and the enemies of your whole realme. If it be your good pleasure giue no credit to them, we shall be alwaies found your faithfull subiects. And wee the earle of Leicester, and Gilbert of Clare, at the request of others, for vs and them haue put to our seales.

These letters being read and heard, there was a counteell called, and the king writ backe to them, ſpecially to the two earles of Leiceſter and Glocester, in manner & forme following.

The anſwere of the king to the lords.

HEnry by the grace of God king of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Aquitaine, &c. To Simon Mountfort, & Gilbert de Clare, and their confederats. Forsomuch as by the war and generall disquietnes by your means raised vp in our whole realme, and also the burnings and other hurtfull enormities, it appeareth manifestlie that you keepe not your fidelitie to vs ward, nor care anie thing for our health or fafetie; and for that ye haue vnorderlie grieued our nobles, and others our faithfull subiects sticking faithfullie and constantlie to vs (as you haue certified vs) we accounting their losse as our owne, and their enemies as ours; and seeing thefe my aforesaid faithfull subiects for the keeping of their fidelitie, do assist vs manfullie and faithfullie against your vnfaithfulnesse: we therefore care not for your fidelitie or loue, but defie you as our and their enemies. Witnesse my selfe at Lewis the day and yeare aforesaid.

Mountfort, and Gilbert de Clare, and to all and singuler other their adherents in their conspiracie. By your letters which you sent to our lord the noble king of England wee haue vnderstanding that you desire vs, although before any such word, your defiance toward vs was apparant inough by your cruell persecution in burning our possessions, and spoiling our goods. We therefore giue you to wit, that wee all and euery one of vs, as your enemies, doe defie you all as our open enemies. And further, that wee will not cease, whersoeuer it shall lie in our power, to the vttermost of our force and might, to subuert your persons, and all that you haue. As touching that you lay to our charge, that we giue neither faithfull nor good counsell to our lord the king, you say not the truth. And if your lord Simon Mountfort, or Gilbert de Clare, will affirme the same in our lord the kings court, we are readie to get safe conduct for you to come to the said court, to trie & declare the truth of our innocencie, and the falsehood of you both, as forsworne traitors, by some man equall with you in nobilitie and stocke. All wee are contained with the seales of the foresaid lords, the lord Richard, and the lord Edward. Dated the day aforesaid.

The battell of Lewis betweene the king and the barons begun.

With which letters being read, they drew neere to the king: for they were not farre distant from the place which is called Lewis. And for that there wanted to the kings fraie prouision for their horses, it was commanded them, on tuesday to goe forth to seeke for hay & prouender: which when they were gone forth, were presented of their enemies, and most of them killed: but the residue returning, saw their enemies comming very earlie on the wednesday morning, and making ouerres, stirred vp the king and his host to arme themselues. Then the barons comming to the full plaine, descended there, and giuing and trimming their horses, made fit their harnesse to them. And there the earle Simon made the earle of Glocester, and Robert de Vere, and many other new knights. Which being done, he diuided and distributed his host into foure seuerall battels, and he appointed noble men to guide and gouerne euery battell. And ouer the first battel were ordained captains, Henrie Mountfort the eldest sonne of the earle Simon, and Guido his brother, lord John de Beuch the yonger, and lord Humfrey de Bohun. Ouer the second battell, lord Gilbert Clare earle of Glocester, lord John the sonne of lord S. John, and lord William of Mountchersie. And ouer the third, in which the Londoners were, at their request, the lord Nicholas Segraue was assigned: which required also verie instantlie, that they might haue the first stroke in the battell, at the aduenture, come what came should. But ouer the fourth battell the earle himselfe was captaine with the lord Thomas of Pinelson. In the meane season came forth the kings host, preparing themselues to the field in three battels, of which Edward the kings sonne led the first, with the earle of Warwike, and Valence the kings brother: and the second the king of Almaine guided, with his sonne Henrie: but the king with his nobles guided the third: and the fourth leader the king appointed not, by reason that he had left many of his chiefe souldiers behind him to keepe the castell and towne of Tunbridge against the earle of Glocester. And the most part of the kings armie were but yong men, for the king thought not that his barons had beene come so nigh hand. Their armies being on both sides set in array and order, they ordeined one an other on either partie to fight valiantly: and after they buckled together, the battell was great, and many horsemen were ouerthrowne euen in a moment. But by and by Edward the kings sonne with his band, as a fierce yong gentleman & valiant knight, fell vpon his enemies with such force, that he compelled them to recule backe a great way, so that the hindmost (thinking by reason of their giuing backe, that the formost were slaine) ran many of them away, and taking water to passe ouer, were almost therefore souldiers drowned, and a few of them being slaine, all the rest fled. Straightway the Londoners which had aided the first fight, knowing not how the battell went, take their heeles: whom Edward pursued with his band, killing the hindmost of them the space of two or three miles: for he hated them because they had rebelled against his father, and disgraced his mother when the was caried by barge vpon the Thames, from the Tower to Windsor: as is before touched.

Richard king of Almaine with his sonne taken prisoners.

Whilest that prince Edward was thus in the chase of the Londoners, who had the vaward of the barons battell: in the meane time the maine battell of the barons set vpon the kings maine battell, of the which the king of Almaine the brother of king Henry had the leading, which being some discomfited, and he with his sonne Henrie and Robert de Vsus, John Comen, with diuers other Capteines taken prisoners, the rearward wherein the king himselfe fought, being immediatly sharplie beset, and seeing his knightes and souldiers on euery side about him beaten downe and slaine, and diuers others of his souldiers to forsake the field & shift for themselues, thought good to take againe the towne, and so retired into the abbey from whence he came, thrusting & ramming vp the gates, and caused the same to be strongly warded with souldiers. To be briefe, the barons thus getting the field, after long fight, and many men on either side slain, entred also the citie of Lewis, pursuing in chase such souldiers as thither fled for succour.

The battell at Lewis betweene the king and his barons. A peace concluded, and hostages deliuered. 303

In the meane time, prince Edward returning from the chase of the Londoners, as ye heard, who desired to gitte the first onset, and espying the charior of the earle Simon (which he caused purposlie to be made for him) and the horses in the same, without either waggoner or any other to gouerne the same, fell immediatly vpon the chariot, and brake it all in peeces, and slew two burgesses that were within the same. But when he came nerer to the place where the bloudie battell had been fought, and saw the great discomfiture and ouerthrow which in his absence with great mortalitie and slaughter had happened, his heart was much dismaid, and his countenance altered. Yet notwithstanding, comforting & incouraging his knights and souldiers, of whom he had a braue companie, in battel araie he marched forward the towne against whom came the barons against with all their power. And thus was begun betwixt them a fresh fight and new battell, and many men slaine on either side. But at length, the earle de Warenna, with the kings two brethren, forsooke the field and fled: after whom went more then seuen hundred chosen souldiers, which were of their house and familie, who the same day came to Bouenie, and there tooke shipping ouer the sea. Also Hugh Wegot with diuers others fled, and left the valiant prince fighting in the field: which thing he also perceiuing, tooke the towne. And when he found not the king his father at the castell, he went from thence to the abbie where he was. In the meane season the towne was diuided in parts, some fighting, some spoiling, some getting of booties, neither could fearefully one of them know and discerne another whether he were his friend or enemy. But when within a while the barons had assembled some companie, they gaue an assault vpon the castell, thinking to haue relieued John Gifford and others lying in the kings souldiers had taken prisoners and put therein. But the souldiers within defended manfullie the same, and in throwing out bals of wild fire, as for the defence thereof they had, they also fired part of the towne. Then the barons retired and left the castle, and purposed to haue set vpon the abbey where the king and prince Edward his sonne was, which also was set on fire by the assault giuen to the castell: but yet it was shortly recouered and quenched. Then Edward the kings sonne perceiuing the bold enterprise of the barons, prepared with curagious knights and souldiers as were yet remaining and within the abbie, to haue issued out, and to haue giuen a new charge vpon them. But the barons perceiuing that, sent vnto the king messengers to intreat a truce for that day, and on the morrow to talke and conclude of a further peace betweene them. This battell was fought vpon the nineteenth day of May, being the yeere of our Lord 1264.

Prince Edward returning from the first chase, discomfiteth all opposites.

The prince fighteth in a battell.

Prince Edward also put to the worst and faine to take the towne.

The castell of Lewis besieged.

A peace intreated betweene the king and the barons.

The next day which was Thursday, there were sent on either side two preaching friers betweene the king and the barons, with certaine articles and demands of peace, so that with certaine others these conditions were agreed on: that on the morrow being Friday, the prince should giue himselfe in hostage for the king his father and others of his parts. And Henrie the kings sonne of Almaine also should giue himselfe the like for his father. That those things which should be concluded vpon for the benefit and commoditie of the realme, and peaceable quietnesse thereof might be performed, and that all such prisoners as were taken on either side, should be freely ransomed and sent home.

The two princes engaged in hostage.

The next day which was Saturday, the king discharged all his souldiers, and others that were with him in the abbie, licensing them to depart whither they listed. And furthermore, by the aduice of his sonne and the barons, he gaue commandement to those which he had appointed to the keeping of Tunbridge, that they should make no attempt to the preiudice or hurt of the barons; but in hope of the peace which was now at the point to be concluded, they should also depart euery man to their houses and habitations. But they giuing no credit thereunto, went with their furniture to Rochester, where they kept themselues in garrison, vntill the escaping of Edward the kings sonne out of prison. But first before that, when they heard at Tunbridge that the king was vanquished in battell, and that the Londoners in the rearward were put to flight by prince Edward (by a messenger that escaped from the same) and that also the same Londoners were at Croydondowne, they set vpon them in the euening tide, and taking from them much spoile, slue also many of them.

The kings Counsell in Tunbridge after they had spoiled the Londoners at Croydowne, kept themselues in garrison at Rochester.

Gerte Simon after he had slaine Richard his brother hanged himselfe to escape the hands of the kings enemies.

But when Roger Mortimers part began to decrease, and Simon the earles part on the other side to encrease, hee bare himselfe more stoute, for that both the king and all that was his, did depend vpon the good will and fauour of the earle, and led with him the kings sonne to such holds & castles as he thought to be most strong; as though all were in his hands to doe as him liked: and kept the hostages more straitlie then hee was wont to doe. Insomuch that it was bruited abroad that the kings sonne was kept as prisoner. Diuers counselled him that were his friends, that he should desire to dispart himselfe at the barriers that the people might haue a sight of him. But he being narrowlie garded as hee knew, and fearing some tumult to arise, thought good to refuse their counsell, and so did.

That king was in captiuitie, or Lewis prisoner, and the king came to raise the Siege.

In this troublesome yeere, which was Anno 1264, as the Londoners with the nobles were thus occupied in warre and dissention, the malignant Iewes thinking to take vantage of that time with priuie treason conspired against the whole citie and state of the nobles, who being taken with the manner, were almost all slaine that dwelt in the citie of London.

Boniface archbishop of Canturburie in the kings disgrace beyond sea. Acts passed for his returne into England.

✠ In this yere also Boniface archbishop of Canturburie the sonne of Peter earle of Sauoie, and a stranger, hauing been certaine yeeres beyond the seas in disgrace with the king of England, vpon occasion of some misdemeanor belike (for he was, as Matthew Parker writeth of him, Vt moribus gestisque peregrinus, sic nomine ipso & appellatione cæteris archiepiscopis dissimilis) howbeit the king being of a relenting nature, and bearing much with clergie mens insolencies, which for a while he might perhaps gainstand, but at last bare with them as supported by the court of Rome, did consult with his nobles about the returne of the said Boniface into England, conditionallie as followeth.

Acts passed in the kings councell touching the archbishop of Canturburies returne into England vnder certaine conditions.

Turris Lond.

ANno Dominj 1264, mense Martio, in præsentia illustris regis Angliæ, de concilio procerum & magnatum eiusdem regni adhuc est, quod venerabilis pater Bonifacius Dei gratia Cantuariensis archiepiscopus, totius Angliæ primas in Angliam reuertatur, sub conditionibus infra scriptis, in regno pacifice moraturus. In primis igitur &c. In English thus.

In the yeere of our Lord 1264, in the moneth of March, it was enacted in the presence of the renowmed king of England, by the councell of the peeres and states of the said realme, that the reuerend father Boniface by the grace of God archbishop of Canturburie, primat of all England, should returne into England, and also be in the realme peaceablie vpon the conditions vnderwritten.

1 First therefore it is enacted, that the archbishop at his returne doo without any difficultie release in forme of law his sentences of excommunication, published against all persons whatsoeuer, accustoming much trouble in the realme of England: but put so, that they which shall be found excommunicate, be readie to make satisfaction for their excesses and defaults, and so: the same receiue as they are bound by the canonicall commandements of the archbishop, in forme hereunder in the next article contained.

2 Secondly it is enacted, that in making amends for defaults done to churches and churchmen, within such places as are immediatly subiect vnto his iurisdiction, the archbishop may arbitrate according to the counsell of all his suffragans, or the greater and sounder part, and of waightie affaires belonging to the church and realme of England, may in time to come after his returne, order and dispose likewise by their counsell, and the counsell of other discreet men of the realme.

3 Thirdly it is enacted, that he bring with him master Henrie Mortimer archdeacon of Canturburie, and Pont Sabler his familiar clerks or household chaplens, and these clerks only being strangers borne, he keepe and retaine of his counsell and household.

4 Fourthly it is enacted, that other clerks wheresoeuer, beneficed in the church of England, meaning and willing to returne with the archbishop, may safely returne and abide in their benefices, and disturbed the church goods within the realme as they are bound, carrying or sending nothing out of the realme, vnlesse necessarie occasion, and allowed of the kings councell doe so require.

5 Fifthly it is enacted, that the archbishop or the clerks comming with him shall bring nothing with them in letters, message, or commandement, nor shall procure any thing else during their abode in this realme, either by themselues or by others, whereby any damage, danger, or preiudice may redound to the king or to any of his realme. And for: memorie of the premisses, the seale of the said renowned king of England is hanged vnto these presents.

By the whole councell.

Notwithstanding this conclusion, the archbishop did not presently returne, but continued in Bouuance and elsewhere, behauing himselfe imperiouslie as a prelate of the right Romish stampe. In the meane time many matters incident to his place were omitted and neglected, which personallie by him should haue been executed: but by reason of his absence the same were dispatched by deputation, and the same ordered likewise according to his owne fantasie, which he preferred before the kings authoritie and commandement. This to be true, the copie of a letter describing the contumacie of the said Boniface doth sufficientlie testifie, the same being set downe agreeable to the prototypon.

A letter of the king to Boniface archbishop of Canturburie, charging him to returne into England, there personallie to discharge his archiepiscopall function.

Turris Lond.

REx Bonifacio Cantuariensi archiepiscopo, totius Angliæ primati salutem. Licet hactenus per patientiam pluries festinemus electos in episcopos, abbates, ac prælatos alios in regno nostro &c. In English thus.

As visit the archbishop of Canturburie in foreen countries abiding.

The king to Boniface archbishop of Canturbury primat of all England, greeting. Although hitherto by patience we haue suffered oftentimes bishops elect, abbats, and other prelats in our realme, for the benefit of their confirmation to be obtained, to passe ouer beyond sea vnto you, we thought not to receiue at your hands any such reward, as that against the right and custome of our realme, to the which we meane not by this our patience that preiudice shall any way bee procured or bred, you should attempt this to be followed. We do maruell therfore and are mooued that you, at the request of vs, haue refused to commit the examination of the election of our welbeloued in Christ master Walter Gifford late of Bathe and Wels bishop elect, and the confirmation of the same election, vnto some discreet persons of our realme, we hauing detained and as yet detayning the same Gifford against his will, that he might not repaire personallie vnto you: whereunto common right and the very custome of the realme ought to haue lead you vnrequested, whilest you abide out of the realme. Left therefore our too much patience might breed in you a contempt, we will you to vnderstand that henceforward we meane to beare lesse with such dealing, specially in these daies, wherein there is no safe passage for Englishmen vnto you through the parts of France, as it is reported. Wherefore wee thought good to desire your fatherhood and also to admonish you, giuing you moreouer in charge and commandement, and vpon the fealtie wherein you are bound vnto vs firmelie inioyning, that in respect of the foresaid election, and other ceremonies, you come personallie into England to execute your office and charge, or send some other in your roome; or at least procure and cause some discreet persons of our realme, whom you shall repute more meete for this matter, to serue the turne for you in this behalfe: lest if with contumacie you refuse to heare our requests and commandements the second time, which you are by dutie bound to obay, wee bee compelled to take indignation against you, as a contemner of the rights, liberties, and the customs of our kingdome, and so to proceed against you more sharplie by way of reuenge: neither will we suffer, if you shall do otherwise, that the reuenues of your said archbishoprike shall henceforth be conueyed vnto you out of our realme; but as you refuse the burthen, so will we in like sort do what we can to withdraw hereafter the profits and commodities from you during your abode out of our land. Finally we, if need shall be, are redie to giue you a sure and safe conduct. Witnesse the king at S. Pauls of London, the 25. of June, and the 48. yeere of our raigne.

Now after all this aboue, we read that at last Boniface returned, and becomming more holy towards his end, he went with other bishops to the king, requiring him that being mindfull of the decaie of his kingdome, by ecclesiasticall liuings bestowed vpon strangers, he would hereafter preferre learned and godly men of his owne nation. To whom the king answered that he would willinglie doe it. Wherefore I thinke it meete that you, which are a stranger and vnlearned, and also my brother Ethelmer bishop of Winchester, whom I haue preferred to such dignities onely for: kindreds sake, should first giue example to others, and so take your churches, and I will prouide other learned men to serue in them. Which answere of the king so pierced this Boniface, that he alwaies after liued a wearisome life in England. Wherefore perceiuing himselfe to be misliked of the king and the people, he desired to returne into his countrey. And thereupon first selling and selling the woods, letting out the archbishoprike, taking great fines of his tenants, and making a great masse of money of the clergie of his prouince, he went with the curse of all men vnto Sauoy, where in the castle of S. Helens, after he had misgouerned the see six and twentie yeeres, six moneths, and sixteene daies from his consecration, being nine and twentie yeeres from his first election, he died the fifteenth kalends of August. And so ceased the troubles betweene the king and the said bishop, whose contumacie in stories, with others of the like kind, doth largely appeare in this booke.

Boniface his aduice disdained, vnmeet able to himselfe.

Boniface marieth some of the archbishoprike, he is hated, and dieth.

✠ But to leaue Boniface now dead, note ye this, that in this yeere, after the death of pope Vrban, succeeded in the said yeere of our Lord, An. 1265, pope Clement the fourth: which Clement, as affirmeth Nic. Triuet. was first a married man and had wife and children, and was the sollicitor and counsellor to the French king; then after the death of his wife, was bishop intituled Podiensis, after that archbishop of Narbon, and at last made cardinall; who being sent of pope Vrban in legacie, for reformation of peace, in his absence was elected pope by the cardinals. About this time flourished Thomas of Aquine, reader at Paris among the Dominike friers, and Bonauenture among the Franciscan friers. Ex Nic. Triuet.

Anno 1265

✠ Now after all the foresaid tumult and broile of the king and his barons to the veration of the whole land, it was thought meet and necessarie that all parties at variance should be reconciled. Wherevpon it was concluded amongst them as followeth.

A forme of peace betweene the king and his barons.

Turris Lond. HEc est forma pacis à domino rege & domino Edwardo filio ejus prælatis & proceribus omnibus, & communitate totæ regni Angliæ communiter & concorditer approbata, &c. In English thus: This is the forme of peace allowed of the king our lord, of the lord Edward his sonne, of all the prelats and peeres and the whole communaltie of the realme of England with common consent and agreement; to wit, that a certaine ordinance or decree made in a parlement holden at London about the feast of the nativitie of S. John Baptist last past, for the maintaining and keeping of the peace of the realme, and the same to continue all the daies of the said king our soueraigne lord, and the time of the lord Edward, after he shall be receiued as king, euen till the end and terme that shall be thought meet and conuenient. The said ordinance or decree is thus.

For the redressing of the state of the realme of England, let there be chosen or named three discreet and trustie persons of the realme, which may haue authoritie and power from the lord the king to chuse or name in the kings behalfe, nine counsellors: of which nine, three at least by course or turnes may alwaies be present in the court. And let the lord the king by the counsell of the said nine, order and dispose of the keeping of castles, and the managing of all the affaires in his realme. Let the lord the king also by the aduice of the foresaid nine, appoint iustices, chancellor, treasurers, and other officers, greater and lesser in those matters that pertaine to the gouernment of his court and realme.

The chosers or namers shall sweare first, that according to conscience they will chuse or name such counsellors, as they verily beleeue will be profitable and trustie in respect of Gods honor, the church, the lord the king, and his realme. The counsellors likewise and all the officers greater and lesser in their creation shall sweare, that to the vttermost of their power they will faithfullie execute their offices to the honor of God and of the church, and to the profit of the lord the king and his realme, without bribe or gift; meate and drinke which are commonlie wont to be set vpon the table excepted. And if so be that the foresaid counsellors, or some or any of them, or the charge to them committed, whether they be two or three, behaue themselues ill, or that vpon some other occasion such officers are to be changed: the lord the king by the counsell of the three former chosers or namers may remoue such as he shall see meet to be remoued; and in their rooms by the same mens aduice may appoint and place other persons trustie and serviceable.

And if so be that either the greater officers or the lesser doe disorderedlie demeane themselues in their offices, the lord the king by the counsell of the foresaid nine may displace them, and without delay by the same aduice set others in their rooms. And if so be that the three first or chiefe chosers or namers, in the choice or naming of counsellors, or perhaps the counsellors in the creating of officers, or in other affaires of the lord the king and the realme to be ordred or done, shall be at disagreement, then whatsoeuer by consent of two parts shalbe concluded or decreed, let the same be firmelie kept & obserued; so that of those two parts one be a prelat of the church in the businesse belonging to the church. And if it so happen, that two parts of the said nine in some matter disagree; then shall they for their variance stand to the ordinance of the three first chosers or namers, or the greater part of them. And if so be it seeme expedient by consent to all the prelats and barons, that some or one in place of some or one of the three first namers be put and appointed: then let the lord the king by the counsell of all the prelats and barons ordaine some others, or one other. And let the lord the king doe all the premisses by the aduice of the said nine in manner aboue mentioned; or let them doe it in the lord the kings behalfe and by his authoritie by this present ordinance, to continue and hold out till such time as this agreement made and afterwards sealed by the parties, be perfected by consent, or some other prouiso be had which the parties by consent shall iudge allowable.

This ordinance was made at London by the consent, will, and commandement of the lord the king, and also of the prelats, barons, with the communaltie then and there present. In witnesse whereof W. bishop of Lincolne, and H. bishop of Elie, R. earle of Norfolke and marshall of England, Robert de Vere earle of Oxford, Humfrey de Bohune, William de monte Canisio, and the maior of London to this writing haue set their seales. Acted in the parliament at London in the month of June, in the yeare of our Lord 1264.

Reformation of the church.

It is also ordained, that the state of the English church shall be reformed into a state meet and conuenient.

It is also ordained, that the three chosers aboue said and counsellors, of whom mention is made in the said ordinance at London, and the keepers of castles, and others the kings bailiffs be homebred. And as for strangers borne, let them come, tarrie, and depart peaceablie, as well lawmen willing to dwell vpon their possessions, as clergimen residing vpon their benefices.

Strangers to be keepers of the kings castels, &c.

Merchants also, and all others, to further and set to their affaires shall come fréelie, and tarrie peaceablie: but yet conditionallie, so they come without armor and a suspected multitude. And that none of them be received in any sort, into any office or bailiwike in the realme, or otherwise into the kings house & seruice be entertained. As for the charter of generall liberties and forrests granted vnto the homebred of late by the king, and the statutes made vpon reuoking of grieuances which the lord the king the third yeere past in euery shire by his letters patents hath caused to be published, with the conuenable customs of his realme, & a long time allowed, be for euer obserued: and that it might be prouided how they may be better and more soundlie obserued: It is also prouided, that the lord the king, and the lord Edward, the barons & those that stand with them, let go all iniurie and rancor, so that they neither grieue, or suffer to be greeued by any of them, no one of them by occasion of things done in the late vnruly time past; and also cause all their bailiffes at the vndertaking of their bailiwiks, that they shall grieue none by the occasion aforesaid, but shall doe iustice and right to euery body with equalitie. And let there be good securitie prouided how all these things may be firmlie obserued.

¶ When this agreement was dispatched, to set the realme in some quietnesse, a little leisure was allowed to take into the lasts and damages of the church, whereupon it was prouided as followeth.

Of the repairing of trespasses committed against the church.

IT is prouided by common assent of the king, of the prelats, earles, and barons of the land, that the trespasses which are committed against the church of England, by reason of the tumults and wars that haue béene in this realme of England, shall be reformed and amended in this maner.

There shall be chosen by the earles and great estates of the land, with the liking and assent of the prelats, three bishops authorized, and hauing full power to establish and prouide for such reasonable amends as are to be made for the foresaid trespasses committed against holie church, so far forth as shall be fit and conuenient.

Those that shall be found excommunicated, shall be absolued in forme of right, by such as haue power and authoritie so to doe.

The authoritie of the prelats shall be established in this maner. First, it shall be faithfullie vndertaken by the earles, iustices, and the other laimen of the kings counsell, and other great barons of the realme, that all those things which the prelats that shall be chosen, shall reasonablie ordaine and appoint by way of reformation, they themselues shall obserue & fulfill, and shall doe their indeuor faithfullie to cause it to be obserued by others: and thereof they shall deliuer their letters patents.

Moreouer, vnto the prelats, after they shall be chosen, full power shall be granted by the king, and the communaltie, the earles, barons, & great men of the land, to ordaine those things which are needfull and profitable to the full reformation of the estate of holie church, to the honor due to the fealtie of our lord the king, and to the profit of the realme. And that the promise made by the king, and by the earles, and barons aforesaid, and by the other great men of the land may appeare to be made in good faith, they shall thereof make their letters patents; to wit of things that haue bin done a yere past before the last Easter.

If any be found that will not stand to the ordinance and appointment of the foresaid prelats in the causes aforesaid and according to the forme aforesaid, he shall be compelled thereunto by dome of holie church; yea if need be he shall be thereunto forced by the secular power. And that it may the better be done, the iustice shall haue a hundred or more of choice men at armes, or sargeants souldiers elect, to distraine the malefactors when by the said prelats he shall be required. Those souldiers to be sustained of the common goods of holie church, during the time they shall be imployed in that businesse. And this ordinance shall continue for a peare or two, till such time as matters be quieted, and that the promisions of the prelats, and the peace of the land be well obserued.

Prouided alwaies, that the profits of benefices of holie church belonging to aliens, and others that haue béen enemies to the land, shall be collected, and safely kept in the hands of the prelats, vntill such time as order be taken by common aduice what is to be done therewithall. And for the more assurance and further testimonie hereof, the king and the high estates of the land haue vnto this writing set their seales.

¶ Besides all this it was considered, that non residencie, being a default blame worthie, deserued reformation. Wherefore of the king hauing speciall regard, bent his mind to the life of the bishop of Hereford for the redresse of the same; whose letter because it is memorable, and conuenient matter therein contained for non residents of our time, we haue héere interered according to the record.

A letter of king Henry the third directed to the bishop of Hereford concerning non residents.

Turris Lond. R Ex episcopo Hereford salutem. Pastores gregibus præponuntur, vt diei noctisque vigilias exercendo, &c. In English thus.

The

Against non residence of prelats.

The king to the bishop of Hereford sendeth greeting. Pastors or shepherds are set ouer flocks, that by exercising themselues in watching ouer them day and night, they may know their owne cattell by their looke, bring the hungerstarued sheepe into the medowes of fruitfulnesse, and the straying ones into one fold by the word of salutation & the rod of correction; and to doe their indeuor, that vnitie indissoluble may be kept. But some there be, who damnablie despising this doctrine, and not knowing to discerne their owne cattell from anothers, doe take away the milke and the woull, not caring how the Lords flocke may be nourished: they catch vp the temporall goods, and who perisheth in their parish with famishment, or miscarrieth in maners they regard not: which men deserue not to be called pastors, but rather hirelings. And that we euen in these daies remouuing our selues into the marches of Wales, to take order for the disposing of the garrisons of our realme, haue found this default in your church of Hereford, we report it with griefe; for that we haue found there a church destitute of a pastors comfort, as hauing neither bishop nor officiall, vicar nor deane, that may exercise any spirituall function & dutie in the same. But the church it selfe, which in time past was wont to flow in delight, and had canons that tended vpō daies & nights seruice, and that ought to exercise the works of charitie, they forsaking the church, and leading their liues in countries far hence, hath put off her stole or robe of pleasure, and fallen to the ground, bewailing the losse of her widowhood, and there is none among all her friends and louers that will comfort her. Verily whiles we beheld this, and considered it diligentlie, the pricke of pitie did moue our bowels, and the sword of compassion did inwardlie wound our heart verie sore, that we could no longer dissemble so great an iniurie done to our mother the church, nor passe the same ouer vncorrected.

Non residents straitlie charged to be resident in their cures and abiding vpon their cures a nere.

Wherefore we command and straitly charge you, that all occasions set aside, you indeuor to remoue your selues with all possible speed vnto your said church, and there personallie to execute the pastorall charge committed vnto you in the same. Otherwise we will you to know for certaine, that if you haue not a care to doe this, we will wholie take into our owne hands all the temporall goods, and whatsoeuer else doth belong vnto the baronie of the same church; which goods for spirituall exercise sake therein, it is certaine our progenitors of a godlie deuotion haue bestowed thereupon. And such goods and duties as we haue commanded hitherto to be gathered and safelie kept and turned to the profit and commoditie of the same church, the cause now ceasing, we will seize vpon; and suffer no longer, that he shall reape temporall things, which feareth not vnreuerentlie to withdraw and keepe back spirituall things, whereunto by office and duetie he is bound; or that he shall receiue any profits which refuseth to vndergoe and beare the burthens of the same. Witnesse the king at Hereford, the first of June in the 48. yeare of our reigne.

An all maner of vnlawfull assemblie called harlots, or meeting of men which called themselues harlots.

About this time (as appeareth by course of record, & thereby may well be gathered) a redresse of certaine seats was intended, among which, one by name speciallie occurreth, and called the assemblie of harlots: a kind of people of a leaud disposition and vnciuill. Of whose maners and life the king hauing beene informed, addressed his letters to the shiriffe of Oxfordshire, a place which they haunted, and wherein they practised their euill conuersation: whose letter héere followeth.

A letter concerning Henrie the third to the shiriffe of Oxfordshire, concerning the banishment of an vnlawfull assemblie called harlots, out of that countrie.

Turris Lond. Against an assemblie or meeting of men which called themselues harlots. R Ex vic. Oxon. salutem. Quia intelleximus quòd quidam, qui se harlotos appellant, vagi & otium fouentes, in diuersis partibus regni nostri, congregationes & conuenticula, nec non contra-ctus illicitos, &c. In English thus.

The king to the shiriffe of Oxfordshire sendeth greeting. Because we vnderstand that there be certaine vagarant persons which call themselues harlots, maintaining idlenesse in diuers parts of our realme, most shamelesslie making their meetings, assemblies, and vnlawfull matches against the honestie of the church and good maners, which abuse we will not, neither ought we to suffer; we charge thee that on our behalfe thou forbid the said harlots henceforth in the said countries to make anie more such meetings, conuenticles, or contracts; or to presume according to their leaud maner and vonted fashion to rogue about our realme: and hereto thou shalt (if need be) bind them, as by law may be done. Wherein so behaue thy selfe in this behalfe, as we may commend thy diligence. Witnesse the king at Reading the 23 of Nouember, in the 48 yeare of our reigne.

What maner of persons these were, or what their conuersation was, it doth not further appeare: neuertheless by the premisses it may séeme to be some pretensed order of religion. And it is most probable that the reprochfull name of harlot had his beginning from hence.

To conclude with speciall matters of the church, wherein we haue made somewhat the longer delay, by occasion of such necessarie records as came to hand, & brought with them their necessarie vse; this one remembrance notwithstanding remaineth, no lesse notworthie then the rest, and falling within the resolution of the same eight yeere of this kings reigne, a yeere of great trouble, as by the premisses may be gathered.

You are therefore to note, that at this time the prelats of England stood vpon their pantoples, and tollie fellowes (I tell you) they would be knowne to be. For in an inquisition made after the death of one Alured de Lincolne, being, as is supposed, a baron of this realme, there is found (Inter alia) as followeth. Quòd prædictus Alured de Lincolne tenuit quandam particulam parcæ de Dunetisse & Tilei de abbate de Cerne, per seruicium tenendi ferepem suum, quando abbas de Cerne equum suum, & dare eidem in cenam quando præfatus fuerit. That is: That the forenamed Alured held a certain peece of the parke of Dunetisse and Tilei of the abbat of Cerne, by seruice of holding his stirup when the abbat should take horsebacke, and to giue him place in the shire at such time as he should be present. The circumstances hereof being considered, together with the time wherein it was done, giueth probable cause to coniecture that the occasion of this matter came by this meanes: viz. That whereas the said Alured was desirous to inlarge his parke, and could not so doe but by purchasing a part of some other ground next adioining, whereof the said abbat was owner: he was therefore constrained either to lacke that he lifted, or to admit such conditions as pleased my lo: abbat; who like a lord (as you see) was content to let him haue his land, reserning such seruice as is aboue said. Wherein would be noted the pompe of prelats in those daies, and how neere they drew in imitation to the pope, in whose treading they traced.

But leaning these affaires of the church and churchmen, wherein we haue béene somewhat large, we will now enter into other troubles of the temporall state. You heard before of a pacification concluded betweene the king and his barons in the yeere of our Lord 1264, the same hauing beene admitted by mutuall and common consent of the temporaltie and clergie. Neuertheless, as a sore not well searched and tented, but superficiallie and ouerlie skinned, doth breake out into a more dangerous botch; so it came to passe among the lords and barons, betwixt whom no such firme reconciliation was made as was like long to last. Whereupon ensued after secret grudge and priuie hatred open armes and conflicts. For in this yeere 1265 the sonnes of Simon the earle, to wit, Henry, Simon, and Guido, being all puft vp, and with the pride of their late eleuated, did that which nothing contented the earle of Glocester in so much that he challenged Henry the eldest sonne of the earle Simon Mountfort at the barriers, to be tried at Northhampton. But that challenge was taken by, lest some further inconuenience might haue risen thereof. But the earle of Glocester being moued therewith in his mind, sent vnto his father the earle that he should deliuer him such prisoners being noble men, as he tooke at the battell of Lewis; among whom the king of Almaine was named first. But by countermand answered him, and said, that it might content and suffice him, for that he had saued and preserued to him his lands, that day the battell was fought at Lewis; and that furthermore he would not send him such prisoners as he demanded; but that he himselfe kept more noble then they in the castell of Douer: among whom was John Wassell, which vndermined and burst downe the walles of Northhampton at that conflict, as is said before and specified.

Dissension betweene the earle of Glocester and the earle of Glocester.

The earle of Glocester being hereewith displeased, so some as he heard this answer, sent incontinentlie to the lord Roger Mortimer, which alwaies tooke the kings part, desiring that they two might talke together touching the benefit and commoditie of the king. Who, doubting some deceit, desired safe ties and pledges for his safe returne, and he would come and talke with him, and so had. When they met, and had a while talked familiarlie, the earle of Glocester shewed him all that he was purposed to doe: and that further he lamented he had so much and greatlie offended the king: and that he would with all his power and abilitie make amends for that offence, in the restitution of the king againe to his kingdie dignitie, as much as he possiblie might. Therefore they sent secretlie to Robert the brother of the earle of Glocester, which was nere about the earle Simon, and made him to consent with them therein. And to worke this thing more circumspectlie, when opportunitie serued thereunto, Roger Mortimer sent vnto the king some an horse excelling all others in estimation, vnto whom he might be sure to trust, when he saw conuenient time thereunto. After which things thus contrined, prince Edward desired leaue of the earle to proue his courser against such time as he should ride at the tilt, as they might when they listed. Assone as he had gotten leaue, and that with galloping and ranging the field he had wearied diuers of their horses: at the last, getting vp vpon the horse which for that purpose was sent, and spying a seruant on horsebacke coming toward him with two swords, he rauied about vnto his keeper, whose name was Robert de Rose, and to others his his plaifellowes that were with him, saying: My louing lords, thus long haue I kept you companie, and haue beene in your custodies: and now not purposing to vse your companies any longer, I betake you to God. And quickly turning his horse about, put to the spurs and away went he. The other pricked after apace, but yet came far inough behind, and ouertake him they could not. At last, when they saw Roger Mortimer comming from his castell of Wigmore, accompanied with many armed men to méete him as before it was appointed, they returned against home as wise as when they came forth. And when this ꝑ princes escape was diuulgated, much people came vnto him out of euery quarter, with great ioy thereof. Amongst whom, the first was the earle of Glocester, and the other souldiers of the king, which had now long lien at Winchcombe, and therabouts, and within a fortnight space he had a great and a mightie host.

Which thing when the earle Simon vnderstood, he much doubted and mistrusted himselfe: and fleding into Wales, he got from thence a great many men, and augmented his power as strongly as he might, from euery part of England. He sent also Simon his sonne to the noble men of the north parts, that with all possible spéede he might bring them with him: who with a great companie came with him, and at Kenelworth a while they staid, and there pitched their tents. But leauing Kenelworth for a certaine time, they went to Winchester, and spoiled the same, and then returned againe to Kenelworth. And when this by a certaine spiall was declared to Edward the kings sonne, who then was at Worcester, which he had gotten after he came from Glocester a little before; he prepared himselfe with his souldiers, in the night season to goe to the place where the ꝑfe should bring him, which was into a deepe valley, néere vnto the place where Simon and his companie had pitched. And when in the morning they were very earlie about to arme themselues, and prepare their horses, they heard a great noise of their enemies comming towardes them. Then thinking that they had prepared themselues against their comming, and so had béene betrayed; they set forth in battell aray, marching forwards, till that they met certaine of their enemies stragling in long wings, thinking to haue gone a foraging, and to haue sought for victuals; whom they take, and with their fresh horses new hoysed their souldiers that had their horses tired with long trauell. And so marching forward, came verie earlie in the morning vpon their enemies, whom for the most part they found sléeping; and laying luskishe about them, they slue diuers; some they take, the rest they put to flight; and fiftéene of their chiefest enseignes they take, with many other rich spoiles. But yong Simon himselfe lodged in the castell, who with a few with him escaped and fled. And this was the fourth day before the nones of Auguſt, An. 1265.

The first entersprise of prince Edward after his escape by the meanes of a ruse.

Yet when Edward heard that earle Simon was comming toward Kenelworth, to ioine with his sonnes battell, he marched forward to meet him the third day after at Eusham, where he diuided his host into three battels, he himselfe hauing the leading of one, the earle of Glocester the second, and Roger Mortimer the third, which came vpon their backs. The kings sonne Edward came northward, as though he came from Kenelworth to Eusham: and because he would not be descried, he caused his owne standards and enseignes to be taken downe, and yong Simons which he had taken before to be aduanced. But the earle Simons scurer, whose name was Nicolas, shewed the earle that such bands and companies were marching towards him; who thinking the same to haue beene Simon his sonnes power, not knowing of the ouerthrow which he had before, gaue small credit thereunto, till that the said Nicolas the better to vnderstand déeper, went vp to the abbey steeple of Eusham, where he might plainely discerne them all and their standards: for by this time they were mounted the hill which they labored to attaine, thinking to haue that vantage, when they should giue their charge as they had purposed: and had also aduanced againe his owne standards, and pulled downe Simons, whereby they were the more easier descried and knowne. Then he cried aloud to the earle Simon, and said: We are all but dead men: for it is not your sonne, as you suppose, that commeth, but it is Edward the kings sonne that commeth from one part, and the earle of Glocester from another part, and Roger Mortimer from the third part. Then said the earle: The Lord be mercifull vnto our soules, for assuredly as our bodies and liues are yolde in their hands; cōmanding that euerie man should make himselfe readie to God, and to fight out the field, for that it was their wils to die for their ladues, and in a iust quarell. And such as would depart, he gaue leaue to goe their wayes, that they should be no discomfiture to the rest.

Prince Edward had descried, but not the earle Simon so much abashed.

Then came vnto him his eldest sonne Henrie, and comforted him, desiring him to haue no dispaire. nor yet mistrust in the god succesſe of this battell, with other such cheerefull words. No my sonne (saith he) I dispaire not: but yet, it is the presumption, and the pride of the rest of the brethren that hath brought me to this end you see: notwithstanding, yet I trust I shall die to God, and in a righteous quarell. After words of comfort giuen to all his host, and the oration made as is the maner, they all armed themselues. The king also (whom the earle alwaies kept with him) he armed in an armor of his owne; and then dyuiding their battels, they marched toward their enemies. But before they ioined, the Welshmen ran their waies, and thinking to scape ouer the riuer of Dee, were there some drowned, and some slaine. Then when the battels ioined and came to handie strokes, within short space many of the earles part fell and were slaine: and the king himselfe being stricken at, cried with a loud voice to them, saying: Kill me not, I am Henrie your king. And with these the kings words he had Adam Bonhaw knowne him, and saued him. At whose voice and crie came also prince Edward his sonne, and deliuered him to the gard and custodie of certaine knights. In the meane season the earle Simon was hard beséed and beaten downe, and also slaine before Edward the prince came at him. Howbeit, before he fell, when as he sought for life, and Henrie his sonne, and other noble men on his part were about him, he beheld out into these woords vnto his enemies, saying: What, is there no mercie and compassion with you? Who againe answered: What compassion should there be shewed to traitors? Then saide he: The Lord be mercifull vnto our soules, our bodies are in your hands. And so some as these woords were spoken, they mangled his bodie, and diuided his members, and cut off his head, which head Roger Mortimer sent vnto his wife. And not far off from him also was slaine Henrie his eldest sonne, the lord Hugh Spenser, the lord Radulph Wallet, the lord Thomas de Heſtele, the lord William Mandeuile, the lord John Beauchampe, the lord Guido Bailloſer, the lord Roger Rowleie, and many other noble men besides, with a great multitude of people, the Lord knoweth how many. This battell was fought in the moneth of Auguſt, and continued from one of the clocke till it was night: in the which was not so much as one man on the part of any estimation, fortitude, and courage, but in that battell lost his life, more than the lord John, who by the great grace of God escaped death. Neither is this to be forgotten, that the same day being tuesday, at that instant houre, when the battell began, which was at one of the clocke at afternone, there was such a darknesse ouer all, with thunder and such tempest, that the like before that time was neuer séene, being verie calme and faire weather both immediatlie before and after: which séemed (saith mine author) to giue a plaine demonstration of that which afterwards chanced and followed.

King Henrie almost slaine in the battell, at length knowen by his voice, and released by his sonne.

Earle Simons sonnes, and many other lords and barons slaine in this battell at Eusham.

After this great slaughter and ouerthrow, there was a parliament summoned at Winchester by the earle of Glocester, and others of his part. Here by the way is to be considered, that the king although he was in the campe of the earle of Leycester, being then in custody, and his sonne Edward with the earle of Glocester, yet the king was on that side against his will, and therefore in the said parliament the king was reſtored to his kinglie dignitie, which was before that time vnder the custodie of the barons. But after the battell was ended and done, certaine of them that loued the earle, vpon an old ladder, gathered vp such parts of his bodie as remained, and couering the same with an old gowne, brought it to Eusham, where they putting the same in a faire linnen cloth, buried it in the church. But not long after, by such as thought not themselues sufficientlie reuenged with his death (to wreake them of the dead corps) take vp the same and threw it in another place, saying, that he which was both accursed, and a traitor, was not worthie of christian buriall.

Anno 1266. A parliament summoned at Winchester, where king Henry was restored to his regalitie.

The same yere died Walter Cantilupus bishop of Winchester, after whom succeded Nicolas of Elie, the kings chancellor.

The same yere the king perceiuing that vnlesse the castell of Kenelworth were recouered, and the boldnesse of them refrained that kept the same, many euils and inconueniences might ensue thereupon, to the preiudice of his kingdome; for that the number increased euery day more and more, waiting and spoiling the countrie all about: therefore he gathered an armie and came downe to Warwike, where he a while taried expecting the méeting and assembling of his marqueſſes and lords, with ensignes and other munition sauiable. Who when their bands were furnished and mustered, and all things ready, the morrow after Midsummer day he displaied his banner, and began his voiage, marching toward Kenelworth, and beseged the same. During which siege, by the aduice and counsell of the king, the popes legat, and other noble men, there he prouided such lawes as seemed to him most conuenient for the ſtate of the realme, & of those that had lost their lands and inheritances, who amongst other things made & eſtablished this one prouiſo, that was commonly called Kenelworth decree: That all those which had lost their lands by attendor (although yet not attainted) should fine therefore at the kings pleasure, and take their lands of him againe, paying some three yeres, some foure yeres, some two yeres reuenues of the same, according to the qualitie of the crime and offence committed. All which prouiſes or prouiſions were eſtabliſhed & confirmed as well by the corporall oth, as by signement of the same with the hands and seales of all the prelats and clergie of England, there assembled for that purpese by the popes legat vpon the feaſt of All saints. When these things were thus finiſhed, messengers were sent on the kings behalfe, as well to those that kept the castell of Kenelworth, as also to those that were assembled in the ile of Elie: willing them to come vnder the protection of the kings peace, and yeeld to the foreſaid prouiſors, eſtablished by the twelue commissioners. Who all together answered and said: that they would in no wise condescend thereunto, both for that it was done without their consents not being called vnto it, and also for that the said decree was ouer strait and intolerable. Within short space after, great famin and pestilence chanced amongst them which kept the castell, insomuch that they were without all hope of keeping the same: wherefore some after, the king sending againe to them to yeeld the castell and take their pardons, they consulting together of their owne estate, thus answered the kings messengers; If it please the king and his counsell to permit vs to send our messenger to the lord Simon Mountford, which is beyond the sea, that he may come by a certaine day to the defence of this his garrison and fort, and that in the meane space we be not disturbed by the kings army that hath inuironed vs, till the returne of our messengers: if by the day appointed he came not, we will yeeld vp the same, so that we may be pardoned of life, limbe, and moueables.

Kenelworth decree gainsaid by diuers.

Kenelworth castell preſsed vp by the kinglie power for the returne of the messengers of France.

When the messengers were returned, and had declared to the king their answer; he consulting with his nobles about the matter, agreed vnto their petitions, and caused the truce to be proclained throughout all his campe, after that sufficient hostages were on either side giuen for the performance of the same: wherevpon they for Edward their messengers, as before was said they would. But after that, many of them within the castell being very grieuously vexed with the bloudie flix, and other diseases, insomuch that the whole men might not abide the corruption and annoiance of those that were diseased, deliuered vp the castell before the returne of the messengers againe, and were permitted to go whither they would to refresh themselues, as men molested with great vexations and miseries. After the yeelding vp of the castell, the king committed the custodie thereof to his sonne Edmund, and so with his host departing from his siege, came vpon Christmas euen euen to Oxnie, where hee with great solemnitie and triumph kept his Christmas during seuen daies, and from thence with his host came to Windsor, from whence after a few daies he marched towards Elie: in which iland he beseged those which were disherited, and sharplie also assaulted them.

The same yere, pope Clement the fourth promoted maſter Walter Giffard bishop of Bathe, to bee archbishop of Yorke.

The tenths granted to the king by authoritie apostolicall.

In which yere also the church of England began to pay the tenths of all their reuenewes, as well spirituall as temporall, to the king, to continue for three yeers space: and this was done by the authoritie apostolicall.

Within a while after, the barons which were yet remaining, gathered themselues together againe: amongst whom Iohn Daiuill (being a subtill and stout man of war) began to haue a name, in was well eſtéemed amongst them; who al together did what mischiefe they might, and in the month of May they assembled at Oxeſtercliffe, vnder the said John Daiuill and the earle of Feurarence, vpon whom the kings soudiors, comming suddenly in the night, tooke them sléeping, and slew many of them. Then the said John Daiuill quickly arming himselfe came forth, thinking with more defence both to saue himselfe and to escape. Who in the way stroke the lord Gilbert Humfard such a blow with his demilance, that he feld both him and his horse to the ground, and so fled with a few more after him. And thus while the poze soudiers fought and were slaine, the barons fled vp, and saued themselues. Also the earle Ferarence fled, and hid himselfe in a church; but being betrayed by a woman he was taken forth, and led away prisoner. After this, the king kept a parliament at Northhampton, where he disherited all those that take part with the earle Simon & all their children. Where also the popes legat Otobonus held a conuocation, and excommunicated all such bishops as had taken any part with Simon against the king: of whom diuers be sent vp to Rome, to be absolued of the pope: and further the said legat caused to be proclained certaine decrees, which he himselfe had made: and also the new grant of pope Clement, to the king and quéene, of all the tenths for seuen yeeres to come. And shortly after, a tax also was sined vpon the country of Norfolk; to the gathering wherof Walter the bishop of Norwich was appointed. Ex Scalacronicis.

After this, in the yeere of our Lord 1267, king Henry beseeged against the castell of Kenelworth, from the seuenth day before the first day of July, vntill the beginning of December: whither came Otobonius the popes legat, by whose intreatie Henry Hastings deliuered the same into the king, which doubtly had defended the same and resisted the king, hauing pardon granted both for him and his, of his life, lands, goods, and cattels. In which time also the barons against assembled, with John Daiuill in the ile of Ariolme, and to proceeded till they came to Lincolne, which they also take, and spoiled the Iewes, and slew many of them; and entring their synagogue tare and rent the house of their law, and burnt the same, and all other writings & obligations which they could come by. Which thing when the king heard, he sent thither his sonne prince Edward: but as soone as they heard that, they fled into the ile of Ely, and fortified the same with bulwarkes as strongly as they might, at euery entrance into the same. This was in the moneth of Aprill, when Edward the kings sonne came thither, who for the great abundance of waters in the same, could by no meanes enter the iland, till at length by the counsell of the inhabitants of that province, hee caused with a number of workmen great trenches and ditches to be made, somewhat to conuay away the water: and so long vsed the counsell of them, in making bridges with planks and burdles, till at the last they entred the iland, who as soone as they were entred, the barons fled to London, where they were of the Londoners well entertained. The rest which were in the iland yeelded themselues (amongst whom was Roger Wake, Simon the yonger, and Peches) sauing their liues and members. After this, both the king and Edward his sonne came to London with a great power, but yet were kept out of the citie by the barons and citizens for the space of foure daies. And Otobonius the legat (who for feare was fled into the tower) they narrowly laid for, that he should not escape. At length by the intreatie of the earle of Glocester, and other earls that were his friends, both the barons and citizens were pardoned, and admitted to the kings fauor. And foure bishops and eight other noble men were chosen, such as were at Coventry first nominated, that they should order and dispose all matters betwixt the king and such as had lost their inheritance, as also the forme of their peace and ransome. And proclamation was made vpon the feaſt of All saints, of perfect peace and accord throughout all the realme.

In the fifty and two yere of this king Henries raigne, eight daies after the feaſt of S. Martin, he held a parliament at Marleberge, in the yere of our Lord aboue recited, where by the aduice of his wife and discreet men, and with all the consents of the nobles, he ordained and enacted diuers good and profitable statutes for the reformation and bettering of the ſtate of the realme and execution of common iustice, which are called the statutes of Marleberge.

The same yere vpon S. Gregories day, Otobonius the legat called a councell at London, where were fiue archbishops, and xxiv or xxv bishops, abbots, and other prelats: which councell allo within three daies brake vp againe.

The same yere vpon S. Johns day the Baptiſt, Edward the kings sonne and diuers other noble men of England take vpon them the crosse by the legats hands at Northhampton, to the reliefe of the holy land, and the subuertion of the enemies of the crosse of Christ. Which done, the legat the same yere went out of England, not purposing after that to returne againe. This holy legat (with mine author) which might well be resemibled to Lyne the monstrous beast, whose quicke sight penetrateth euery thing, inrolled to perpetuall memory the valuation of all the churches in the realm of England so narrowly, as by any meanes possible he might inquire the certainty thereof. The same was he that made all the cathedrall and conuentuall churches to pay pensions: so that whole churches might long be vacant for the benefices to their clerks and strangers, should pay vnto them a certaine yerly pension, during the vacancie of the benefices which they should haue.

The same yere died pope Clement the fourth, after whose death the church of Rome was two yeres vacant: and then was chosen an archdeacon cardinall, whose name was Thedaldus, as he was taking his iourny into the holy land, and called him Gregory the tenth.

Then also did Edmund earle of Lancaster and Leicester, and second sonne of king Henry, take to wife the earle of Albemarle his daughter, and the neece of the earle of Glocester: at which marriage was the king and the quéene, and all the nobilitie of England.

The same yere was the body of S. Edward the king and Confessor, by Walter Giffard archbishop of Yorke and other bishops, intombed in a new and rich shrine of gold and siluer, beset with precious stones, in the presence of Henry the king of England. In which yere also fell a great raine and inundation of waters, such as hath not lightly been seene, which increased and continued the space of forty daies and more.

The same yere died Walter de Lalwil, bishop of Sarum, the third day before the nones of Januarie. After whom succéeded Robert of Northhampton, the dean of the same church. And because the sea of Canturbury was then vacant, he was confirmed by the chapter of Canturbury; which chapter had alwaies the iurisdiction in spirituall causes, during the vacancie of that sea, in as ample maner as the bishop himselfe had being aliue. After this, the bishop elect comming thither, thinking to haue had his consecration, was notwithstanding put backe for two causes: one was, for that there was present then no more but one bishop: the other was, for that all the other bishops had appealed, that he might not be consecrated to their preiudice: that is, by the authority of the chapter of Canturburie, saying that they would not be vnder the obedience of the monks.

The death and buriall of K. Richard the kings sonne of Almaine at Hailes.

The same yere also was the lord Henry, the son and heire of the lord Richard king of Almaine, and brother to king Henry the third, slaine at Viterbium, in a certaine chapell hearing masse, by the lord Simon and Guido the sonnes of the lord Simon Mountfort earle of Leicester.

During this kings raigne, there was made a great and generall expedition of diuers and sundry christian princes to Hierusalem, taking vpon them the Lords character, that is, the crosse: among whom was also Edward the kings sonne, vnto the which expedition was granted him a subsidie throughout all the realme. And the month of May, the yere of our Lord 1270, or as saith Florilegus, An. 1269, he set forward on his iourney.

Anno 1270.

The death and buriall of Boniface archbishop of Canturbury.

About the time when prince Edward was preparing his iourny, toward Asia, Boniface, of whom ye heard before, the archbishop of Canturbury, ended his life in the country of Sabandia, going bellie to Rome, or comming thence. After whose death the monks of Canturbury proceeding to a new election granted by the king, agreed vpon the prior of their house, named Adam Chelenden. But the king and his seme prince Edward consenting and speaking in the behalfe of Robert Burnel their chancellor, did solicit the matter with the monks, partly intreating, partly threatning them, to chuse the said Robertto be archbishop. Notwithstanding the monks being stout, would neither relent to their courteous request, nor yet bow to their boisterous threats, but constantly persisting in their former election, appealed from the king and prince to the pope. Prince Edward being now on his iourny, and seeing himselfe thus frustrated of the monks, writeth back to the king his father; deuoutly praying and beseeching, in no wise to admit the election of the foresaid monks. And so passing to Douer with Henry, the sonne of Richard his vncle king of Romans, with the 3 bishops, take their passage in the month of August. After this, the prior thus elected, as is foresaid, but not admitted by the king to be archbishop, went by to Rome.

Adam Chelenden goeth by to Rome.

In the meane time, the monks in the absence of their elect, ordained one Geffrey Pouncrall to be their officiall, who being himselfe aduanced to that dignity, and bearing backe some old grudge against the prior of Douer, caused him to be cited by to appeare in the chapter house of Canturbury. The prior of Douer being this citation to be preiudicial to him and to the church of Douer, whereas the monks of Canturbury haue no such iurisdiction (the sea of Canturbury being vacant) but that all things appertaining to that church, ought to be reserued whole to the consecration of the new archbishop, therefore, for the state both of him and of his church, he appealed by also vnto Rome. But for want of the archbishops against.

About this time came out the great concordance by an English frier, called John Derrington. Ex Eulogio.

It was about declared, how a generall voyage being proclaimed to war against the Turks, and a subsidie being collected in England vpon the same: prince Edward with others was appointed to take their voiage, and now were toward in their armes. Who at Michelmas following, with his compame came to Sgermouth, which is from Marsilia eight leagues westward: and there taking ship againe (hauing a merrie wind and prosperous) within ten daies arriued at Sunes at Dunicum, where he was with great ioy welcomned and entertained of the christian princes that were to this purpose assembled, as of Philip the French king, whose father Ludouicus died a little before, of Carolus the king of Sicilia, and the two kings Hanse and Aragon. And as the lord Edward came thither for his father the king of England, thither came also Henry the sonne of the king of Almaine for his father, who at his returne from the voyage, was slaine in a chapell at Viterbium hearing masse, by the lord Simon and Guido, the sonnes of the lord Simon Mountfort earle of Leicester.

When prince Edward demanded of these kings and princes what was to be done, they answered him againe and said: The prince of this citie, said they, and the prouince adioining to the same, hath ben accustomed to pay tribute vnto the king of Sicilia euery yere. And now, for that the same hath ben for the space of seuen yers vnpaid and more, therefore we thought god to make inuasion vpon him. But the king hearing the same tribute to be iustlie demanded, hath now according to our owne desires fortified for the time past, and also paied his tribute before hand.

Then said he: My lords what is this to the purpose? Are we not here all assembled, and haue taken vpon vs the Lords character to fight against the infidels and enemies of Christ? What meane you then to conclude a peace with them? God forbid we should doe so, for now the land is plaine and bare, so that we may approach the holy city Hierusalem. Then said they: How haue we made a league with them, neither is it lawfull for vs to breake the same: but let vs returne againe to Sicilia, and when the winter is past, we may well take shipping to Acra. But this counsell nothing at all liked him, neither did he shew himselfe well pleased therewith: but after that he had made them a princely banket, hee went into his closet or priue chamber from amongst them, neither would he partake of any of that which had many which they had taken. They notwithstanding continuing their purpose, at the next merrie wind take shipping, and for want of ships, left two hundred of their men afhore, crying out and pitiously lamenting for the perill and hazard of death they were in. Where with prince Edward being somewhat moued with compassion, came back to the land, and receiued and bolsted them in his owne ships, being the last that went aboord. Within seuen daies after, they arriued in the kingdome of Sicilia, ouer against the citie Drapes, casting their anchors a league from thence within the sea, for that their ships were of great burthen, throughly fraught. And from the hauen of the citie they sent out barges and boats to receiue and bring such of the nobilitie to land as would: but for their horses for the most part, and all their armes they kept still within board. At length towards the euening the sea began to be rough, and increased to a great tempest and a mightie, insomuch that their ships were beaten one against another, and sore brused; and drowned there were of them at that tempest lying at anchor, more then an hundred and twentie, with all their armour and munition, with innumerable soules besides, and that wicked money also which they had taken before likewise perished and was drowned. What the tempest hurt not so much as one ship of prince Edwards, who had in number thirteen, nay not yet had one man lost thereby, for that, as it may be presupposed, he constrained not to the wicked counsel of the rest. When in the morning the princes and kings came to the sea side, and saw all their ships drowned, and saw their men and horses in great number cast vpon the land drowned, they had full heauie hearts, as well they might. For of all their ships and mariners, which were in number 200, besides the common sailers, there were no more saued then the mariners of one onely ship, and they in this wise. There was in that ship a good and wise matron (a countesse or an earles wife) who perceiuing the tempest to grow, & fearing her selfe, called to her the master of the ship, and asked whether in attempting to the shore, it were not possible to saue themselues? Who answered, that to saue the ship it was impossible, but bolt the men that were therein, for he hoped they should not. Then said the countesse,

For the ship force no whit, saue the soules therein, and haue to the double the value of the ship. Who immediatly hoising the sailes, with all force ran the ship a ground to nere the shore as possible was. Thus with the vehemencie of the weather and force he came withall, brast the ship, and saued all that was within the same, as the master of the same ship had shewed and said before.

Then the kings and princes (altering their purpose after this so great a shipwracke) returned home againe euen by one vnto their owne lands; onely Edward the kings sonne remained behinde with his men and ships, which the Lord had saued and preserued. Then prince Edward (renouating his purpose) take shipping againe, and within fiftene daies after Easter arriued he at Acra, and went aland, taking with him a thousand of the best souldiers and most expert, and left there a whole moneth, refreshing both his men and horses, and that in this space he might learne and know the secrets of the land. After this, he take with him fiue or seuen thousand souldiers and marched forward twenty miles from Acra, and tooke Nazareth: and thole that he there found he slew, and afterward returned again to Acra. Vnto their enemies following after them, thinking to haue set vpon them at some strait or other aduantage, were by the prince premonished thereof, and returning againe vpon them, gaue a charge, and slew many of them, and the rest they put to flight. After this, about Midsummer, when the prince had vnderstanding that the Saracens began to gather at Cachboth, which was forty miles from Acra: he marching thither, set vpon them very early in the morning, and slew of them more then a 1000, the rest he put to flight, and take rich spoiles, in marching forward till they came to a straight named Caffrum peregrinorum, situat vpon the sea coast, and tarried there that night, and the next day they returned toward Acra. In the meane season, the king of Hierusalem sent vnto the neighbours of Cyprus, desiring them with speed that they would come and aid the christians; but they would not come, saying, they would keepe their owne land and gee no further. Then prince Edward sent vnto them, desiring that at his request they woon'd come and ioine in aid with him. Who immediatly thereupon came vnto him with great preparation and furniture for the war, saying, that at his common indement they were bound to doe no lesse, for that his predecessors were sometimes gouer-gouernors of their land, and that they ought alwaies to shew their fidelity to the kings of England. Then the christians hearing herewith animated made a third voyage or more, and came as far as the fort called Vincula S. Petri, and to S. Georges: and when they had slaine certaine there, not finding any to make resistance against them, they returned againe from thence they came.

When thus the fame of prince Edward grew amongst his enemies, and that they began to stand in doubt of him: they deuised among themselues, how by some policie they might worke him some displeasure. Whereupon, the great emperour of Babylon sent vnto him, fayning himselfe vnder great deceit to become a christian, and that hee would draw with him a great number besides, so that they might be honorably entertained and vsed of the christians. This tallie pleased the prince well, and perswaded him to finish the thing he had so well begun, by writing againe vnto also by the same messenger sent and wrote backe vnto him diuers times about the same matter, whereby no mistrust should spring. This messenger, saith mine author, was one Excaute nutritus, one of the stony hearted that neither feared God, nor dreaded death. The fifth time when this messenger came, and was of the princes seruants searched, according to the manner and custome what weapon and armor he had about him, as also his purse, that not so much as a knife could be found about him, he was had vp into the princes chamber, and after his reuerence done, he pulled out certaine letters, which he deliuered to the prince from his lord, as he had done others before. This was about eight daies after Whitsuntide, vpon a tuesday, somewhat before night; at which time the prince was laid vpon his bed bare headed in his kerkin, for the great heat and intemperature of the weather.

What the prince had read the letters, it appeared by them, that vpon the saturday next following, his lord would be there ready to accomplish all that he had written and promised. The repoit of these newes by the prince to the standers by liked them well, drawing some what backe to consult thereof amongst themselues. In the meane time, the messenger, kneeling and making his obeisance to the prince (quickly preuenting him) put his hand to the belt, as though he would haue pulled out some secret letters; and suddenly he pulled out an inuenomed knife, thinking to haue stricken him into the belly therewith as he lay: but the prince lifting vp his hand to defend the blow, was stricken a great wound into the arme. And being about to fetch another stroke at him, the prince against with his left hand caught him such a blow, that he fell backward to the ground. Whereupon the prince gat him vp by the hand, and with such violence wrested the knife from him, that he hurt himselfe therewith in the forehead, and immediatly drawe the same into the belly of the messenger and striker, and slew him. The princes seruants being in the next chamber not far off, hearing the bustling, came with great haste running in. And finding the messenger lying dead on the floor, one of them take vp a stole, and beat out his braines; whereat the prince was wroth, for that he struck a dead man, and one that was killed before. The rumor hereof, as it was strange, so it some went throughout all the court, and from thence amongst the common people: wherefore they were very heauy and greatly discouraged. To him came also the captaine of the temple, and brought him a costly and pretious drinke against poison, lest the venome of the knife should penetrat the liuely bloud, and in blacking the same. Who when he did not then vpon your grace before of the deceit and subtiltie of this people: perswithstanding, saith he, let your grace take a good heart, you shall not die of this wound; my life for yours. But straightway the surgeons and physicians were sent for, and the prince was dressed, and within a few daies after the wound began to putrifie, and the flesh to looke dead and blacke; whereupon they that were about the prince began to murmur amongst themselues, and were very sad and heauy. Which thing he himselfe perceiuing, said vnto them; Why matter you thus amongst your selues? What see you in me, can I not be healed? Tell me the truth, ye are not afraid. Whereupon one said to him; and like your grace you may bee healed, we mistrust it not; but yet it will be very painfull for you to suffer. May suffering, saith he againe, restore health? Yea, saith the other, no paine of losing no health. Then said the prince, I commit my selfe vnto you, doe with me what you thinke good. Then said one of the physicians; Is there any of your nobles in whom your grace reposeth speciall trust? To whom the prince answered, yea, naming certaine of the noble men that stood about him. Then said the physician vnto the two whom the prince first named, the lord Edmund, and the lord John Mosile: And doe you also faithfully loue your lord the prince? Who answered both readily. Then saith he; Take you away this gentlewoman and lady (meaning his wife) and let her not see her lord and husband, vntill such a time I will you thereunto. Whereupon they take her out of the princes presence, crying out and wringing her hands. Then said they vnto her; Be ye contented good lady and madam, it is better that one woman should weepe a little while, then that all the realme of England should weepe a great season. Then vpon the morrow they cut out all the dead enuenomed flesh out of the princes arme, and their withall from them, and said vnto him: Now therefore your grace may be of good comfort, in these fiue daies you shall haue your selfe abroade (if God permit) vpon your horse backe, whole and well as euer you were. And according to the promise he made the prince, he came to passe, to the no little comfort and admiration of all his subiects. When the great Sodan heard of it, and that the prince was yet aliue, he would scarsly beleeue the same; and sending vnto him three of his nobles and princes, erected hand, the by them, calling his gods to witnesse, that the same was done neither by him, nor his consent. Which princes and messengers standing aloofe off from the kings lodge, worshipping him, fell flat vpon the ground. But (saith the prince) doe reuerence me, but yet you loue me not. But they vnderstood him not, because he spake in English vnto them, speaking by an interpreter. Neuertheless, he honorably entreated them, and sent them away in peace.

Thus when prince Edward had bene eight & fiue moneths in Acra, he take shipping about the assumption of our lady, as we call it, returning homewards, and after seuen weekes he arriued in Sicilia at Trapes, and from thence trauelling through Palestina and Bethnes, and so through the midst of Apulia, all he came to Rome, where he was of the pope honorably entertained, from thence he came into France, where, whole fame and noble prowesse was there much buted among the common people, and enuied of the nobilitie, especially of the earle de Chalons who sent vnto him and required him that he might breake a staffe with him at the tilt in his country. Which thing to doe, for that the prince would not hinderlie his honor and fame (although he might haue well alleaged a sufficient cause and excuse by reason of his trauell) yet he would not, but willingly consented the same: thereupon it was proclaimed, that prince Edward by such a day, with those that were with him, had challenged all commers at the tilt and barriers. Whereupon great assemblies were made in the country all about, and diuers, as well horsemen as footmen, had comforted amongst themselues and conspired against the Englishmen, selling their horses and armors aforehand, and binding one to another in bonds one of the spoile of them whom they would take as their prisoners. Prince Edward in the meane time sent into England for diuers earles and barons, which came vnto him. When the day appointed was come, the prince had with him more then one thousand horsemen, which were knights, besides his footmen, but yet there was as many more on the other side both in horsemen and footmen. When the parties should meete, the French footmen which had before espyed, began both to spoile, riffle, and kill. The Englishmen resisted and defended themselues both with bowes and slings, many of them they slew, and draue them to the gates of their citie, the other they chased ouer a riuer, where many of them were drowned. In the meane season the earle with fiftie of his knights which followed him, came forth and ioined together so many for so many, and a long time together they cried it with their swords, laying one at another. At the last the earle perceiuing himselfe not able to match with him at the armes end enclosed with him, and taking him about the neck, held him with his armes very strait. What meane you my lord, saith the prince? thinke you to haue my horse? Yea marry, quoth the earle; I meane to haue both thee and thy horse. Hereat prince Edward being ashamed, lifted vp himselfe, and gaue him a blow that therewithall he forsaking his horse, hung still about the princes neck, till that hee throwe him off to the ground. Herewith the prince being somewhat in a heat, left the preasse to take the aire, thereby to refresh himselfe. But when he saw the iniurie of the Frenchmen towards his men, and how they had slaine many of them, he then said vnto them, that they vsed rather the exercise of battell, then of tourney. Spare not, saith he (saith he) from henceforth none of them all, but giue them againe as good as they bring. Then they afraied to kill each other fraily on either part, and let their swords walke.

And when by this time the Englishmen were againe returned, and saw the conflict of horsemen and many other Englishmen ouerthrowne, they put themselues amidst the preasse, some punching the horses, some cutting asunder the girths of the Frenchmens saddles, ouerthrew the riders and gaue them hold bread. Then when the foresaid earle was hoised againe by some of his men and amongst the throng, prince Edward also rushed in amongst the thickest, and roped against with him: to whom he often spake and cried, that he should yeeld himselfe as vanquished: but th at he would not doe. Finally, when his strength began to faile him, he was fame to yeelde himselfe vnto a simple knight, according as prince Edward him had, and all the rest of his horsemen and knights fled and saued themselues. Howbeit, many of them in that place were slaine, and our men returned hauing the victory. But when after this they thought themselues to be quiet and at rest, they were killed by two and by three at once as they went in the streets of the citizens. Which thing when the prince heard he sent for the maior and burgesses, commanding them to see the same redressed, and that immediatly: for otherwise, of his knighthood he assured them, that vpon the morrow he would fire the citie, and make it to well with the ground. ## Certaine notes of other occurrents chanced in foren countries abrode, within the compasse of the yeres and raigne of the foresaid king Henry the third.

HAuing thus accomplished the life and history of king Henrie the third, with such accidents as happened within this realme, I thought good to adioine vnto the same some other foren matters not vnworthy the note, incident in other countries during the time of the said king: namelie from the yere of our Lord 1217, vnto this yere 1272, which I thought the rather not to be omitted, for that euen from and about the beginning of this kings raigne, sprang vp the verie welsprings of all mischiefe, the seeds of monkish religions and other swarmes of popish orders, which with their grosse and horrible superstitions haue incumbred the church of Christ euer since.

First, to omit the repetition of pope Innocent the third, the great grandsire of that foule monster of antichristian blasphemie and auricular confession, with the friers Dominicke, and Francis-can friers, Thomas Aquinas, Iacobus de Voragine, Vincentius, with pope Honorius the third, corner of the canon law, and the cardinall Hostiensis, as also Bonauenture, Albertus Magnus, with pope Vrban the fourth, first founder of the feast of Corpus Christi, and procurer of the adoration of the body of Christ in the sacrament, besides Durandus and many more: followeth further to be noted, that the Tartarians about the yere 1240, issuing out of Muscouia into the parts of Polonia, made great waste in Christendome, so much the rather because the princes about Polonia being at variance amongst themselues, vsed none other remedy for their defence, but heaps of masses, innocents of the dead, and worshipping of images, which indeed did nothing relieue them, but rather increase their trouble.

Ex Annalibus Silesiæ. The Tartarians make great spoile in Christendome.

The next yere following, the whole nation of the Scythians (mustering like locustes) inuaded the parts of Europe with two mightie armies; wherof the one entring vpon Polonia, made great hauocke and carried away many christians from thence captiues, the other ouerrunning Hungaria, made no lesse spoile there. Adde hereunto another fresh army of Tartarians, to the number of 500000, who at the verie same time ioining themselues together, entred into Muscouia and Cracouia, and made most horrible slaughter, sparing neither sex nor age, noble nor vnnoble within the land. From thence passing to Trattlania, made great spoile there also, and thinking there to win the castel, were by the miraculous working of the Lord, at the instance and praiers of good people discomfited beyond all expectation of man, by thundering and lightning falling vpon them from heauen in most terrible wise.

The Scythians verie like locustes.

The same yere immediatly after Easter, another army of Tartarians were gathered against Lignicium, drawing neere to Germany, by the brute whereof, the Germans being put in great feare, were altogether animated, but yet not able to helpe themselues, by reason they lacked a good guide and gouernor amongst them. All which came to passe, specially by the mischieuous practise of the Romish popes, raising variance & discord among them. Notwithstanding Henry prince of Polonia and Silesia, gathering a power as well as he could, did incounter with him: but in fine, his whole army was vanquished, and the king himselfe slaine. Notwithstanding which ouerthrow of christians it pleased God to strike such a feare into the hearts of the said Tartarians, that they durst not approach any further or nerer into Germany, but retired for that time into their country againe: who recounting their victory by taking each man but one care of euery of the christians that were slaine, found the slaughter so great, as that they filled nine great sacks full of eares. Neuertheless, after this in the yere 1260, the same Tartarians hauing the occasion to their gaines returned againe into Polonia and Cracouia, where in the space of three moneths, they ouerran the land with fire and sword euen to the coasts of Silesia. And had not the princes of Germany put to their helping hand in this lamentable case, they had vtterly wasted the whole land of Polonia and the coasts thereabouts.

King Henry slaine, and his army vanquished.

Nine sacks full of christians eares being slaine.

This yere also in the moneth of Aprill, Richard king of Almaine died at the castell of Berkhamsted, and was buried at the abbey of Hailes, which he built out of the ground. The same yere also at Norwich there fell a great controuersie betweene the monks and the citizens, about certaine tallages and liberties. At last, after much altercation and wrangling words, the furious rage of the citizens so much increased and preuailed, and so little was the feare of God before their eies, that all together they set vpon the abbey and priory, and burned both the church and bishops palace. When this thing was heard abrode, the people were verie sory to heare of so bold and naughty an enterprise, and much discommended the same. At the last, king Henry calling to certaine of his lords and barons, sent them to the citie of Norwich, that they might punish and see execution done on the chiefest malefactors; insomuch that some of them were condemned and burnt, some of them hanged, and some were drawne by the heeles with horses throughout the streetes of the citie, and after in much misery ended their wretched liues. The same yere Adam the pius of Canturbury, and bishop elect, in the presence of pope Gregory the tenth, refused to be archbishop, although he was elect. Wherefore the pope gaue the same archbishoprike to frier Robert Kilwardby the prouoll of the preaching friers, a man of good life and great learning. He was consecrated at Canturbury the fourth day of March, by sir bishops of the same prouince. The same yere also at Michaelmas, the lord Edmund, the sonne of king Richard of Almaine, married the sister of Gilbert earle of Glocester. Also in this yere of our Lord 1273, the sixteenth day before the kalends of December vpon S. Edmunds day, the archbishop and confessor, died king Henry, in the 57 and fifty yer of his raigne, and was buried at Westminster, leauing after him two sons and two daughters, to wit, Edward the prince, and Edmund earle of Lancaster and Leicester, Beatrice and Margaret; which Margaret was married to the king of Scots. This king Henry in his life time began the building of the church and close at Westminster, but did not throughly finish the same before his death.

King Edward the first.

IN the time of the death of king Henry, Edward his eldest son was absent in Gascoina, as a little before you heard; yet notwithstanding, by Robert Kilwarby archbishop of Canturbury, and other bishops and nobles, he was ordained here and successor after his father; who, after he had heard of his fathers death, returned home to his country, and was crowned in the yere of our Lord 1274, who then laid downe his crowne, saying he would no more put it on, before he had gathered together all the lands pertaining to the same. This Edward as he had alwaies before been a louing and naturall child to his father, whom he had deliuered out of prison and captiuitie: and afterward hearing both together of the death of his sonne, and of his father, wept and lamented much more for his father then for his sonne, saying to the French king (which asked the cause thereof) that the losse of his child was but light: for children might after increase and be multiplied, but the losse of his parent was greater, which could not be recouered: Robert Auesburie. So almighty God for the same his pietie to his father shewed, rewarded him againe with great successe, felicitie, and long raigne: insomuch that he being young, as he was playing at chesse with a certaine souldior of his, suddenly hauing occasion giuen, rose vp and went his way; who was not so some voided the place, but incontinent fell downe a mightie stone from the hault above, directly vpon the place where he sat, able to haue quashed him in peeces. If hee had tarried neuer so little more. In the preseruation of whom, as I see the present hand and mightie prouidence of the liuing God: so in the kings order againe, I note a fault or error worthy of reprehension: for that he receiuing such a liuely benefit at the hand of the liuing Lord, going therefore on pilgrimage to Walsingham, gaue thanks not onely to our Lord, but rather to a rotten blocke. Ibidem. Of the gentle nature of this courageous prince, sufficient proofe is giuen by this one example: that what time he being in his disport of hawking, chanced sharply to rebuke the negligence of one of his gentlemen, for what fault I cannot tell about his hawke; the gentleman being on the other side of the riuer, hearing his menacing words, was glad (as he said) that the riuer was betweene them. With this answer the courageous blod of this prince being mooued, vpon present heat he leaped straight into the flod, both of a swift stream & of a dangerous deepnesse, and no lesse hard in getting out. Notwithstanding, either forgetting his owne life, or neglecting the danger present, but hauing a good horse, ventureth his owne death to haue the death of his man. At length, with much difficultie recouering the banke, with his sword drawne pursueth his prouoker. Who hauing not so good an horse, and seeing himselfe in danger of taking, reineth his horse, and returning backe barehead vnto the prince, submitteth his necke vnder his hand to strike. The prince, whose feruent stomacke the water of the whole riuer could not quench, a little submission of his man did so fetche that the quarrell fell, his anger ceased, and

Which to came vse at London, with a crowne on his head. Which to came vse

First, that when king Henry the father of this king, receiued aid of Alexander king of Scots in his warres against Simon Mountford, he recognised and acknowledged in his letters patents, that he receiued the same of king Alexander, not of any duty, but of speciall fauor.

Item, when the said king Alexander coming to England, did homage to the said king Henry: he did it not as king of Scotland, but only for certaine lands of Cyndall and Penreth, lying in England.

Item, after the said king Alexander left behind him Margaret his heire, being neere to the king of England, and yet vnder age; yet the tuition of the said Margaret was committed not to the king of England, but to certaine lords of Scotland, deputed to the same.

Moreouer, when any legacie was directed downe from Rome to the realme of England, for collecting of tenths or other causes, the sa d legacie toke no place in the realme of Scotland, and might well be resisted (as it was in king Alexanders his daies) except another speciall commission touching the realme of Scotland, were ioyned withall. Whereby it appeareth, these be two seuerall dominions, and not subiect vnder one.

Adding furthermore, that the kingdome of Scotland first was conuerted by the reliques of the blessed apostle saint Peter, through the diuine operation of God, to the vnitie of the catholike faith.

Wherefore vpon these causes and reasons, pope Boniface in his letters to the king, required him to giue ouer his claime, and cease his wars against the Scottish nation: And to release all such both of the spirituality and laity, as he had of them prisoners. Also to call home againe his officers and deputies, which he had there placed and ordained to the grieuance of that nation, to the slander of all faithfull people, and no lesse preiudice to the church of Rome. And if he would claime any right or title to the said realme, or any part thereof, he should send vp his procurators specially to the same appointed, with all that he could for himselfe alleage, vnto the sea apostolike, there to receiue what reason and right would require.

The king replieth to the pope.

The king, af.er he had receiued these letters of the pope, assembled a councell or parliament at Lincolne: by the aduice of which councell and parliament, he addressed other letters resp nsall to the pope against him, in first all reuerend manner hee desireth him not to giue light eare to the sinister suggestions of false reporters, and imaginers of mischiefe. Then hee declareth out of old records and histories from the first time of the Britaines, that the realme of Scotland hath alwaies from time to time been all one with England, beginning first with Brutus in the time of Helie and Samuel the Prophet: which Brutus comming from Troy to this Ile called then Albion, after called by him Britannia, had three sonnes: Locrinus, to whom he gaue that part of the land, called then of h m Loegria, now Anglia: Albanactus his second sonne, to whom he gaue Albania, now called Scotia: and his third sonne Camber, to whom he gaue Cambria, now called Wales, &c.

Brutus. Locrinus. Albanactus. Camber.

And thus much concerning the first diuision of this Ile, as in ancient histories is found recorded. In which matter, passing ouer the death of king Humber, the acts of Dunwalde king of this realme, the diuision of Belyn and Brene, the victories of king Arthur, we will resort (saith the king) to more neerer times, testified and witnessed by sufficient authors, as Marianus Scotus, William Malmesbury, Roger Abyndon, Henry Huntington, Radulph de Bizoro and other. All which make speciall declaration, and giue manifest euidence of the execution of this our right (saith he) and title of superioritie, euer continued and preserued hitherto.

And first to begin with Edward the senior, before the conquest, sonne to Aluredе king of England, about the yeere of our Lord 900. it is plaine and manifest, that he had vnder his dominion and obedience the king of Scots. And here is to be noted, that this matter was so notorious and manifest, as Marianus Scot writing that story in those daies, granteth, confesseth and testifieth the same: and this dominion continued in that state 22 yeeres. At which time, Athelstane succeeded in the crowne of England, and hauing by battell conquered Scotland, hee made one Constantine king of that party, to rule and gouerne the country of Scotland vnder him, adding this princely word: That it was more honour to him to make a king, then to be a king.

Alias 907.

Twenty foure yeeres after that, which was the yeere of our Lord 947, Eldred king our progenitor, Athelstanus brother, tooke homage of Irife then king of Scots.

Thirtie yeeres after that, which was the yeere of our Lord 977, king Edgar our predecessour tooke homage of Kynald king of Scots. Here was a little trouble in England by the death of saint Edward king and martyr, destroied by the deceit of his mother in law, but yet within memory.

Forty yeers after the homage done by Kynald to king Edgar, that is to say, in the yeere of our Lord 1017, Malcolme the king of Scots did homage to Knute our predecessor. After this homage done, the Scots vttered some peece of their naturall disposition, whereupon (by warre made by our progenitor saint Edward the Confessor, thirty and nine yeeres after that homage done, that is to say, the yeere of our Lord 1056) Malcolme king of Scots was vanquished, and the realme of Scotland giuen to Malcolme his sonne by our said progenitor saint Edward, vnto whom the said Malcolme made homage and fealtie.

Within fortie yeeres after that, William Conqueror entred this realme, whereof hee accounted no perfect conquest, vntill hee had likewise subdued the Scots: and therefore in the said yeere (which was in the yeere of our Lord 1068) the said Malcolme king of Scots did homage to the said William the Conqueror, as his superiour by conquest king of England.

Twenty and fiue yeers after that, which was the yeer of our Lord 1093, the said Malcolme did homage and fealtie to William Rufus, sonne to the said William Conqueror: and yet after that, was for his offences and demerits deposed, and his sonne substituted in his place, who likewise failed in his dutie, and therefore was ordained in that estate by the said William Rufus, Edgar brother to the last Malcolme, and son to the first, who did his homage and fealtie accordingly.

Seuen yeeres after that, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1100, the said Edgar king of the Scots, did homage to Henry the first our progenitor.

Thirty seuen yeers after that, Dauid king of Scots did homage to Matild the Emperatrice, as daughter and heire to Henry the first. Wherefore being after required by Stephan, then obtaining possession of the realme, to make his homage: he refused so to doe, because he had before made it to the said Matilde, and thereupon forbare. After which Dauids death, which ensued shortly after, the sonne of the said Dauid made homage to the said king Stephan.

Fourteene yeeres after that, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1150, William king of Scots, and Dauid his brother, with all the nobles of Scotland, made homage to Henry the second his sonne, with a reseruation of their dutie to Henry the second his father.

Twentie sue yeeres after that, which was in the yeer of our Lord 1175, William king of Scotland, after much rebellion and resistance, according to their naturall inclination, (king Henry the second then being in Normandy) knowledged finally his error, and made his peace and composition, confirmed with his great seale, and the seales of the nobilitie of Scotland, making therewith his homage and fealtie.

Within fifteene yeeres after that, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1190, the said William king of Scots came to our citie of Canturbury, and there did homage to our noble progenitor king Richard the first.

Fourteen yeeres after that, the said William did homage to our progenitor king John, vpon a hill besides Lincolne, making his oth vpon the crosse of Hubert, then archbishop of Canturbury, being there present, and a maruellous multitude assembled for that purpose.

Twenty six yeeres after that, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1230, Alexander king of Scots married Margaret the daughter of our progenitor Henry the third, at our citie of Yorke, in the feast of Christmas: at which time the said Alexander did his homage to our said progenitor, who raigned in this realme 56 yeeres. And therefore betweene the homage made by the said Alexander king of Scotland, and the homage done by Alexander, sonne to the said king of Scots, to vs at our coronation at Westminster, there was about fiftie yeeres. At which time, the said Alexander king of Scots repaired to the said feast of our coronation, and there did hee his dutie as is aforesaid.

¶ Besides these letters of the king, the lords temporall also in the name of the whole communalte and parliament, wrote another letter to the pope, answering to that, where as the pope arrogated to him to be iudge of the title of the realm of Scotland, which the king of England claimed vnto himselfe: which letter I thought good also here to annex, containing, as in the words of the same here followeth to be read and seene.

The lords temporall, and the whole Barony of England to the pope.

A letter of the lords temporall to the pope.

THE holy mother church, by whose ministery the catholike sea is gouerned, in her decrees (as wee throughly beleeue and hold) proceedeth with that ripenesse in iudgement, that shee will be hurtfull to none: but like a mother would euery mans right to be kept vnbroken as well in other, as in her selfe. Whereas therefore in a generall parliament called at Lincolne of late by our most dread lord Edward, by the grace of God the noble king of England: the same our lord caused certaine letters receiued from you to be read openly, and to bee declared seriously afore vs, about certaine businesses touching the condition and state of the realme of Scotland: wee did not a little muse and maruell with our selues, hearing the meanings concerning the same, so wondrous and strange, as the like we haue haue not heard at any time before. For wee know most holy father, and it is well knowne aswell in this realme of England (as also not vnknowne to other persons besides) that from the first beginning of the realme of England; the certaine and direct gouernment of the realme of Scotland in all temporall causes, from time to time belonged to the kings of the same realme of England, and realme of Scotland: as well in the times both of the Britaines, as also of Englishmen. Yea rather, the same realme of Scotland of old time was in fee to the ancestors of our foresaid lords kings of England, yea and to himselfe. Furthermore, the kings of Scots, and the realme, haue not been vnder any other then the kings of England, and the kings of England haue answered, or ought to answere for their rights in the foresaid realme, or for any his temporalities afore any Iudge ecclesiasticall or secular, by reason of free preheminence of the state of his royall dignitie and custom kept without breach at all times. Wherefore, after treatie had and diligent deliberation of the contents in your foresaid letters, this was the common agreeing and consent with one mind, and shall bee without faile in time to come by Gods grace: that our foresaid lord the king, ought by no meanes to answere in iudgment in any case, or should bring his foresaid rights into doubt: nor ought not to send any proctors or messengers to your presence: specially seeing that the premises tend manifestly to the disheriting of the right of the Crowne of England, and the plaine ouerthrow of the state of the said realme, and also hurt of the liberties, customs and lawes of our fathers: For the keeping and defence of which wee are bound by the dutie of the oth made. And we will maintaine them with all power, and will defend them (by Gods helpe) with all strength. And further, we will not suffer our foresaid lord the king to doe, or by any meanes to attempt the premises, being so vnaccustomed, vnwont, and not heard of afore. Wherefore, we reuerently and humbly beseech your holinesse, that ye would suffer the same our lord king of England (who among other princes of the world, sheweth himselfe catholike and deuout to the Romish church) quietlie to enioy his rights, liberties, customes, and lawes afore said: without all impairing and trouble, and let them continue vntouched. In witnesse whereof wee haue set our seales to these presents, aswell for vs, as for the whole communaltie of the foresaid realme of England. Dated at Lincolne in the yeare of our Sauiour 1301. & anno Edwardi primi 28.

The pope sendeth all one with England.

§ Anno § 1301 §

The pope setteth king against king.

Ex R. Auesb.

The yeare following, which was from Christ, Anno 1303. the said pope Boniface the eight of that name, taking displeasure with Philip the French king; did excite king Edward of England to warre against him, promising him great aide thereunto. But he (as mine author saith) little trusting the popes false vnstable affection toward him well pyzed before, put him off with delaies. Ex Rob. Auesb. Whereupon, the French king fearing the power of king Edward whom the pope had set against his friendship; restored vnto him againe Wascone, which hee wrongfully had in his hands detained. Concerning this variance heere mentioned betweene the pope and the French king, how it began first, and to what end it fell out; the sequell hereof (Christ willing) shall declare, after that first I haue finished the discourse begun betweene England and Scotland.

Another Scottish rebellion suppressed.

In the yeare 1303. the foresaid William Waleis, which had done so many displeasures to the king before (continued still in his rebellion) gathered great multitudes of the Scots to withstand the king: till at length, the peare following he was taken, and sent vp to London, and there executed for the same. After which things done, the king then held his parliament at Westminster, whither came out of Scotland the bishop of saint Andrewes, Robert Wise aboue mentioned, earle of Dunbarre, earle of Arles, and sir John Comming, with diuers other: The which voluntarily were sworne to be true to the king of England, and to keepe the land of Scotland to his vse against all persons. But shortly after the said Robert Wise, who, as is said, married the second daughter of earle Dauid, forgetting his oth before made vnto the king; within a yeare or two after this, by the counsell of the abbat of Stone, and bishop of saint Andrewes, sent vp vnto pope Clement the fifth, for a dispensation of his oth made: insinuating to him, that king Edward vexed and grieued the realme of Scotland wrongfully. Whereupon the pope wrote vnto the king, to leaue off such doings. Notwithstanding which inhibition of the pope, the king prosecuting his owne right, after he had the vnderstanding of the doings of the Scots, and of the mischiefe of Robert Wise, (who had claine with his owne hands sir John Comming, for) not consenting with him and other lords at his parliament) arrered his power and strength of men, preparing himselfe toward Scotland: where he forning with the said sir Robert of them were slaine to the number of 7. thousand. In the which victorie, such bishops and abbats as were taken, he sent them to the pope; the temporall lords and other Scots hee sent vnto London, &c. Sir Robert Wiseaker this discomfiture, when hee had thus lost both the field and chiefe friends, seeing himselfe not able to make his partie good, fled into Norwaie, where hee kept his abode during the time while king Edward liued. When this noble Edward had thus subdued the Scots, he yeelded thanks to God for his victorie, and so setting the land in a quiet, and an order, hee returned vnto London, which was the 35. yeare and last of his reigne, &c.

Pope Boniface 8 author of the book of decretales.

Now returning to that which I promised before touching the variance and grieuous dissention betweene Philip the French king, and pope Boniface the eight of that name: After the bishoppike of Rome had been long voide through the dissention of the cardinals, for the space of two yeares and three moneths; at length, pope Celestinus was chosen successor to pope Nicolas the fourth. Which Celestinus in his first consistorie, began to reforme the clergie of Rome, thinking to make it an example to all other churches. Wherefore, he procured to himselfe such a hatred among his clergie men, that this Boniface, then called Benedictus, speaking through a reed by his chamber wall nightly admonished him, as if had been a voice from heauen, that he should giue ouer his papacie, as being a burthen bigger then hee could wield.

This pope Celestine after hee had sat sir moneths, by the treacherie and fallhood of this Boniface, was induced to giue vp and resigne his bishoppike, partly for the voice spoken of before, partly for feare: being told of certaine craftie suborned in his chamber, that if hee did not resigne, hee should lose his life. Who then after his resignation going to liue in some solitarie desert (being a simple man) was vilely taken and thrust into perpetuall prison by pope Boniface: craftilie pretending that hee did it not for any hatred vnto Celestine, but that seditious persons might not haue him as their head to raise vp some stirre in the church. And so was brought to his death. Wherefore, this Boniface was worthilie called the 8 Nero: of whom it was rightly said, He came in like a Fox, he reigned like a Lion, and died like a dog.

This pope Boniface succeeding, or rather inuading after Celestinus, behaued himselfe so imperiously, that hee put downe princes, excommunicated kings, such as did not take their confirmation at his hand. Diuers of his cardinals he draue away for feare, some of them as schismatikes hee deposed and spoiled them of all their substance. Philip the French king hee excommunicated, for not suffering his money to goe out of the realme, and therefore cursed both his and him, to the fourth generation. Albertus the emperour not once nor twice, but thrice sought at his hands to bee confirmed, and yet was refused, neither could obtaine vnlesse first vnto promise to driue the French king out of his realme.

In the factious discord in Italie between the Guelphs and Gibellines, which the part of a good bishop had beene to extinct; so little he helped to quench the smoake, that hee of all other was chiefest firebrand to increase the flame. Insomuch that vpon Ashwednesday, when Portchetus an archbishop came and kneeled downe before him to receiue his ashes; pope Boniface looking vpon him, and perceiuing that hee was one of the Gibellines pari, cast his handfull of ashes in his eyes, saying: Memento homo quòd Gibellinus es, &c. That is: Remember man that a Gibelline thou art, and to ashes thou shalt goe. This pope moreouer ordained first the Iubile in Rome: in the solemnizing whereof, the first day hee shewed himselfe in his Pontificalibus, and gaue free remission of sinnes to as many as came to Rome out of all the parts of the world. The second day (being arrayed with imperiall ensignes) he commanded a naked sword to be carried before him, and said with a loud voice: Ecce potestatem vtriusque gladij: That is, Lo heere the power and authoritie of both the swords, &c.

From the which very peare (as most stories doe record) the Turkes doe begin the first count of their Turkish emperours, whereof the first was Ottomannus, as you shall heare discoursed hereafter by Gods grace in the historie of the Turks.

By this said pope Boniface, diuers constitutions extrauagants of his predecessors were collected together, with many of his owne newly added thereto, so made the booke called Sextus decretalium, &c. By whom also first sprang vp pardons and indulgences from Rome.

These things thus premised of Boniface the pope, now will I come to the occasion of the strife betweene him, and the French king. Concerning which matter, first I find in the historie of Nicolas Triuet, that in the peare of our Lord, 1301. the bishop of Oppanuham being accused for a conspiracie against the French king, was brought vp to his court, and so committed to prison. The pope hearing this, sendeth word to the king by his legat to set him at liberte. The French king not daring to the contrarie, loosed the bishop. When hee had done, hee discharged both the bishop and the legat, commanding them to voide his realme. Whereupon pope Boniface reuoketh all the graces and priuiledges granted either by him or his predecessors before time vnto the kings of France: also not long after thundring out the sentence of his curse against him. Moreouer, citeth all the prelats, all diuines, and lawyers both ciuill and canon, to appeare personally before him at Rome, at a certaine day, which was the first of Nouember. Against this citation, the king ageine prouideth and commandeth by strait proclamation, that no maner of person should export out of the realme of France either gold, or siluer, or any other maner of ware or merchandise, vpon forfeiting al their goods, and their bodies at the kings pleasure: prouiding withall, the waies and passages diligently to be kept, that none might passe vnsearched. Ouer and besides, the said French king defeated the pope in giuing and bestowing prebends, and benefices, and other ecclesiasticall liuings, contrarie to the popes profit. For the which cause, the pope inciteth to the foresaid king in forme & effect as followeth.

Boniface bishop and seruant to Gods seruants, to his beloued son Philip, by the grace of God, king of France, greeting and Apostolicall blessing.

For S. Stephans seruice.

BOniface the seruant of Gods seruants, &c. feare God, and obserue his commandements. We will thee to vnderstand, that thou art subiect to vs both in spirituall things, and temporall. And that no gift of benefices or prebends belongeth to thee: and if thou haue the keeping of any being vacant, that thou reserue the profits of them to the successors. But if thou haue giuen any, we iudge the gift to be void, and call backe how far soeuer thou hast gone forward. And whosoeuer beleeueth otherwise, we iudge them hereticks.

Vnto this letter of the pope, king Philip maketh answere againe in maner and order as followeth, which is this.

Philip by the grace of God king of France,
to Boniface not in deeds, behauing himselfe for pope, little friendship or none.

A letter of king Philip of France to pope Boniface.

TO Boniface bearing himselfe for chiefe bishop, little health or none. Let thy foolishnesse know, that in temporall things we are subiect to no man, and that the gifts of prebends, and benefices made and to bee made by vs were and shall bee good, both in time past and to come. And that we will defend manfully the possessor of the said benefices, and we thinke them that beleeue or thinke otherwise, fooles and mad men. Giuen at Paris the wednesday after Candlemas, 1301.

After these aforesaid and other writings passing to and fro, betweene the French king and the Pope: within a peare and a halfe after, the king summoneth a parliament, sending vnto his letters to his sheriffes and other officers to summon the prelats and barons of the realme, vnto the said court of parliament, according to the tenor of the kings letters here following.

A parliament summoned by K. Philip at Paris.

PHilip by the grace of God king of France, &c. Whereas we would take counsell with the prelats, barons, and other our faithfull, about waighties matters and hard, and such as belong greatly to our right and touching our honor, state, liberties and lawes of this our realme, churches, and ecclesiasticall persons, and would also go forward and proceed in the foresaid matters according to their counsell: Wee command you, that ye diligently in our behalfe require and straitly charge all the prelats in your bailiwicke, and also all and singuler abbats and priors of the same your foresaid bailiwicke, (to certaine of the which we haue directed downe our speciall letters for the same cause) that as they fauour our honor, the good state both of the realme, of themselues, and of the church, they repaire to vs in their owne persons, all lets and delaies set aside, and all other businesse left off. Shewing to them moreouer, that wee can iudge none of them to be either to vs faithfull subiects, or friends to the realm, which shall faile herein, or withdraw himselfe in the foresaid businesse, counsels, and helpes in time. Wherein if peraduenture any shall slacke or refuse to resort and come toward vs within eight daies from the time of this charge giuen by you, or your commandement: That then, you to seise all his temporall goods into our hand, and so seised to hold them vntill you receiue other commandement from vs. Giuen at Paris the monday before the Natiuitie of S. Iohn Baptist, in the yeare of our Lord 1303.

A declaration of master William Nagareta, made against Pope Boniface the eight, with his appellation also made at Paris, afore the king and his counsell in the church of Paris.

The appeale of Nagareta made against pope Boniface the 8.

IN the name of God, Amen. In the yeare of our Lord 1303. Indictione secunda, the 12 day of March, and the ninth yeere of the popedome of the most holy father the L. Boniface the 8. by Gods prouidence pope; and in the presence of 1 common notaries, and witnesses written vnder, the nob man master William Nagareta knight (a worshipful professour of the lawes) standing afore the most excellent prince the lord Philip, by the grace of God most noble king of France; spake with lowly words, and gaue in writing these things that follow.

Ex Regist.

There haue been false prophets among the people, as there haue been also among you false teachers, &c. Saint Peter the glorious prince of the Apostles, speaking to vs by the spirit, told vs things to come: that likewise as there were false prophets aforetime, so there should come among you false teachers, bringing in sects of destruction: by the which the way of truth shall be defaced: and couetousie they shall make merchandise of you with fained words; and further addeth, that such masters did follow the way of Balaam, of Bosor, which loued the reward of wickednesse, and had his bridled Asse to correct his madnesse, which speaking in a mans voice did stop the foolishnes of the Prophet. All which things as they be shewed to vs by the greatest Patriarch himselfe: your eyes see them fulfilled this day according to the letter. For there sitteth in saint Peters chaire the master of lies, causing himselfe to be called Boniface i. a well-doer, where he is notable in all kind of euill doing, and so both he hath taken to himselfe a false name; and where he is not a true ruler and master, he calleth himselfe the lord, iudge, and master of all men. And comming in contrarie to the common order appointed by the holy fathers, and also contrarie to the rules of reason, and so not entring in at the dore into the Lords sheepefold, is not a shepheard nor hireling, but rather a theefe and robber. For he (the true husband of the Romish church yet liuing) deceiued him that was delighted in simplicitie, and enticed him with fained flatterings and gifts to let him haue his spouse to bee his wife, against truth, which is eieth: Those whom God hath coupled, let no man separate: and at length laying violent hands vpon him, persuading him fally that thing which the deceiuer said to come from the holy spirit; was not ashamed to ioyne to himselfe with wicked practise that holy church, which is mistresse of all churches, calling himselfe to her husband, whereas he cannot bee: for Celestinus the true Romish bishop, agreed not to the said diuorce, being deceiued by so great subtiltie; nothing is so contrarie to agreeing as errour and deceit, as mans lawes beare witnesse, that I need not to speake of his violence. But because the spirit inspireth where he will, and he that is led with the spirit, is not vnder the law, the holy vniuersall church of God, not knowing the crafts of the deceiuer, stumbling and doubting whether it came from the holy Ghost that Celestinus should leaue off his gouernment, and the sinnes of the people deseruing it, for feare of a schisme, suffered the foresaid deceiuer: although according to the doctrine of our Lord, by his fruits hee might be knowne, whether he came to the said regiment by the holy Ghost or otherwise: his fruits (as it is plainely here written beneath) are now manifest to all men, by which it is apparant to the world, that hee came not in by God but otherwaies: and so came not in by the sheepefold. His fruits are most wicked, and his end is death, and therefore it is necessarie that so euill a tree (according to the Lords saying) should be cut downe and cast into the fire. This cannot auaile to his excuse, which is faid of some men, that is, that the cardinals did agree vpon him againe, after the death of the said Celestinus the pope, seeing he could not bee her husband, whom it is manifest that he defiled by adultery, her first husband yet liuing, and shee being worthie to haue the promise of mariage kept vnto her: therefore, because that which is done against the Lord, turneth to the wrong of all men: and specially in so great a mischiefe, by reason of the consequence by which shee is iudged of the people both a woman adultres or defamed: I, like a bridled Asse by the power of the Lord, and not by the voice of a perfect man, being not able to beare so great a burthen, take in hand to rebuke the madnesse of the said false prophet Balaam, which at the instance of king Balac, 1. of the prince of diuels, whom he seeueth, and ready to curse the people blessed of the Lord, I beseech you most excellent prince, and lord Philip by the grace of God king of France: that like as the angell of God in time past met in the way with a sword drawne, the prophet Balaam going to curse Gods people: so you (which are vnwilling to execute iustice; and therefore like the angell of the Lord, and minister of power and office) would meet with a naked sword this said wicked man, which is far worse then Balaam, that he performe not that euill which he intendeth to the people.

An inuection against the placing of Boniface 8. in the papall seate.

The pope likened to Balaam which was wont to curse Gods people for reward of money.

Articles propounded against pope Boniface.

Firſt, I propound that the foresaid man, that nameth himselfe Boniface, is no pope, but wrongfully keepeth the seate which he hath indeed to the great dammage of all the soules of Gods holy church. I say also, that his entring was many waies faultie, and he entred not in at the dore, but otherwaies, and therefore is to be iudged a theefe and a robber.

2 I propound also, that the said Boniface is a manifest heretike and vtterly cut off from the body of the holy church, because of many kinds of heresies, which are to bee declared in conuenient time and place.

3 I propound also, that the said Boniface is an horible simonicall, and such a one as hath not been sithence the beginning of the world: and the mischiefe of this sin in him is so notorious to all the world (which thing is manifest to all that will plainely vnderstand) insomuch that he being openly slandered, said openly that he could not commit simony.

4 I

The nature of this pope and all popes by his image painted out.

4 I propound also, that the said Boniface being wrapt in infinite manifest hainous sinnes, is so hardened in them, that he is vtterly not possible to be corrected: and lying in danger of mischiefe so deepe, that hee may not bee suffered any longer without the ouerthrow of the state of the church. His mouth is full of cursing, his feet and steps are swift to shed blood. He vtterly teareth in pieces the churches, which he ought to cherish, wasting wickedly the goods of the poore, and making much of wicked men that giue him rewards: persecuting the righteous, and among the people not gathering but scattering, bringing in new sects of destruction that haue not been heard of. Blaspheming the way of truth, and by robberie thinking himselfe equall to the Lord Iesus Christ which is blessed for euer. And he being most couetous thirsteth for gold, coueteth gold, and by some deuice getteth gold of euery people: and vtterly not regarding the worshipping of God, with fained words, sometimes by flattering, sometimes by threatning, sometimes by false teaching, and all to get money withall, he maketh merchandise of vs all; enuying all things but his owne, louing no man, nourishing warre, persecuting and hating the peace of his subiects. Lyre is rooted in all vnspeakeable sinnes, contraying and striuing against all the waies and doctrines of the Lord. He is truely the abomination of the people which Daniel the Lords prophet described.

The pope thinks himselfe equall with Christ.

Abominatio desolationis Papæ.

Therefore I answere, that lawes, weapons, and all the elements ought to rise against him, which thus ouerthroweth the state of the church; for whose sins God plagueth the whole world. And finally, nothing remaineth to him being so insatiable to satisfie him withall, but onely the insatiable mouth of hell, and the fire that cannot bee quenched, continuing for euer. Therefore, seeing that in a generall councell it is determined, and I see this wicked man to be damned, which offendeth both God and all men: I aske and require, as instantly as I can, and beseech you my lord and king aforesaid, that ye would declare to the prelats, doctors, people, and princes your brethren in Christ, and chiefly to the cardinals and all prelats, and call a Councell. In the which (since this foresaid wicked man is condemned) by the worshipfull Cardinals; the church may be prouided of a shepheard: and so that Councell I offer my selfe readie, lawfully to pursue the foresaid things. And whereas the said man being in the highest dignitie, in the meane time cannot be suspended of his superior, therefore hee ought to bee taken, suspended indeed for the things aforesaid, seeing his state is called into iudgement, by the meanes aforesaid.

I beseech and require the said cardinals by you, and I presently require them and the church of God, that this wicked man being put in prison, the Church of Rome may bee prouided of a vicar, which may minister those things that shall appertaine, vntill the church of God be prouided of a bishop, vtterly to take away all occasion of a schisme. And lest the said wicked man should let and hinder the prosecuting thereof, I require these things of you my lord king aforesaid, affirming you to bee bound to doe this for many causes. Firſt, for the faiths sake. Secondly, for your kingly dignitie, to whose office it belongeth to rent out such wicked men. Thirdly, for your oth sake, which ye made for the defence of the Churches of your Realme, which the foresaid rauener vtterly teareth in pieces. Fourthly, because ye be the patron of the Churches, and therefore yee are not bound onely to the defence of them, but to the calling for againe of their goods, which the foresaid man hath wasted. Frithly, ye following the footesteps of your ancestors, ought to deliuer your mother the Romish church, from so wicked a band, wherein by oppression shee is tied and bound. I require that a publike instrument may be made of these requests by the notaries here present, vnder the witnesse of the worshipfull men that be here present. These things were done and spoken as is aforesaid at Paris in the Kings house of Lupara.

After this protestation of master Nagareta, immediately insued the appeale of the king, pronounced and published against the said Boniface, in forme as followeth.

The appeale made by the king and the louers
of the realme against Boniface.

The appellation of the French K. and Nobles against pope Boniface 8.

IN the name of God, Amen. In the yeare of our Lord 1303. Indictione prima, 13. day of June, and the ninth yeare of the popedome of Boniface pope the 8. By the tenor of this publike instrument bee it vnto all men knowne, that the most noble prince and lord Philip by the grace of God, king of France, the famous and reuerend fathers in Christ, archbishop and bishops, religious men, abbats and priors here vndernamed, in the presence of vs common Notaries here vnder written, especially called and required for this purpose, as it is contained in the subscriptions here vnder, the famous and noble men, the lord Lewes, sonne of the French K. Guido of S. Paul, and Iohn Diocem carles, and William of Plesiano lord of Vitenob knight: Moued as they said with a feruent faith, with affection of sincere loue and zeale of charitie to bee shewed to the holy Romish church, and hauing pitie from their heart, on their mother the vniuersall church, which, as they said, is oppressed dangerously vnder the rule of the said lord Boniface, and suffereth outragious defacing and losse: and pitying the right faith (as they say) in which stands the saluation of soules, and which (alasse for pitie) in their times miserablie pineth away, and perisheth for the lacke of wholesome gouernment of the church through all christendome: and earnestly taking paines, as they said, for the repairing and enhansing of the catholike faith: especially seeing it was necessarie for the same church, for the foundation of the faith, and health of the soules, that none should rule the fold of the Lords flocke, but the true and lawfull sheepheard: and also because the same church was the spouse of Christ that hath no spot nor wrinkle, all errour, offence, wickednesse and wrong should be put away, and saluation, peace and quietnes through Gods mercie might bee procured to the whole world, which, they say, lyeth in warres and darkenesse by the wicked deeds, cursed workes, and hurtfull examples of the said Boniface: They said and laid against the said Boniface, heresie, and other diuers horrible and cursed faults, wherein they affirmed him to be tangled, and commonly and notoriously reported, the king himselfe being present, with archbishops, bishops, and other prelats and churchmen (which were assembled for to intreate of their own matters, and matters of their churches) beside barons, earles, and other noble men, whose names are vnder written.

The said William propounded and obiected against him, swearing by the holy Gospell of God which hee corporallie touched, that he could proue all and euery the premises to be true. And the said William of Plesiano sware further this oth, that hee beleeued hee could proue the premises, and that hee would pursue to the full end against the said Boniface in the generall Councell, where, when, and afore whomsoeuer of right it ought to be done; requiring earnestly the said lord K. as a champion of the faith, and defender of the church; that for declaring of this truth to the praise of Gods name, to the increase and promoting of the catholike faith, to the honour and wealth of the vniuersall church and of all christian people, and the congregation of the said generall Councell; that he would helpe and bestow his profitable labour, with souldiers and other like, for the loue of men, and zeale to iustice (because his kingly house was euer a ruler of the truth) and that he would earnestly require the archbishops, bishops, and other prelats, and that hee would be effectually instant with them. The earles and knights themselues besought earnestly many of the same prelats (as they were pillers of the church and the faith) that they would helpe and effectually bestow their labour to the calling and assembling of the said councell, by all waies and meanes lawfull, according to the ordinances of the holy fathers and decrees of the canons. But when the prelats heard and fully vnderstood such obiections, oppositions, and requests, as is aforesaid; and considered that such a matter not onely was most hard, but needed wise counsell, they departed out of the same place. But on the Friday next following, the 14 day of the same moneth of Iune, the foresaid lord king being present, and also the lords, archbishops, bishops, abbats, priors, and many witnesses here vnder written the same time being present, and in the presence of vs common notaries here subscribed, and being specially called and required for this purpose: the foresaid William of Plesiano knight said, propounded, affirmed, obiected, and read, as was contained more fully in a certaine paper which hee held in his hand, whose tenor was after this sort.

Pope Boniface had rather be a dog then a Frenchman.

I William of Plesiano knight, say, propound, and affirme, that Boniface which now ruleth the Apostolicall see is a manifest heretike in heresies, and by heresies, outragious deeds, and wicked doctrines hereafter to be declared, which things to bee true, I beleeue I am able to proue: or else, such things as these shall be sufficient to proue him a full heretike, in a conuenient place and time, and afore whom of right this can or ought to be done. This thing I sweare on the holy Gospell of God presently touched of me.

Firſt, that hee beleeueth not the immortalitie of men and of christian soules, but thinking much like as the Sadducees did beleeue, that there is no euerlasting life, and that men can not get at the length ioy, but all the lot and part of comfort and gladnesse to be in this world: and by this meanes hee affirmeth, that it is no sinne for the body to liue daintily in all daintes. And out of the abundance of this leuen he was not ashamed to say and openly to confesse, that hee had rather bee an asse or a dogge, or any other brute beast, then a French man; which thing hee would not haue said, if hee beleeued a Frenchman had a soule that could enioy euerlasting life. This thing hee taught many men, which knowledged this at the point of death, and the common report goeth on him thus in these things.

2 Also, he beleeueth not faithfully, that by the words ordained of Christ, and spoken ouer the host, after the fashion of the church by a faithfull priest that is lawfully ordered, the body of Christ to be there: & therefore it commeth to passe, that hee giueth no reuerence to it (no not a little) when it is lifted vp of the priest, yea he riseth not to it, but turneth his backe to it, and makes himselfe and his seat to be honored where he sitteth, rather then the altar where the hoste is consecrate: and hee is commonly reported to doe this.

3 Also, hee is reported to say that whoredome is no sin, no more then rubbing of the hands together, and thus commonly runs the voice and brute.

4 Also, hee said often, that to driue downe the king and Frenchmen if it could not be otherwaies done) he would ouerthrow himselfe, the whole world, and the whole Church. And when he had said so, some that stood by said, God forbid, he answered God grant. And when good men that heard the words replied against him, that hee should not say so, because the Church of God and all Christian men should suffer great slander so: he answered, I care not what slanders soeuer come, so that the Frenchmen and their pride bee destroyed: for it is necessarie that slanders and offences come.

5 Item, he called againe and allowed a booke made by M. Arnold of Newton, containing and smelling of heresie, condemned by the bishop of Paris and reproued by the masters of diuinitie, and burned openly by Boniface himselfe; and in the full consistorie of Cardinals being likewise reproued, condemned and burned, yet he allowed it being written againe, and containing the same fault.

6 Item, that hee might make the most damnable remembrance of him perpetuall, hee caused his images of siluer to be set in the Church, by this meanes bringing men to Idolatrie.

7 Item, he hath a priuate diuell, whose counsell he vseth in all things, and through all things.

8 Item, he said once that if all men were on one side, and he on another, they could not preuaile him neither in law nor in deed, which thing could not be done except hee vsed a diuelish Art: and of this he is openly thus reported.

9 Item, hee is a witch, asking counsell at such sayers both men and women, and thus he is commonly iudged.

10 Item, he said openly, that the Romish pope could not commit simony, which is heretical to say. This is a sinne reproued as well in the old Testament, as in the new, and generally in the holy Councels. Also he is wont to make merchandise of prelats liuings, dignities, superiorities, and benefices, to the which holy orders bee necessarilie ioyned: and of absolutions and dispensations, like as diuers and merchants vse to buy and sell common things in the market, and of this the common brute reports him.

11 Item, he letteth with all his might among Christian men the speciall embassade of Christ, made to his owne serues, saying: Peace I leaue to you, and so doth discord and warre: Wherefore once it was said afore him, that certaine parties would friendly agree after a good sort, but hee let it to the peace: and when the other part did humbly beseech him, that he would giue licence to agree (he said) he would not: yea if the sonne of God or Peter the Apostle would come downe into the earth and command him; he would say, I will not beleeue thee.

12 Item, because the French nation (being manifestly a most Christian nation) followeth not his errours in the faith: he reckoneth and openly calleth all and euery of them Paterniani.

13 Item, he is infect with sodomitical sinne, keeping with him boyes for Concubines, and of this fault hee is most commonly and openly reported.

14 Item, he hath caused many murthers of clerkes to bee done in his presence, and commending it reioycing at their death: and if they were not deadly wounded at the first by his seruants, as oft as he saw them smiting, he said, smite, smite: by which example many were slaine.

15 Item, when he had condemned a certaine Noble man, he forbad the Sacrament to be giuen him at the point of death, desiring it and being penitent: saying, that the Sacrament of penitence was not necessarie to saluation.

16 Item, he compelled certaine priests to shew vnto him the confessions of men, and bee published them openly afterward contrarie to the will of them that were confessed, to their shame and confusion, and compelled them to redeeme their sinnes. Insomuch that once hee deposed a certaine Bishop of Spaine, for the faults that hee confessed to a certaine Cardinall, confessing vnto him a certaine priuie horrible fault vnder Benedicite, and compelled the Cardinall against his will to declare his confession: and yet afterward hee restored the same Bishop againe to his place for a little money. Wherefore he is thought to play the heretike in the Sacrament of penance.

17 Item, he faseth not on the fasting daies, nor Lent, but eateth flesh indifferently, and without cause suffereth his household and friends to eate, saying, it is no sinne. Doing in this thing against the generall state of the holy church.

18 Item, hee oppressed the order of the Cardinals, and hath oppressed the order of blacke and white monks, of gray Friers and preachers: and said oft, that the world was destroyed by them, and that they were false hypocrites, and that neuer god could chance into any that would bee professed to them, or would be familiar with them, or would keepe them in their house, and he neuer said good word of any prelate, religious man, or clerke: but euer rebuketh and slandereth them, taking away their good name, and to compell them to redeeme their faults, he is glad of their accusations: and this is the common voice and report of him.

19 Item, of old time hee going about to destroy the faith, conceiued a hate against the French king, euen to the abhorring of the faith: because of the light of faith which is there, and because of the great witnesse and example of Christianitie, as hath been there. And before hee had this state he is proued to haue said, that if hee were Pope, hee would ouerthrow and destroie the Nation, which he called the pride of the French.

20 Also, he is reported, that when the Embassadors of the king of England, in the name of the said king did require and intreat for the tenth of the Realme of England to bee giuen him: hee answered, that hee would not giue them the tenth, but on this condition, that he would make war with them against the French King. And besides this, he is reported to haue giuen great summes of money to certaine persons, to hinder that peace should not bee betwixt the saide kings. He himselfe also with all his might hath letted it, by messengers, letters, and otherwaies that he could, yea by giuing bribes.

21 Item, he is reported also to haue commanded Fridericke which keepeth the Ile of Cicill, that if he would betray Charles the king and breake the peace which he made, and sweare that he would keepe with him, and would stir against the king, and kill the Frenchmen: that then hee would giue him aide, helpe and counsell, and so in doing he would giue and grant him the said kingdomes.

22 He constrained to the king of Almaine to be Emperor, and said openlie that he did it to destroy the nation, which he calleth the pride of the Frenchmen: which say, that they are subiect to none in temporall things. Wherein saith he, they lied on their heads, declaring moreouer, that whosoeuer (yea if it were an angell from heauen) would say, that all kings of the world were not subiect to the same king of Almaine, he were accursed. Pope Boniface enmitie to the Frenchmen.

23 Further, he brake the agreements of peace betwixt the king of Almaine and the French king: in which, either of them should haue their owne saued. And what enrochings soeuer had been on either side, should be brought to a due state, and vnder an oath ouerlie giuen and taken: hee is reported to haue commanded the same king of Almaine, that he should not keepe these conditions of peace, but be an enemie, and goe about to sow debate among christian men. Pope Boniface an enemie to peace.

24 Item, he is openlie reported, that the holie land was betrayed through his fault, and came to the enemies of God and of faith: and that he suffered this for the nonce, and denied to giue aide to the christians which defended it: spending the treasures and money of the Church (which should haue been bestowed on that vse as the patrimonie of Christ) in persecuting of faithfull Christians and friends of the Church, and therewith would enrich his friends.

25 Item, he is openlie reported to vse simonie, not onely in bestowing of benefices, but in giuing of orders, and making dispensations. He hath set to sale all benefices of the church, and would bestow the church commonly on him that would offer most: and he made his seruants prelats of the church, not for wealth of the faith, nor to driue downe infidels, but to oppresse the faithfull, and to enrich his kindred by the Church goods and of the patrimonie of him that was crucified: and presumed to make them Marquesses, Earles, and Barons, and was not afraid to build them strong holds, rooting out and oppressing many noble men and other.

26 Item, it is commonlie reported, that he hath diuorced many marriages lawfullie made, to the contempt, hurt, and slander of many: and he did promote his nephew to a cardinallship, being married, vnlearned, and altogether vnworthie to liue; and openlie married one that was diuorced, and compelled him to make a bois of chastitie, and after that he is reported to haue had two bastards by her, and so goeth the common brute of him.

27 Item, he is commonlie reported, that he handled vngentile his Predecessour Celestinus of holie memorie, leading a holie life (peraduenture knowing in conscience that he could not forsake his Popedome, and therefore Boniface himselfe had no lawfull entrance to the Seat) and prisoned him, and there quicklie and priuie caused him to die. And of this the common brute and report is through all the world, that he caused many and great learned men hating a regular life (which disprised of this, whether hee might renounce the Popedome or not) to be set in prison, and there to die. Pope Boniface murderer of his predecessor.

28 Item, he is reported to haue railed at religious persons leading a regular life, without a reasonable cause to the world, to the slander of many.

29 Item, he is reported to haue said that he would within short time make all the Frenchmen either Martyrs, or forsakers of their faith.

30 Item,

30 Item, he is commonlie reported, that he seeketh not the health of the soules, but the destruction of them.

These things being propounded and read, the same William protested, said, declared, appealed, and added these words, reading them in writing:

The protestation of William Plesiano.

I William of Plesiano knight, protest that I do not propound nor speake the foresaid things for any speciall hate of Boniface himselfe (for I hate not him, but his foresaid euill deeds) nor I seeke not his infamie nor slander, nor any mans else: but I speake it for the zeale of the faith, and for the reuerence that I haue to the holie church of God, and the holie Romish see, as well for those things that I haue seene and heard of credible men of his doings, and by likelie presumptions gathered of the foresaid things, and many diuers other things to be declared in his due place and time. And I sweare by the holie Gospell of God (which I touch with my hand) that I beleeue him to be a ranke heretike, and that I also beleeue that the foresaid things and such other, may preuaile against him according to the state of the holie fathers. I sweare also that I will pursue against him by the lawes, the foresaid things in the generall councell that shall bee assembled, in a place that shall be safe and sure for me, to the honour of God, and increase of the christian faith, hauing the right honour & state of the holie Apostolicall see, in all things. Wherefore, earnestlie and with reuerence, I require you my lord the king (to whom belongeth the defence of the holie mother the Church, and the catholike faith, for of that pe shall make account in the last iudgement) and you my lords the Prelates which be the pillers of the faith, and which ought to be iudges of the foresaid things, together with other reuerend fathers, the catholike prelates of the holie church, in the generall councell to be assembled: that ye would prepare and take diligent paine that a generall councell may be gathered in a fit and safe place, and conuenient time, afore which the foresaid things may be propounded, brought forth, and proued against the said Boniface, as is premised. And I earnestlie also require you my lord king, that ye would require the same prelats present and absent, in what countrey soeuer they be, to whom it belongeth: and that ye would effectuallie induce them manfullie to labour, and to require other faithfullie, that the foresaid councell for the foresaid matters might be gathered in such sort as is aforesaid. And because so long as this is deferred to proue, I suspect Boniface himselfe, lest hee seeing angrie and moued for the foresaid things against me and my partakers, procurers and helpers, my friends and familiars, should goe about by some meanes, subtlie to stop and stop my good purpose and theirs by going forward: therefore, by these writings afore you my lord the King, and diuers Prelates, and afore your common notaries here present, I protest and appeale to the said holie generall councell Apostolicall and catholike that shall be, and to the holie apostolicall see, and to him and them to whom of right I may or ought: and I earnestlie require, once, twice, and thrise, and of testimoniall letters may be giuen me from you: supposing my selfe, my followers, fauourers, familiars, friends, my procurers, and all them that will hereafter follow me, my goods and theirs to be vnder the protection and keeping of saint Peter and Paul, and the said holie councell to be assembled by the holie Romish see, and the Catholike Apostolicall pope that shall bee: sticking neuertheless and willing to stand to the appellation and appellations, protests and processes made hereupon, by the noble man master William of Nagareta knight, in as much as they shall be found and made lawfull, and yet not forsaking this present appellation.

When these things were thus read and done, the foresaid king answered and required the foresaid prelats, prouoking and appealing and making request, prouocation and appellation, as is contained in the paper vnder written, both there and then with other prelats: which things all are more fullie contained in these writings following, and were read to them that heard it, whose tenour is such.

The kings answere. The appeale of Philip the French King from the Pope.

Wee Philip by the grace of God, hearing and vnderstanding the obiections propounded by our beloued faithfull knight, W. of Nagareta, against Boniface now hauing the regiment of the Romish church: although we would gladlie couer with our owne cloke, the filthie parts of such a father: yet for the loue of the catholike faith and great deuotion that wee beare to the holie Romish and vniuersall church our mother, and all faithfull men and spouse of Christ, following the steps of our ancestors, which doubted not to shed their owne bloud for the increase and defence of the churches libertie and the faith: and couueting to prouide for the puritie of the faith and state of the church, as also to auoid the hurt of the generall slander, beeing not able to passe ouer any longer the premisses with winking and dissembling, and my conscience driuing to the same, seeing this estimate and opinion of him in these matters, is not rashlie of vs conceiued, but vehementlie and plainlie increased, by many and continuall cryings of credible men, and great authoritie oft and oftentimes beaten into vs, fearing moreouer the destruction of the faith, both of vs and of all other subiects, and specially of Kings and princes of the world, which ought to reproue negligence, which acknowledge that we haue receiued power giuen vs from the Lord, to the promoting and increasement of it; wee agree to your requests in this behalfe, and to the calling and assembling a councell for the glorie of God (sauing the honour and reuerence that is due to the holie Romish church in all things) whereby the truth may appeare in the premisses, and all error auoided: that the state of the vniuersall church and all christianitie and the matters of faith, and the holie land may be prouided for, and the slanders and ieopardies hanging ouer vs may be withstanded: we be readie and offer our selues gladlie, as much as in vs is, to bestow our labour & diligent paine thereabouts. Earnestlie requiring & beseeching in the mercifull bowels of Iesu Christ, you archbishops and other prelats here present, as children of the church and pillers of faith, called of the Lord to the promoting, increase and preseruing thereof, to care for the same; that with all diligence ye would giue heed, as becommeth you, and effectuallie you would labour by all waies and fit meanes, to the calling and assembling of this councell, in which we intend to be personallie present. And left the said Boniface, which hath boldlie and wrongfullie many times threatned to proceed against vs, stopping and hindring our purposes and intent: left any of his works of darkenesse (if there bee any) should come to light, directlie or indirectlie hindring the calling and gathering of this councel: or left any state being in the same realme that will indeed proceed against vs, or our state, churches, prelates, barons, and other faithfull vassals, our subiects, our lands, or our realme, and the state of the realme; by abusing any spirituall (sword, in excommunicating, suspending, or other waies by any meanes for vs and our well willers, and them that will follow vs: we prouoke and appeale in writing to the foresaid generall councel (which wee instantlie desire to be called) and to one lawfull chiefe Bishop that shall be, or to any other to whom we should appeale: and yet not going from the appellation made by M. William of Nagareta, to whom we sticked then, and also yet stick: requiring earnestlie of you the tenour of our appellation of you prelates and notaries, expressedlie to renew such prouocation and appellation when and afore whom it shall be thought meet to you.

Pope Boniface prieth an heretike.

Then the Archbishops within written, Bishops, Abbats, and Priors, answered the premisses (as it is found in the same) touching the appellation, agreement and protestation, as is contained more fullie in a certaine paper there openlie and plainely read, whose tenour followeth with these words.

The protestation of Prelats.

We Archb. of Nicosen, Remen, Senoren, Narbonen, Turonen, and bishops of Landuren, Behacen, Carolacen, Antisiodoren, Meldinen, Nurmen, Cameracen, Aurelianen, Ambianen, Morinen, Silanen, Andegauen, Abricen, Constant, Ebroicen, Lexouicen, Sagien, Caloromont, Lemouicen, Auicen, Masticoren: And we abbats of Cluniac, premostraten of the greater monasterie of the court of S. Dionyse in France, Canped S. Victors, S. Genoueue, S. Marten, Landmoen, Figiacen, & Bellicen in Lemouiuic, and frier Hugh, visitor of the houses of the order of knights of S. Iohn in Ierusalem in France, & the father prior of S. Martin in the fields, hearing these things which were said, propounded, & obiected yesterday, and to day by you the lords, earles, & Wil. aforesaid, against the lord Boniface the 8. and pope, being moued with such sayings, purposes, assertions, and your othes, your requeste and other lawfull causes: and were compelled by need, confidering that the matter of our faith which is Christs, is handled in the premisses: Wee that be called to part of this care, to the defence and maintenance of the faith of soules of the realme, although vnworthy, yet couueting to withstand the ieopardies that hang ouer vs by reason of the premisses & other causes, thinking the calling & gathering of the said councel profitable & necessarie that the innocency of the L. Boniface himselfe may clearely be and then with other prelats: which things all are more fullie discussed, as we desire (our consciences bearing witnes) that it may be determined on him by the Councel, touching such things as are laid against him, & that may be done which they decree according to the Canons: Wee answer you our lord king, and you our Lords, Earles, and William, that (the honor and reuerence of the holie Romish church saued in all points) we agree to your due requests in this behalfe for the calling of the councell, and are readie to giue help and diligent labour to the calling and gathering of the said Councell, according to the decrees of the holie fathers, and to the lawfull orders of the Canons: not intending by any meanes, to make parties of this matter, nor to sticke to any that maketh parties. Yet left the said Boniface being mooued or prouoked by these things, as we feare by likelie coniectures and threatnings made against vs for the foresaid things, that hee will inuasion against vs for the foresaid things, that hee will proceede against our parish Churches and our subiects by some meanes, or cause to proceed against vs by some authorisome meanes, or cause to proceed against vs by some authorisome meanes, or cause to proceed against vs by some authorisome

iudge and doe all other things, that belong to the office of Prelats: that our friends that sticke to vs and would sticke to vs in all things may remaine safe, for our selues, our parish churches, our subiects, friends, and them that sticke to vs, or would sticke to vs in this behalfe: wee prouoke and appeale in writing to the foresaid councell, that is to bee gathered, and to him that shall bee the true and lawfull highest bishop, and to him or them to whom of right wee should appeale to, and earnestly require our appellations, committing vs, our parish churches, our subiects, friends, and them that sticke to vs, our state and theirs, our right, goods, to the godly defence of the foresaid councell, and of him that shall bee the true and lawfull highest bishop: and wee protest to renew this appellation, where, when, and afore whom, it shall bee thought meet.

This was done at Paris at Lupara in the chamber of the said lord our king, Indictione prima, the ninth yeare of his poyedome, the daies of thursday and friday aforesaid, these noble men being present; The lords of Auia and Bolone, the lords Martins and other earles named afore, Matheiu Dotera, Peter the lord chamberlaine, Philip the lord of Tiermos, and Henric of Bologne knight, and also M. Philip archdeacon of Longen, Nicolas archdeacon of Reim, scrittinian treasurer of Amop, Philip Beaspeare, Arnold of Bourbon and John Montagre, and many moe both clerkes and other specially required and called to bee witnesse to this.

After these things thus in the parliament decreed and agreed, the prelats of the clergie consulting with themselues what was to be taken so bonibefull a matter, and dreading the popes displeasure, for this which was done afreadie, to cleare themselues in the matter contriued among themselues a letter to the pope, partly to certifie him what there was done, and partly also to admonish him what he should doe: the tenor of which their letter contained these words following.

The forme of a letter which the prelats of France as well secular as religious sent to Boniface, that hee should cease his enterprise, wherein he proceeded against the king.

To the most holy Father and their dearest beloued Lord, the Lord Boniface the chiefe bishop of the holy Romish church and the vniuersall church: his humble and deuout archbishops, abbats, priors, conuentuals, deanes, prouosts, chapters, conuents and colledges, of the cathedrall and collegiate churches, regular and secular of all the realme of France, being gathered together, doe offer most deuout kissings of your blessed feet.

The letter of the French prelats to pope Boniface.

WE are compelled, not without sorrow of heart and bitter teares to signifie vnto your holinesse, that themost famous Prince our most deare lord Philip, by the grace of God, the nobleking of France: when hee heard and saw the Apostolicall letters sealed, which were sent to him of late, from your behalfe by the worshipfull man the cardinall of Narbo your notarie and messenger, and were presented by the same cardinall to him, and certaine other of his barons. Vpon the sight and perusing of which so bloodie letters being read and declared to them sitting by him: both our lord the king and the barons themselues were highly moued with great maruelling and great trouble. Insomuch that the said our lord the king by the aduice of his barons, commanded to be called afore him the other barons then absent, and vs also: that is to wit, All archbishops, bishops, abbats, priors, communals, deanes, prouosts, chapters, conuents and colledges, as well of cathedrall or collegiate churches, regular and secular, and also all the Vniuersities and communities of the townes of his realme: that wee prelates, barons, deanes, prouosts, and two of the learnedst of euery collegiate and cathedrall church, should appeare personallie, and should procure the rest likewise to appeare, by their stewards, officers, and sufficient proctors, with full and sufficient commission at the appointed place and terme. Further, when wee and the other Ecclesiasticall persons aforesaid, and also the barons, stewards, officers, and proctors, and other of the communalitie of the townes that were thus called: and when according to the forme of the foresaid calling by the kings commandement, wee stoode afore the king this Wednesday, the tenth of this present of Aprill, in saint Martins church in Tiris: Our lord the king caused to bee propounded openly and plainely to all men, that it was signified to him, from you among other things by the foresaid cardinal and letters: that for his kingdome (which hee and his ancestors hitherto doe acknowledge they hold of God onely) now ought in temporalties to be subiect to you and hold of you, and that yee were not content with these so marueilous and strange words, and not heard of from the beginning of the world of any dwellers within the same realme, but that ye went about to put them in practise. And that yee called to appeare afore you the prelates of the said realme, and doctors of diuinitie, and such professors of both lawes, as were borne within the said realme, for the correcting and amending of such excesses, faults, arrogancies, wrongs, and harmes, as ye pretend to bee done to the ecclesiasticall prelates and persons ecclesiasticall both regular and secular, abiding within the realme and elsewhere, by our lord the king himselfe and his officers or bailiffes, by his peeres, earles, barons, and other nobles, with the communalitie and people of the said realme: To the intent, by this meanes, the foresaid realme might bee made strong, with precious iewels and durable treasures, which are to bee preferred before the bucklers or any armour of strong men, that is to say, by the wisedome of prelats, and wise men, and others: through whose ripe faithfull counsell, and circumspect foresight, the realme might be ruled and gouerned, the faith might be stablished, the ecclesiasticall sacraments might bee minisired, iustice might bee executed: which by them being robbed of their goods and riches, and vtterly spoiled, is in a doubtfull case, and in ieopardie of miserable decay, and for euer to be destroyed.

Among these and diuers other grieses, which were done by you and the Romish church, to him, to his realme, and the French church, both in reserving and wilfull ordering of archbishopriks, bishopriks, and bestowing of great benefices of the realme vpon strange and vnknowne persons, yea and oft vpon suspect persons, neuer being at the churches or benefices aforesaid. By reason whereof the decaie of Gods worship ensued, the godly wils of the founders and giuers are defrauded of their godly purpose: the accustomed almes-giuing is withdrawne from the poore of the said realme, the powerishing of the realme followeth, and churches runne in danger to bee defaced, while they remaine destitute of seruice: the prophets being taken away, and the fruits of them that serue them, bee appointed to the commoditie of strangers. And such prelates haue not to giue, yea to reward men for their deserts: noble men (whose ancestors founded the churches) and other learned men, cannot haue seruants: and that for these causes, deuotion began to bee cold, there was none at these daies that would stretch out a liberall hand towards the churches, and furthermore by the premises an euill example was giuen. Also hee complained of new taxes, of pensions, new by laid on the churches, of innumerable bondages, exactions, and diuers extortions with other preiudiciall and hurtfull nouelties, by which the generall state of the church is changed, in giuing suffragans, as helpers to the higher prelats, whereby neither the bishops themselues nor the suffragans can doe their duties, but for them they might runne with gifts to the Apostolicall see. He complained also of diuers causes and some articles long since, but true in the time that they were presented, that were done and bee done continually: and also not purposing to suffer so great a disheriting of him and his successours from the realme, and so manifest a griefe, they could not suffer any longer the euident losse of the honour of him and the realme, and said: that hee was certaine, that it was knowne to the whole world, and that he did maintaine in this matter a iust cause, as he had learned by the agreeable sentence of doctors in Diuinitie, and matters of both lawes, that were borne within his realme and others, which among the doctors and cunning men of the world were counted of the learned sort and more famous. Therefore he required vs, all and euery one, both prelats and barons, and other earnestly as our lord: he prayed and gently begged as a friend, to consult and take diligent paine, that hee might ordaine wholesome things, both for the keeping of their old liberties, the honour and state of the realme and of the inhabitants thereof, for the easing of the griefs aforesaid, for redressing of the realme and the French church, by our counsell and his barons, to the praise of Gods name, the encrease of the catholike faith, the honour of the vniuersall church, and promoting of Gods religion: specially seeing such griefes were done by his officers and others of the realme, to the churches and churchmen, for the which hee purposed a remedie of wholesome correction, afore the comming of the foresaid cardinall, and would now haue put it in execution effectuallie, but that he might be thought to haue done that for feare, or at your commandement, which thing yee cannot ascribe to your selfe. Furthermore, he would spend not onely his goods but also his realme, yea his children if the case required: and therefore wee should in regard to bee readie with counsell and helpe in season as wee are bound by the dutie of fidelitie in these things: wherein it is manifest, that as all and euery mans case is handled, generallie and particularly their case is promoted, and euery mans owne interest is touched. And then he demanded by and by to bee answered plainely and finally in these things, of all and euery one.

Then the barons sitting aside with the officers and proctors aforesaid, at the length after they had taken counsell, comming to our foresaid lord the king, and praising greatly, and heartilie thanking him, for his laudable purpose and good will, answered with one voice: that for those things they were ready, not onely to spend their goods, but offered the same goods, riches, and also their persons to death, and not to flee any kind kind of torment. And said further with one voice, that if our foresaid lord the king would (as God forbid) suffer, or else willingly passe ouer those, they themselues would in no case suffer it.

Then when answere was asked of vs afterward, although we desired longer respite of deliberation of the king himselfe our lord, and of the greatest of the aforesaid barons, and that for this intent; that in the meane while the popes letters might haue come to our lord the king, wee answered that we would not offend against the libertie of the realme, or by some means to innouate things contrary to the kings honour in this behalfe.

Wee went about also to informe him with many godlie words, with earnest perswasions, and with many kinds of help, and by sundry waies to bring him to keep the speciall bond of vnity, which is known to haue continued to these present daies, betwixt the holy Romish church, and his predecessours. But when wee were denied any longer delay, and it was plainly and openly told to all men, that if any man were of a contrary mind, from thenceforth he should be manifestly counted for an enemie of the king and the realme: We considering warily, and seeing plainly, that except our lord the king, and the barons aforesaid were content with our answere, beside other dangers and great offences (whereof there could neither be number nor end) and that the deuotion both of the Romish and French church, and also the whole obedience of the laitie, and all the people from thenceforth should be taken away without recouery, not without great feare and doubt, we thought good to answere thus:

That we would helpe our lord the king with due counsell and conuenient helpe for the preseruing of his person, and of his earthly honour, and the libertie and lawes of the said realme, like as wee were (certaine of vs) by the duty of allegiance bound to him, which hold of him dukedomes, earledomes, baronies, fees, and other noble parts of the said realme, by the forme of the oth, as all our other doe: yet wee made humble sute to the same our lord the king, that seeing wee were bound to obey the popes holinesse and your holy seete, he would suffer vs to goe according to the tenor of your foresaid calling.

Then on the kings and barons behalfe followeth answere; that in no case they would suffer vs to goe out of the realm, and that by no meanes they would leaue to be handled so dangerously, yea rather to be altogether wasted.

Then we considering so great an anger, and trouble so ieopardous, and so great that none could be greater, both of the king, the barons, and other lay people of the realme: and now knowing plainly, that the old enemy of peace, which goeth about from the beginning of his fall with sowing of darnell, to breake the vnity of the church, by troubling of peace; would breake charity, and infect the sweetnesse of good works, with the poison of bitter enuie, and would ouerthrow mankind vterly, and would trouble with wickednesse the band of louely vnitie, and singular friendship, which hitherto haue had a happie increase betwixt the Romish church & our Lord the king, and his predecessors, and the realme, to the praise of the highest God, the increase of our Christian faith, and the seeing foorth the honour of the church, of the king and the realme. But now (alas) a doore was open to the lamentable breaking and pitifull separating of great offences to rise on euery side, dangers are attempted against churches and churchmen, to spoile their goods and riches, with ieopardie of life, seeing that the laitie now doe abhorre and vtterly flee the obedience of clerks, vtterly banishing them from their counsels and doings, and haue taken courage to condemne the Ecclesiasticall censure and processe. All which ieopardies, with other sundry & diuers dangers (which neither tongue is able to tell, nor writing can declare) wee seeing at hand, thought good in this point of greatest necessitie, to runne with weeping voice, and lamentable sighes to the circumspect wisdome of your holinesse. Beseeching your fatherly mildenesse, and humbly praying you, that some wholesome remedy may be prouided in the premisses. By which, the sound profitable agreement and mutuall loue, which hath continued so long time betwixt the church, the King, and the realme, might bee maintained in that old sweet concord; the state of the French church might continue in godly and quiet peace: that yee would vouchsafe to foresee how to withstand the dangers and offences aforesaid: that we and our states may be prouided for, by the foresaid commandement of your calling, by the studie of your Apostolicall wisdome, and fatherly loue. The Almightie preserue your holinesse to his holy church a long time.

These things thus discoursed and done, then followed the

peere of our lord 1304. In the which peere, about the natiuitie of our Ladie, came a garrison of harnessed soldiers well appointed, sent partly by the French king, partly by the cardinals of Colimpna, whom the pope before had deposed, into the gates of Anagium, where the pope did hide himselfe, because hee was borne in the towne. The captaines of which army was one Sciarra, brother to the foresaid cardinals: who another William de Longareto, high Steward to the French king. Who hauing the popes towne, and finding the gates open, gaue assault to the popes treasure: where the pope was, his nephew a marquesse, and three other cardinals were annexed. The townes men seeing all their intent and strength to be bent against the pope, caused the common bell to bee rung, and assembling themselues in a common councell, ordained Adolphus, one of the chiefest rulers of the towne for their captaine: who vnknowing to them was a great aduersary to the pope. This Adolphus hauing with him Reginaldus de Supine, a great Lord in Campania, and the two sonnes of John Cetan a noble man, whose father the Pope had then in prison: at length ioyned with the French company against the pope, and so beset his palace on euery side. And first, setting vpon the palaces of the three Cardinals, which were then chiefe about the Pope, rifled and spoiled all their goods. The Cardinals by a backe doore hardly auoided their hands: but the Popes palace, through munition and strength of the Marquesse, was somewhat better defended. At length, the Pope perceiuing himselfe not able to make his partie good, desired truce with Sciarra and his company, which was to him granted, from one till nine. During which time of truce, the Pope pitifully sendeth to the townesmen of Anagium, desiring them to saue his life: which if they would doe, hee promised so to enrich them, that they should all haue cause neuer to forget or repent their benefit receiued. To this they made answere again, crauing themselues that it lay not in their ability to doe him any good, for that the whole power of the towne was with the Captaine. Then the Pope all desolate and desolate, sendeth vnto Sciarra, beseeching him to draw out in articles, wherein hee had wronged him, and he would make him amends to the vttermost. Sciarra to this maketh a plaine answere, signifying to him again, that hee should in no wise escape with his life, except vpon these three conditions. First, to restore againe the two Cardinals of Colimpna his brethren, whom he had before deposed, with all other of their flocke and kinred: secondly, that after their restitution, hee should renounce his papacie: thirdly, his body to remaine in his power and custodie. These articles seemed to the pope so hard, that in no case hee would agree vnto them: wherefore the time of truce expired, the Captaines and Souldiers by all feeble meanes bending themselues against the Bishop, first fired the gates of the palace, wherein the traine hauing a full entrance, fell to rifle and spoile the house. The Marquesse vpon hope to haue his life, and the life of his children, yeelded him to the hands of Sciarra and the other Captaine: which when the Pope heard, he wept and made great lamentation. After this, though windowes and doores, at length with much adoe they brast into the Pope, whom they intreated with words and threats accordingly. Vpon this he was put to his choice, whether hee would presently leaue his life, or giue ouer his papacie. But that hee denied flatly to doe, to die for it, saying to them in his vulgar tongue: Ecco col, ecco cape: That is, lo here my necke, lo here my head: protesting, that he would neuer while he liued renounce his papedome. Then Sciarra went about, and was readie to slay him, but by certaine that were about him, hee was staied: whereby it happened that the Pope receiued no harme, although diuers of his ministers and seruants were slaine. The souldiers which ranged in the meane time through all the corners of the Popes house, did leaue themselues with such treasure of gold, siluer, plate, and ornaments, that the words of my author (whom I follow) doe thus expresse it: Quod omnes reges mundi non possent tantum de thesauro reddere infra vnum annum, quantum fuit de papali palatio asportatum, & de palatijs trium cardinalium, & Marchionis. That is, that all the kings of the earth together were not able to disburse so much out of their treasurie in a whole yeare, as then was taken and carried out of the Popes palace, and of the palace of the three Cardinals, and the Marquesse. Thus Boniface bereaued of all his goods, remained in their custodie three daies. During which space, they had set him on a wilde and vnbroken Colt, his face turned to the horse taile, causing the horse to runne and course, while the Pope was almost breathlesse. Moreouer, they let him so without meat, that he was therby neere famished to death. After the third day, the Arragians and people of the towne murdering themselues together (to the number of tenne thousand) ferretted him into the house where the Pope was shut, and so hauing the keepers, deliuered the Pope by strong hand. Who then being brought into the middle of the towne, gaue thanks with weeping teares to the people for his life saued: promising moreouer, that forsomuch as he was out of all his goods, hauing neither bread nor drinke to put in his mouth. Open blessing and his, to all them, that now would receiue him with any thing, either to eat or drinke. And here now to see what pouertie and affliction can worke in a man: The Pope before in all his pompe and most ruffling wealth was neuer so proud, but now was as humble and lowly, that euery poore peasant, but now was as humble and lowly, that euery poore peasant, but now was as humble and lowly, that euery poore peasant in that great distresse of famin, was not so greedy of their bicuaile, as they were greedy of his blessing. Whereupon, the woman and people of the towne came so thicke, some with bread, some with wine, some with water, some with meat, some with one thing, some with another, that the popes chamber was to little to receiue the offering, insomuch that when there lacked cups to receiue the wine, they powred it downe on the chamber floore, not regarding the losse of wine to win the popes holy blessing. Thus pope Boniface being refreshed by the towne of Aruagium, tooke his iourney from thence, accompanied with a great multitude of barnelled soudiers to Rome, where he shortly vpon the same, partly for feare which he was in, partly for famin, partly for sorowe of so inestimable treas-sure lost, died. After whom succeeded Benedictus the 11. of whom these verses are written: A re nomen habe, benedic, benefice, benedicte. Aut rem peruerte, maledic, malefac, maledicte, &c. And thus haue ye the whole storie of pope Boniface the 8.

author of the Decretals. Which storie I thought the more diligently to set forth, that all the Latin church might see what an author he was, whose lawes and decretals so deuoutly they follow.

Pope Benedictus 11.

Now after the long debating of this matter betweene the French king and pope Boniface, let vs proceed in our English storie. About this time, in the dayes of king Edward, the church of Rome began daily more and more to rise vp and swell so high in pride and worldly dominion, that no king almost in his owne country could doe any thing, but as pleased the pope; who both had, and ruled all in all countries, but chiefly here in England: as partly by his intollerable tallage and pillage before signified may appeare, partly by his iniunc-ions and commandements sent downe, also by his donations and reseruations of benefices and church liuings; also in de-posing and disposing such as him liked, in place and office to beare rule. In so much, that when the king and the church of Canturburie in their election had chosen one Robert Burnel bishop of Bathe, to be archbishop of Canturburie, pope Boniface of his owne singular presumptuous authoritie, ruling the matter after his pleasure, frustrated their election, and thrust in another named John Pecham. For among all other, this hath alwaies been one practise of the court of Rome, euer to haue the archbishoppe of their owne setting, or such one as they might be sure of on their side, to weigh against the king and other, what soeuer need should happen. To this John Pecham, pope Boniface directed downe a solemne bull from Rome, as also vnto all other quarters of the vniuersall church.
In the which bull was contained and decreed, directly against the rule of scripture and christian obedience; that no church, nor ecclesiasticall person, should henceforth yeeld to his king or temporall magistrate, either any giuing or lending, or promising of tribute or subsidie, or portion what soeuer, of the goods and possessions to him belonging; but should beclerely exempt and discharged from all such subiection of tallage or subiec-tion to be exacted of them in the behalfe of the prince and his affaires. Which decree manifestly rebelleth against the commanded ordinance of God, and the apostolicall canon of Saint Peter, and all other examples of holy Scripture. For as there is no word in the Scripture that releaseth spirituall men more then temporall from obedience and subiection of princes:
so if it chance the prince in his exacting to be too rigorous or cruell in oppression, that is no cause for the clergy to be exempted, but to beare the common burthen of obedience, and to pray to God to turne and moue the princes mind, and so (with praier and patience, not with pride and disobedience) to helpe and amend that which is amisse. Concerning the bull of Boniface, if any there be that either do not credit the same, so to containe, or would for his mind see and reade the same, the words there of here follow.

Ecclesiasticall persons exempted by the pope, for not paying tribute to the king.

The pope proceeded against the monkish world in forcing the clergy free from the kinges tributes.

The kings answere to the petitions of the barons and the commons.

The clergy refuseth to giue tribute to the king.

This bull being directed (as is said) from Rome to the archbishop of Canturburp, and likewise through the whole vni-uersall church, vnder the popes authority; it chanced not long after, the king held his parliament at Saint Edmundsbury, where was grãted to him of all cities and boroughs an eighth, and of the commõs a tiuelfth of their goods. Only the clergy by vertue of his bull, stood stout, denying to pay any thing to the king. This answer not well pleasing the king, he willeth them to deliberate better with themselues vpon the matter; and after long abatement, so to giue him answer thereof against the next parliament, which should be holden the next Hillary terme at London.

The clergy refuseth from the king's protection.

The archbishop of Canturbury for his subiournes, had his goods confiscat to the king.

In conclusion, the parliament came, the clergy perstiseth still in the denial of their subsidie, alleaging the popes bull for their warrant and discharge. Whereupon the king like wise secludeth them from vnder his protection & safegard of his lawes. And as concerning the archbishop of Canturbury, aboue mentioned, because he was found more stubborne then the rest, and was the inciter to the other, he seazed vpon all his goods, and caused an inuentory of the same to be inrolled in the exchequer. Notwithstanding, diuers of the other bishops relented some after to the king, and contributed the fifth of their goods vnto him, and were received against to fauor.

The parliament betweene king Edward and his barons and commons.

In the life of this kings father, it was declared before how the said king Henry the third, father to this king, after diuers wars and commotions had with his barons, had granted certaine liberties and freedomes written and contained in Magna Charta, and in Charta de foresta. Concerning which matter, much businesse happened in this kings daies also in the realme, betweene the king and his barons and commons. The occasion was this: A packe of woll which before paied but a marke to the king, was now by this king raised vp to forty shillings. After this, the king hauing a iourny to make into Flanders, sent to his barons and diuers other to giue their attendance, and seruice in the same, which they refused and denied to doe. Notwithstanding (the king perstiting in his purpose) with such a power as he had, prepareth toward his iourny. To whom being in his way at Winchelsey, the foresaid earles and barons, and commons, sent certaine petitions contained in writing vnder the name of the archbishops, bishops, abbats and priors, earles & barons, with the communaltie of the realm. In which writing, first lamenting and complaining of their afflicted state and misery, after humble manner they desired their lord the king to redresse and amend certaine greuan-ces among them. And first declared in the name of the whole commons, that the premonition or writs directed to them for their attendance vpon his grace into Flanders, was not sufficient: for that there was no certaine place in the said writs specified vnto them whither to come for making their prouision, and preparing money and other things according to the same. And if the place had been to them signified, yet because none of their ancestors euer serued the king ouer into Flanders before, the commons therefore thought themselues not bound to any seruice in that country. And albeit they had been so bound thereunto, yet they were not able to doe it, being so heauily oppressed with so many tallages, taxes, tolles, customes, and prices of corne; otes, tinne, woll, leather, oxen, kine, flesh, fish, &c. And besides all this, hauing no pennie of wages giuen them to releeue their charges: Diuers and besides, the lacke of the kings wages not paied them, their owne pouertie like an heauie burthen did so misse-rably lie vpon them, that some of them had no sustentation, some of them were not able to till their owne ground. They alleaged moreouer, that they were not now bounded after the Petitions of the barons and commons to the king.

Agreement confirmed and sealed betweene the king and his barons.

The moderate and good nature of king Edward noted.

side lawes and customes of the land, as their ancestors were wont. Many also found themselues grieued in that they were not vsed according to the articles contained in charta magna, nor against that the Charta de foresta, was not obserued nor kept as was wont to be. Wherefore most humbly they besoght the king, both for his owne honor, and for the wealth of his people, that of these things they might vnderstand. For the custome more of woll, the whole commons bewailed to the king their griefe, in that for euery packe of woll, was ti-ned to the king xls. and for euery sacke of tolde woll, seuen marks: The which woll of England, as it doth rise vp to the value of halfe the realme: so the tollage of the same surmount-eth to the fifth part of the valuation of the whole land. And because therefore the commons wished the honor and preseruation of their king, (as they were bound to doe) they thought it not good for his grace to faile ouer to Flanders, vnlesse he had better assurance of their fidelitie, especially at this time the Scots being so busie: who if they began to rebell, he being at home in his land, much more were they like to stir, he being abrode out of the land. And that not only for the Scots, but also for that the like perill was to be doubted of other forraigne nations and kingdomes, which as yet were in no firme peace with England, &c.

To these petitions, the king said that he could as yet make no resolute answer, for that his councell, some was gone ouer already to Flanders, some were yet at London. Notwithstanding, at his returne againe from Flanders (which he trussed should be speedily) they should then heare his answer, and know more of his mind concerning the same. In the meane time this he required of them, to keepe good rule at home while he was forth. What answere the king had minded to make them at his returne, it is vncertaine, which peraduenture him turned to a bloudy answer: but occasion serued otherwise, and turned all to agreement. For the Scots with their Captaine William Waleys aboue specified, in the time the king being absent, inuaded the realme with such violence, that prince Edward the kings sonne, who was left to rule in his fathers stead, was forced to assemble a parliament, and to call for the earle of Hereford, the earle of Northfolke, high marshall of England, earle of Essex high Constable, with other earles, barons, knights, and esquires, to intreat peace and concord betwixt his father and them. Who comming vp to London with 1500 well armed souldiers, and obtaining the gates of the citie with their owne men, fell at length to agreement with the prince, vpon composition to haue the Articles of Magna Charta, and of Charta de foresta, confirmed, and that by his meanes and mediation they might be assured of the kings displeasure to be remooued from them. The which forsaid articles of Magna charta, with the other articles aduised withall, here follow hereunder written.

Humfrey Bonne, Roger Bigot.

The articles contained in Magna charta.

First, no tollage or subsidie by the king or his heires to be imposed or leuied hereafter within the realm of England, without the common assent of the archbishops, bishops, abbats and other prelats, earles, barons, knights, burgesses, and commons of the realme.

Item no taker or seruitor of the king or of his heires henceforth within this realme, to take graine, woll, leather, or any goods of any man, without the will and consent of him which is the owner.

No taking to be hereafter, in name of tribute, for any pack of woll.

Item, to be granted by the king and his heires after him, both to the clergy and laity of this foresaid realme: to haue and to inioy their lawes, liberties and customes, in as ample manner as they were wont at any time heretofore.

Item, if any decrees or statutes shall hereafter be made and set forth contrary to these foresaid articles, the same to stand void and of no effect for euer.

Besides these articles also, in the same composition was contained, that all grudge and displeasure betweene the king and the barons for not going to Flanders ceasing: the earles and barons might bee allowed to be receiued againe into the kings fauor.

These things thus agreed vpon, and by mediation of the prince also confirmed and sealed with the kings seale his father: so was all the variance pacified, to the great comfort of the people, and no lesse strength of the realme against their enemies: and most chiefly to the commendation of the gentle and wise nature of the king; who as he was gentle in promising his reconcilement with his subiects, so no lesse constant was he in keeping that which he had promised.

After the death of John Pecham archbishop of Canturbury, aboue mentioned, who in the parliament had resisted the king in the right of certaine liberties pertaining to the crowne, touching patronages and such church matters: succeded Robert Winchelsey, with whom also the king had like variance, and accused him to the pope for breaking the peace, and take part with them that rebelled against the king about wages and liberties of the realme. Wherefore, the king being cited vp to the court of Rome, was there suspended, by the meanes of the said archbishop, directed his letters against the pope, taken out of the parliament rolles, where I finde diuers letters of the king to pope Clement, against the said Robert archbishop of Canturbury, the contents whereof here followeth, videlicet qualiter idem. And as this king was troubled in his time with both the archbishops, John Pecham, and also Robert Winchelsey, so it happened to all other kings for the most part, from the time of Lanefrancus (that is, from pope Hildebrand) that euery king in his time had some businesse or other with that sea. As William Rufus, and Henry the first were troubled with Anselmus; Henry the second with Thomas Becket; king Richard and all England with William bishop of Ely, the popes legat; king John with Stephan Langthon; king Henry the third with Edmund archbishop, called saint Edmund. Polic. lib. 7. Likewise this king Edward the first, with John Pecham and Robert Winchelsey aforesaid. And so other kings after him, with some prelat or other: wherein by haue to vnderstand, how and about what time the church of Rome, which before time was subiect to kings and princes, began first to take head about, and against kings and rulers, and so haue kept it euer since.

The church of Rome and the prelats like against kings and rulers.

Kings of England cõtinually troubled with archbishops of Canturbury.

By this John Pecham afore mentioned, was ordained, that no spirituall minister should haue any more benefices then one, which also was decreed by the constitutions of Oc-to and Otobonus, the popes legats the same time in England.

Pluralitie of liuings but one by order.

About the beginning of this kings raigne, after the decease of Walter archbishop of Yorke: William Wareuanger succeeding in that sea, minding to go on the visitation, came to Durefme to visit the church and chapter there. But the clergie and people of the citie shut the gates against him, and kept him out, whereupon rose no small disturbance. The archbishop let the his curse of excommunication and interdiction against them. The bishop of Durefme against with his clergie, displaced all his curisings, grounding themselues vpon the constitution of Innocentius the fourth, De censibus & exactionibus. And so they appealed to Rome, saying: that he ought not to be received there, before hee had first begun to visit his owne chapter and Diocese, which hee had not done. For so saye the words of the constitutions: Tele ordaine and decree, stead, was forced to assemble a parliament, and to call for the that euerie archbishoppe that will visit his prouince, first must procure to visit his owne Church, Citie, and Diocese, &c.

Variance betweene the archbishop of Yorke and the clergy of Durefme.

Among other things in this king to be noted, that is not to be passed ouer; that where complaint was made to him of his officers, as iustices, maiors, sheriffes, bailiffes, archers, and such other, who in their offices abusing themselues, extortioned and oppressed the kings liege people, otherwise then was according to right and conscience: the said king not suffering such misorder to be punished, did appoint certaine officers or inquisitors, to the number of twelue, which inquisition was called Traibaston, or Traibastoun: by meane of which inquisition, diuers false officers were accused, and such as were offenders were either remoued from their place, or forced to buy againe their office at the kings hand; to their no small losse, and great gaine to the king, and much profit to the commonwealth.

Inquisition made against ill rulers and false officers.

Traibastoun.

In the chronicle of Robert Amesbury, it is recorded of the said king, that he being at Amesbury to see his mother (who was then in that monastery professed) there was a certaine man that fained himselfe blind a long time, brought to the presence of the said Alinor, the kings mother, saying, how that he had his sight againe restored at the tombe of king Henry her late husband, insomuch that the was easily perswaded the miracle to be very true. But king Edward her sonne, knowing the man a long time to be a vile dissembler, and a wicked person, vsed to lying and craftie deceiuing, disswaded his mother not to giue credit to the vile bagabon, declaring that he knew to well of the iuffice of his father, that if he were aliue, he would twice rather plucke out both his eies, then once restore him one. Notwithstanding, the queene the mother remaining still in the former fond perswasion, would heare of beleeue nothing to the contrary, but was so in anger with her sonne, that shee bid him depart her chamber; and so he did. By the example whereof may easily be conceiued, how and after what sort these blind miracles in those daies, and since haue come vp among the blind and superstitious people. For had not the king here been wiser then the mother, no doubt but this would haue been rung a miracle, and perease king Henry bin made a saint.

A false miracle inuented out of the king.

Ex eodem chron.

But as this was a fained miracle, and false no doubt, so in the same author we reade of another manner of miracle, sounding more neere the truth, and so much the more likelie, for that it serued to the conuersion into christian faith: to which we properly, all true miracles doe appertaine. The miracle was this. In the raigne of this king, and the latter yeere of his raigne, Cassanus king of the Tartarians (of whom commeth these whom now wee call Turkes) vpon fighting against the Soudan king of the Saracens, in the plaine of Damascus, slew of them a hundred thousand of Saracens:
and against at Babylon, fighting with the said Soudan, slew him in the field, and 200000 of his Saracens, calling vpon the helpe of Christ, and thereupon became christian. This Cas-sanus Isay, had a brother a Pagan, who being in loue with the daughter of the king of Armenia a christian woman, desired of her father to marry with her. Whereunto the king her father would not agree, vnlesse he promised to be a christian. Notwithstanding, the other being stronger in power & threatning to get her by war; the king at length was forced to agree. In conclusion, it happened that the child being borne betwixt them was auergrowne, and all rough with haire, like the skin of a beare. Which child being brought to the father, he commanded it to be throwne into the fire and burned. But the mother desiring first to haue the child baptised, caused all things thereunto to be prepared. The infant being thrée times in water plunged, after the sacrament of holy baptisme receiued; in continent was altered and turned from all his haire rough-nesse, and grew as faire and smooth skinned as any other. The which thing after the father saw and beheld, was chiefly end him-selfe and all his house, &c.

Merton colledge builded in Oxford. 3. Scotus, Dunst.

In the raigne of this king, Walter Merton bishop of Rochester, builded Merton colledge in Oxford. In whose raigne also lined Henricus de Gandauo, Arnoldus de villa noua, Dan-ter, and other mo. And Scotus called Dunss. Who in his fourth booke of Sent. Dist. 18. complaineth of the abuse of excommunication and of the popes bées. Whereas before, excommunication was not vsed, but vpon great and iust causes, and therefore was feared: now, saith he, it is brought forth for euerie trifling matter, as for not paying the priests wages, &c. and therefore, saith he, it groweth in contempt. Vnder the same king, about the beginning of his raigne, was the yeere so hot and so dry, that from the moneth of Maie vntill the moneth néere of September, fell no raine in so much that many died for heat, and the vulgar people in their reckoning of yeeres, did count the time from the said dry yeere long after.

Pope Clement 5. The pope remoueth from Rome into France.

After pope Benedictus aboue mentioned, succéeded pope Clement the 5. who translated the popes court to Auinion in France, where it remained the terme of 74. yeeres after. At the coronation of this Clement, was present Philip king of France, Charles his son, duke Iohn duke of Britanny, with a great number of other men of state and nobilitie. At which coronation they being in the middle of the pompe & procession, a great wall brake down and fell vpon them: by the fall whereof, duke Iohn with twelue other were slain, king Philip hurt and wounded, the pope stricken from his horse, and lost out from his mitre a rich stone called a cascle, esteemed to the value of 6000 florence. Plat. de vit. Pont. By this Clement was ordained, that the emperor, though he might bee called king of the Romans before, yet he might not inioy the title and right of the emperor before he was by him confirmed. And that the emperors seat being vacant, the pope should raigne as emperor, till a new emperor was chosen. By him the orders of the Templers were put from all their possessions, and abolished in the councell of Vienne, as hereafter Chrill willing shall be declared. He also ordained and confirmed the feast of Corpus Christi, assigning indulgences to such as heard the seruice thereof. And as pope Bonifacius afore heaped vp the boke of Decretals, called Sextus Decretalium, so this Clement compiled the 7. boke of the decretals, called of the same Clement, the Clementines. In the time of this pope Clement the 6. that name emperor was poisoned in receiuing the sacrament, by a false dissembling monke called Bernard, that fained himselfe to be his familiar friend; which was thought to be done not without the consent of the popes legat. The emperor perceiuing himselfe poisoned, warned him to flie and escape away: for else the Germans would sure haue slaine him; who although he escaped himselfe, yet diuers of his order after that with fire and sword were slaine.

Anno 1306

As this pope Clement the 5. had well prouided now, as ye haue heard, against the empire of Rome to bring it vnder his girdle, insomuch that without the popes benediction, no emperor might take the state vpon him, &c. now he procéeded further to intermeddle with the empire of Constantinople. Where he first exercised his tyrannie and power of excommunication against Andronicus Palelogus the emperor of Constantinople, an. 1306. declaring him as a schismatike and heretike, because he neither would, nor durst suffer the Grecians to make their appeale from the Greeke church to the pope, neither would acknowledge him for his superior, &c. Whereby it may appeare, that the Greeke church did not admit the popes superioritie as yet, nor at any time before. Saue onely about the time of pope Innocent the 3. an. 1202. at what time the Frenchmen with their captaine Valdoinus, earle of Flanders, ioined together with the Venecians, were set against the Grecians, to place Alerius to the right of the empire of Constantinople, vpon condition as writeth Platina) to subdue the Greeke church vnder the church of Rome. Which Alerius being restored, and shortly after slaine; the empire came to the Frenchmen, with whom it remained the space of 58. yeres, till the comming of Michael Palelogus in the dates of pope Gregory the ninth, who restored the empire from the Frenchmen, vnto his pristine state againe. During all which time of the French emperors, the Greeke church was subiect to Rome, as by the decretals of Pope Gregory the ninth may appeare. Then followed after this, that the foresaid Michael emperor of Constantinople, being called vp to a councell at Lions by pope Gregory the tenth, about the controuersie of proceeding of the holy Ghost (as is aboue specified) and obedience to the church of Rome: there, because the said Michael the emperor did submit himselfe and the Grecians to the subiection of Rome (as testifieth Baptist Egnat.) he thereby procured to himselfe such grudge and hatred among the Greek monks and priests, that after his death they denied him the due honour and place of burial. The sonne of this Andronicus was Michael Palcologus aboue mentioned: who, as ye haue heard before, because he was constrained by the Grecians, not to admit any appellation to the bishop of Rome, was accursed by the popes censures for an heretike. Where-by appeareth, that the Grecians recouering their state again, refused all subiection at this time vnto the church of Rome, which was the yeere of our Lord 1327. &c. After this Clement the 5. followed pope Iohn the 22. with whom Ludouicke the emperor had much trouble. After whom next in course succeeded pope Benedict the 12. Which Benedict vpon a time, being desired to make certaine new cardinals, to this answereth again: that he would gladly so do, if he also could make a new world. For this world (said he) is so: these cardinals that be made already. Ex scripto Engethusensis. And thus much of the popes: now to returne a little backe to the kings story again.

Baptist. Egnat. Rom. princip.

The Greeks church denieth subiection to the church of Rome.

In the yeere of our Lord 1307. which was 34 of the raigne of this king, in the beginning of Hillary Terme, the king kept a parliament at Carliel, where great complaints were brought in by the nobles and ancients of the realme, concerning the manifold and intolerable oppressions of churches and monasteries, and eractions of money by the popes legat William Testa (otherwise termed Pala Testa) lately brought into the realme of England. The comming of which William Testa was vpon this occasion, as followeth: Pope Clement, the, as yee heard before, had translated his court from Rome into France, where he had been archbishop before, because he contemned to come and remaine at his owne sea: the Princes of Rome thought him therefore vniuo: thy to inioy Peters patrimony. And so by that meanes falling into vacancie and penurie, lined onely of such money of bishops as came to him to be confirmed, and with such other gifts and gifts. So that by this meanes, partly of bishops and other religious men and persons, partly vnder the name of courtesie and beneuolence, partly vnder the pretence of borrowing; he had within the first yere 9500. marks of siluer, all his other charges and expenses, which he largely that yere bestowed, cleerly borne. Besides this, he sent moreouer the foresaid legat William Testa into England with his bulls: in the which hee reserued the first fruits of the first yeere of all churches being vacant at any time, or by any man within the realme of England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, and also the fruits of abbies and priories within the said realmes, &c. Whereupon the king with his nobles, seeing the inconuenience and harme thereof ensuing to the whole realme: in the foresaid parliament holden at Carliel, withstood the said legat, charging and commanding him by the assent of the earles and barons, that hereafter he should absteine from all such eractions. And as concerning his lord the pope, he would direct certaine his messengers vnto him, purposely for the same matter appointed: by the which ambassadors, the king wrote vnto the foresaid pope, declaring and monishing the pope, as right and reason was: that he should not erect the first fruits of churches and abbies, by his predecessors and noble men of the land, founded for the honour and maintenance of Gods seruice, for almes and hospitalitie: which otherwise in so doing, should all bee ouerthrowne. And so by this meanes, the pope at that time changed his purpose as concerning abbies. But after that, the fruit of English churches was granted to the king for two yeres: in which space he obtained the fruits of the foresaid churches, &c.

An epistle of Cassiodorus to the church of England, concerning the abuses of the Romish church.

Ex versione Cinnico Alberensi.

TO the noble church of England, seruing in clay and bricke as the Iewes did in time past vnder the tyranny of the Egyptians: Peter the sonne of Cassadore a catholike souldier, and deuout champion of Christ, sendeth greeting, and wishing to cast off the yoke of bondage, and to receiue the reward of liberue.

To whom shall I compare thee, or to whom shall I liken thee O daughter Iesusalem? to whom shall I match thee, O daughter of Sion? Great is thy perturbation, like vnto the sea. Thou sittest alone without comfort all the day long, thou art confounded and consumed with heauinesse. Thou art giuen vp into the hands of him from whence thou canst not rise without helpe of one to lift thee vp: for the Scribes and Pharises sitting sitting vpon the chaire of Moyses, the enemies of the Romans are as thy heads and rulers: inlarging their garded phylacteries, and seeking to be inriched with the marrow of thy bones, laying heauie burthens, and not able to bee borne vpon thy shoulders & of thy ministers, and they set thee vnder tribute, (which of old time hast been free) beyond all honestie or measure. But marueil not thereat, for thy mother, which is the ladie of people, like a widow hauing married and coupled her selfe to her subiect, hath appointed him to be thy father: that is to say, the bishop of Rome, who sheweth no point of any fatherly loue towards thee. Hee magnifieth and extendeth to the vttermost his authoritie ouer thee: And by experience hee declareth himselfe to bee the husband of thy mother. Hee remembreth oft with himselfe the prophetical saying of the Prophet, and well digested the same in the inward part of his breast: Take to thee a great booke, and write therein quickly with the penne of a man; Take the spoile, rob quickly. But is this it which the Apostle saith, that hee was appointed for, where hee writeth thus? Euery bishoppe taken from among men, is appointed for men in those things that belong to the Lord: not to spoile, nor to lay on them yeerely taxes, nor to kill men, but to offer gifts and sacrifices for sinnes, and to forrow with them that bee ignorant and doe erre. And so wee reade of Peter the Fisher (whose successour hee boasteth himselfe to be) that after the resurrection of Christ, hee returned with other Apostles, to the office of fishing: who when hee could take nothing on the left side of the ship, at the bidding of Christ, turned to the right side, and drew to the land a net full of fishes. Wherefore the profitable ministery of the church is to be exercised on the right side, by the which the diuell is ouercome, and plenty of soules bee lucrified and wonne to Christ. But certainly, the labour on the left side of the ship, is faire otherwise: for in it the faith stumbleth, heauinesse beareth rule, when that thing that is desired by feeling, is not found. For who is so foolish to thinke, that hee can both at one time serue God and man, and to satisfie his owne will, or to sticke to the reuelations of flesh and bloud, and to offer worthy gifts to Christ? And doubtlesse, that shepheard that watcheth not for the edifying of the flock, prepareth another way to the roaring Lion, and seeking whom hee may deuour. And now behold, I say, O daughter, the deedes of him that is called thy father, such as haue not been heard of before: hee driueth away the good shepheards from the sheepfold, and placeth in their stead bishops, to rule, but not to profit (his nephewes, cosins, and parents, some that know no letters, and othersome dumbe and deafe, which vnderstand not the plaine voice of the sheep, not curing their wounds that bee hurt of the wolues: but like hirelings, plucking off the fleeces apace, and reaping that which other men haue sowen, whose hands neuertheless be alwaies ready in their baskets and pouches, but their backes are turned from their burthens. By which thing it is manifest, that the priesthood is cleane changed at these daies, the seruice of God decaied, almes diminished and brought to nought, the whole deuotion of kings, princes, and christians, is banished. May not this be thought wonderfull in the eies of all men, that whereas Christ commanded tribute to be paid to Cesar for him and for Peter, he now goeth about dominion of his stile, to subdue to him both realmes, and princes of realmes (against his will, whose vicar hee saith he is, and who refused the realmes and iudgements of the world) which this bishop contrariwise challengeth, claiming all that which hee in his stile writeth to bee his? Alacke, O daughter, what doth he yet more require of thee? marke, hee draweth from thee whatsoeuer pleaseth him, and yet hee thinketh not himselfe content, to haue the tenth part onely of thy goods from thee; except he haue also the first fruits of the benefices of the ministers, wherby hee may get a new patrimony, as well for himselfe as for his kindred, contrary to the godly wils of the first founders. Ouer and beside all this, he inferreth other execrable fees and stipends for his legats and messengers, whom hee sendeth into England, which not onely take away the feeding and clothing of thee & thine, but also teare in pieces like dogges your flesh and skinnes. May not this prince be compared to king Nabuchodonoser, which destroied the temple of the Lord, and robbed away the siluer and golden vessels thereof? The very same doth this man also; he robbed the ministers of God his house, and left destitute of due helpe. In like manner doth he. Truly they be better that are killed with the sword, then they which be pined with hunger: for they are dead straight, but these are wasted with the barrennes of the earth. O daughter, all they that passe by the way, let them haue pitie and compassion on thee, for there is no sorrow like thy sorrow. For now thy face is blacker then coales, through much sorrow and weeping, and thou art no more knowne in the streets: thy foresaid sinfull bath placed thee in darknesse, and hath giuen thee wormwood and gall to drinke. O Lord, heare the sorrow and sighings of thy people, behold Lord, and descend, for the heart of this foresaid man is more indurate then the heart of Pharaoh. For hee will not suffer the people to depart, except in the fortitude only of thy hand. For he scourgeth them not onely miserably vpon the earth, but also after their death, he intendeth to inrich the goods of all christians vnder the name and title to die intestate, or making no will. Therefore let the chiualry of England well remember, how the Frenchmen in times past, directing their greedy eies on the realme of England, labored with all their power how to bring the same vnder their subiection. But it is to be feared, lest the new deuices and practise of this new enemy, simply that which hitherto hath been lacking in them. For in diminishing of the treasure of the realme, and spoiling of the churches goods, the realme shall be brought into such inability, that it shall not be able to helpe it selfe against the enemy. Therefore, O daughter, and you the ministers thereof, suffer not your selues to be led any more into such miserable bondage. Better it is for the wealth of thee and thine, that the christian king and the powers of the realme, which haue indued thee with great benefits, and you also which are indued with their benefits, doe labour with all your power how to resist the deuices, conspiracies, arrogancie, presumption, and pride of the foresaid person: who not for any zeale of God, but for the inriching of his parents, and for his owne kindred (exalting himselfe like an eagle) by these and such other exactions goeth about after another kind of extortion to scrape vp and deuoure all the money and treasure of England. Now, lest the dissembled simplicitie of the realme in this behalfe doe bring vtter subuersion, and afterward be compelled to seeke remedy when it is too late: I beseech the Lord God of hosts to turne away the vaile from the heart of that man, and to giue him a contrite and an humble minde, in such sort as he may acknowledge the waies of the true God, whereby hee may bee brought out of darknesse, and be inforced to relinquish his old sinister attempts: and that the vineyard which the Lords hand hath planted, may bee replenished continually with the Preachers of the word. Let the words of the Lord prophecied by the mouth of Ieremy, stirre vp your minds to withstand and resist the subtill practises of this man, by the which words the Lord speaketh: O thou pastor which hast scattered my people, and hast cast them out of their habitations, behold I will come and visit vpon thee, and vpon the malice of thy studies: neither shall there be any of thy seede which shall sit vpon the seat of Dauid, neither which shall haue power any more in Iuda. So that thy nest shall become barren, and vtterly subuerted, like Sodoma and Gomer.

And if she being terrified by these words, doe not leaue off from this which he beginneth, and doth not make restitution of those things which he hath receiued, then let all and singuler persons sing for him being indurat, to him that feeth all things, the psalme 108. Deus laudem, &c. For truly as fauour, grace, and beneuolence, remitteth and neglecteth many things; so against the gentle benignitie of man being too much oppressed and grieued, seeking to bee deliuered and freed from the same, striueth and searcheth to haue the truth knowen, and casteth off that yoke by all meanes possible that grieueth him, &c. Hec Cassiodorus.

What effect this letter wrought in them to whom it was directed, is not in their expressed. This by the sequell may bee coniectured; that no reason or perswasion could preuaile, but that the pope retained here still his eractions, whatsoeuer was said or written to the contrary notwithstanding.

A parliament in France assembled, wherein is intended the vtter destruction of the templers.

How farre it extendeth.

Anno 1307

And thus much being written hitherto of these acts and doings here in England: now to slip a little into the matters happening the same time in France, vnder the raigne of the foresaid king Philip aboue mentioned: forsomuch as about this time, an. 1307. was commenced a parliament by the said king of France, against the pope, touching the iurisdiction both temporall pertaining to princes, and ecclesiasticall belonging to the church: I thought it not vnprofitable for the reader to heare and learne the full discourse and tractation hereof, according as we haue caused it to be exerpt faithfully out of the true copie and records of Peter Scrtrand bishop of Ebuerin, and chiefe doer and prolocutor in the said parliament vpon the popes side, against the king and state temporall.

Anno 1307

For so much as the high prelat of Rome, otherwise called Antichrist, being then in his chiefe rule, extolling himself aboue all princes and potentates of the world, as in other countries, so also in France extended his vsurped iurisdiction, abusing the princely authority of the king, claiming to himselfe full gouernment of both the states, as well secular as also ecclesiasticall: the king therefore not suffering the excessiue proceedings of pope Clement the 5. aboue specified, directeth his letters manifestory to the prelats and barons of the realme of France, to consult and assemble themselues together at Paris, about the beginning of December, the yere aboue prefixed. The tenor of which letters of the king directed to the prelats, followeth in this forme and manner.

The summons of a parliament by Philip the French king.

The letter of Philip king of France, to the bishops and prelats.

PHilip by the grace of God king of France, to our welbeloued bishop of Eduens, greeting and salutation. Reuerend Father in God, right trusty & welbeloued, we greet you wel. The more sight and knowledge you haue in diuinitie and the holy Scriptures of God, with the practise and experience of other good qualities and vertues: you know the better a great deale, how that the clergy and laitie of this our realme (as members of one body) ought to cleaue and sticke together: and how by their their helping hand, vnity and peace should be maintained of all, and the contrary eschewed and auoided, euery state contenting it selfe, and not incroching one vpon another. And because we are aduertised, how that our barons and officers (as well in time past as of late) haue diuerslie in diuers points iniuried you, as lykewise you and yours in many causes haue wrongfully damaged them: by occasion whereof, the knot of vnitie and concord, which ought to haue flourished among you, is quite loosed and vndone. To the end therefore by Gods grace some good reformation and redresse may be had herein: We moſt studious of vnitie & concord require you, and by these our letters command you, to appeare personally before vs at Paris the 15. day of December next ensuing the date hereof, and there before vs to make relation of such wrong as ye haue receiued at the laities hands. And we likewise straitly charge and command you our barons, bailiffes and officers, not to faile, but to make your personall appearances before vs, the day and place aboue written, and there to exhibit before vs a bill of such complaints, wherewith you burden our prelats and clergie, with their officials: that we with our counsell consulting thereupon, with due regard may see redreſſe therein: whereby perpetuall loue and charitie may euer hereafter raigne and remaine among them for euer. Giuen at Paris the first day of September, an. 1329.

The preface contained.

At the day in the letters aboue specified, the prelats and clergy assembled themselues before the king at his palace in Paris, that is to wit, the lord Bituricen, the lord of Auritan, the lord Turonen, the lord Rothom, and the lord Senon, all archbishops: the lord Belnacen, the lord Cathalen, the lord Laudun, the lord of Paris, the lord Noutonen, the lord Carnoten, the lord Constan, the lord Andegauen, the lord Pictauen, the lord Spelden, the lord of Cameracen, the lord of S. Feri, the lord Mince, the lord of Cabulion, & the lord of Eduen, all bishops. Where after due reuerence done vnto the kings grace, there sitting in his owne person, with his barons and councell about him; a certaine noble and wise person, lord Peter de Cugnerijs, (being one of the kings counsell, rose vp and openly in the parliament house spake in the kings behalfe on this wise, taking for his Theame, Reddite quæ sunt Cæsaris, Cæsari, & quæ sunt Dei, Deo: which is to say; Giue and render vnto Cesar which is his, and vnto God which is Gods: which hee very artificially prosecuted and applied, diuiding it into three parts. First, that obedience and reuerence is due vnto the king. Secondly, that there ought to be a difference betweene the iurisdiction of the clergy and laity, so that spirituall matters should be defined and ordered by the prelats and spirituall men, & temporall causes ruled and determined by the king, his barons and temporall men. Which all he prooued by many reasons both of fact and law, as more fully appeareth hereafter in the antecedent of the 6. of the affirmed not to appertaine to the order and iurisdiction of the spirituality, but onely to the temporality, complaining that the clergy had wrongfully proceeded in the same. But notwithstanding the premisses, and for all this his complaint, he said that the prelats should haue time to consult and deliberate thereupon with the king. The copie of which articles, with answer ensuing vpon the same, and the greeuances of the kingdome of France, wrought by the clergie, and exhibited to the king, hereafter followeth.

Said Peter the writer in the parliament. Three Lines of Diuision.

The partition betwixt Church and State.

Difference betweene the iurisdiction of the State temporall and ecclesiasticall.

Articles in the parliament wherein is vnderstood the controuersie betweene the temporall iudges and the clergy.

1. First, the cognition of causes reall, whether they touch possession or not, by common law appertaineth to the iurisdiction temporall. Wut the prelates with their officials to the end to inforce the temporall iurisdiction, take vpon them the determination of such causes reall, especially concerning possession and all other interdicts.

Cases reall.

2. Item, when a temporall man is sued by any clerke or spirituall man for the possession of his land, obtaining an addomnament of the secular power, in the cause of nouite or otherwise: the prelats officials stopping hereby the temporall iurisdiction, at the instance of the clerke called by practise before them, both the secular iudge and the party, inhibiting them to proceed any further in the cause, vnder paine of excommunication and forfaiture of a certaine sum.

Wakts to intermeddle in temporall mens matters.

3. Item, although the secular iudge haue the cognition of all lay mens matters (except in spirituall causes) yet will the bishops officials at the instance of anyparty, call such before them. And if the temporall iudge not doe except against their iurisdiction, alleaging the incompetencie of the iudge, or else if they require the cause to be remitted to them (vnder whom they are) as the right iudges, yet doe the Officials refuse this to doe, yea and by excommunication compell the parties to proceed before them.

4. Item, the bishops officials at the instance of the clerks, alleaging that they are iniuried in matters of inheritance by a lay man, call by processe the laity. And if it be alleaged that these causes stand vpon reality, being so indeed, and for that consideration the cause to be remitted to the temporall law: this notwithstanding, the Officials prohibit them vnder paine of excommunication, or some great forfeit, not to proceed but before them.

5. Item, the Bishops Officials take vpon them to heare the plea of such contracts, as either be conceiued in writings or made by word of mouth in the temporall law, sending out their monition of excommunication against them that stand bound concerning the same contracts.

6. Item, the bishops and prelats decree prouincial councels and synodall statutes, enacting and ordering therein many things to the high and great preiudice of the temporall iurisdiction, wherein they ought to haue no cognition at all, neither to intermeddle themselues therewith.

7. Item, the foresaid Officials take vpon them, before Notaries to sweare persons for performance of contracts and bargaines (made by them in places vnder the iurisdiction temporall) concerning the sale of inheritance or otherwise, incroching thereby vpon their iurisdiction, when verily they haue nothing to doe with any contracts and obligations, but with such as are made and agreed vpon within the compasse of their owne seat and iurisdiction.

8. Item, the said Officials of their meere office, call before them the laity, to answer to such matters of correction as shall be laid to their charge, the cognition whereof, as they say, both appertaine vnto them. And when the said persons doe appeare before them, and deny the crime obiected against them, the Officials detaine them and put them in prison, although in such cases they are to be released; and that imprisonment appertaineth only to the temporall power, and not to them.

Ex Officio.

Imprisonment pertaineth not to the clergie.

9. Item, in the cases aforesaid, although by making of their purgations and other the processe therein, they be found cleere of that which is laid to their charge, and are acquitted; these yet the said Officials will in no wise discharge & dismisse them, before they haue to the vttermost paied for the writings and processe in that behalfe, a good peece of money, when by law it ought to be done gratis, and in nothing.

10. Item, it must not be forgotten to talk of the sentence of excommunication, which is decreed by vertue of one only citation, so often times as a man faileth in his appearance.

11. Item, mention is to be made of those kind of obligations Demsi. Whereby a man is excommunicated by and by, if he make not payment at the day prefixed, although he be not able so to doe.

12. Item, whosoeuer by vertue of excommunication in the bishops court is excommunicat, and he so excommunicat, doe not satisfie the summe due about the excommunication, by and by the sum is doubled. And the secular power charged by the Bishops or their Officials, that they vnder paine of excommunication compell the excommunicat by attaching their goods, to pay the said sum, and not to misse a iot: which monition, if the latter sufficiently put in execution, they themselues are then excommunicat, and in no wise to be absolued, before they disburse that money, the which the principall excommunicat person should haue paied.

13. Item, if the bailiffes, headboroughs or other the kings officers & iudges of the temporaltie, receiuing the foresaid monitions, do put the same in execution, and finde that he be excommunicat, to be beggerly and nothing worth; the said officers are bound at their owne proper costs and charges, to resort to the bishops sea or consistory, where soeuer it is, and there to take a corporall oth, that the parties excommunicat, are nothing worth. This if they faile, those officers are sure to be excommunicat, and thereby inforced to disburse the due of the first excommunicat persons.

14. Item, if two men be in suite together before a temporall iudge, about an action either reall or personall, and one of them after contestation of law, and great processe there in, do appeale vnto an ecclesiastical iudge, he will presume then to detaine before him the plea of such cases and actions, both reall and personall, causing by vertue of his monitions and authoritie, the temporall iudge to cease and leaue off from medling therein: which if the secular iudge obiecth not, he is pronounced excommunicat and compelled to make satisfaction; by occasion whereof, the temporall iurisdiction is much annoied and cleane lost the prerogatiue thereof; because by law no man may appeale from a spirituall iudge, to the temporall law.

No man may appeale from a spirituall iudge to the temporall law by the popes bulls.

15. Item, if a lay man, inhabiter of any of the kings townes, procureth his debter, being also a lay man, to be arrested by vertue of secular iustice in that place; and he vpon his so arrested appeareth, and causeth also his creditor to be arrested, the officials will take vpon them to heare this matter: and if any thing be attempted concerning the appeale, they misse not to demand coſt and satisfaction both of the iustice, and also of him to whom the arrest was made. And if any of the princes retinew compelleth them to resist this iniurie, they are straightwaies pronounced excommunicat.

16. Item, of the said Bishops haue a number of Officials vnder them, whom they terme deanes of the clergie, which vsually swallie causeth all sorts of people through the kings dominions one like by word of mouth to come afore them, and that sometime without commission: when that in euerie diocesse there ought only to bee but one seate or consistorie, wherein matters should bee heard and decided. And hereby it happeneth diuers times, that manie are wrongfully and without cause cited, and to the end, that they may pay money enough, to rid themselues thereof: which is to the no small preiudice of the kings maiesties subiects and the temporall iurisdiction.

17 Item, the said rulers of the clerkes, seale vp the houses of their clergie, which are situate in the kings townes, and other of his noble mens villages, to the preiudice of the kings maiesties iurisdiction, and other of his nobilitie: for that in such kind of places the bishops haue no such kind of iurisdiction.

Maried clerkes.

18 Item, the said prelats or their officials, do presume to seale vp the moueable goods of married clerkes, and of merchants, where in such cases, the order thereof appertaineth to the temporall law.

19 Item, they compell the laytie to put in suretie to answere clerkes before them in the spirituall court, yea and chiefe lie the kings owne seruiters.

20 Item, they presume to heare and haue the cognition of actions, which are reall, or at leastwise mixt, that is, both reall and personall.

21 Item, the said prelats go about to haue cognition of such temporall mens matters as dwell in hospitals, almes houses, and the kings peculiars, and in villages of his subiects, although the plea thereof appertaineth to the king himselfe, and his subiects: forbidding vnder paine of excommunication and great forfeits, no man so hardie to commence any suite against any of them, but before themselues, in paine of a great summe of money.

22 Item, to the end the clergie and ecclesiasticall rule should be multiplied, they confer a number of Tonsures to children vnder age, some of them being sonnes of bondmen, other some bastards borne, yea and to many more married folkes insufficient, vnable and vnlearned.

23 Item, they do cause by the gouernors of their clerkes, widow women to be inforced and defiled, and will haue the discussing thereof: as in like manner, they will determine the matters of pupills, applying their goods when they died, as they do the goods of them which die intestate, to their owne vse, the cognition whereof belongeth to the king himselfe: because those kind of persons with their goods are ward to the king and vnder his tuition.

Gifts to get mariage.

24 Item, they procure through the said deanes of the clergie, of maides, temporall men of the kings dominions or otherwhere (without all order of law) to be apprehended: obiecting against them that they haue strayed from some article of christian faith, and therewith shut them vp: when that their imprisonment appertaineth to the king, while they be conuicted thereof.

25 Item, they exercise their iurisdiction in all places, hauing no regard, neither to the kings peculiar townes, nor yet to his subiects: but runne in euerie hole, when by law they ought to haue no iurisdiction, without their owne limits and precinct.

26 Item, when these prelats or their officials by vertue of their monitions do charge the kings officers and his iustices to execute any thing; if they do not performe that, which is prescribed vnto them, the forfeit, which the monition containeth is taken vpon and excommunication denounced. And this is a new inuention sprung vp of late amongst them, much to the preiudice of the king and his subiects.

27 Item, when the bishops or their officials do prosecute a matter of office before themselues against any temporall man, and haue no power thereof; they compell many of the laytie to be deposed therein what they know, hauing no respect whether they be the kings burgesses, or no, or what they be; and yet will they not allow any charges and expenses for their paines taken in that behalfe. But if they appeare not at their day, they are sure to be excommunicat.

28 Item, if malefactours be apprehended by any of the kings iustices, and indited of theft, and he (whose goods they were which were stolne) commeth before the kings sheriffes and prooueth them to be his, and therefore the matter to be ordered by them: if afterward the bishops or their officials affirme the said felon or malefactor to be a clerke, they will by vertue of their decrees or monitions compell the kings sheriffes to restore and bring in the stolne goods: and if they do it not, they are pronounced excommunicate.

29 Item, if it happen the kings sheriffe or bayliffe to take an offender for his offence, and he affirmeth himselfe to be a clerke: although he neuer take any kind of tonsures or orders, wearing no habit appertaining thereunto: yet the bishops or their officials will cause the detainers of them by their censures to deliuer vnto them the said malefactour as their clerke.

30 Item, if it happen the kings sheriffe or other his iustices to take a theefe or murderer, which beareth a clerkes marke and tonsure, and therefore deliuereth him to the clergie to be ordered: it shall not be long before he be acquitted by them, although he afterward recognise his fact; yea and notwithstanding his fellowes and partners of that office being mere temporall, receiued iustice for the same, and appeached him thereof, and so the like malefactors to be incouraged thereby to commit after the like.

31 Item, if any complaineth and saith that he is spoiled, by and by the officials will decree a monition against the spoiler: by vertue whereof, some one of the deanes of the clergie shall monish him, to restore the things comprised in the monition, and also minister to him an oth whether he hath not spoiled the plaintiffe of such things, as he saith he was spoiled of. Wart if he refuse to take an oth before him, then the deane will straightwaies seale vp the monition, and excommunicat him, and by no meanes shall be absolued before he restore and satisfie the contents in the monition, whereof the plaintiffe said first he was spoiled of.

32 Item, if any for his offence be call into prison by the secular power, although at the time of his taking he weare temporall habit, and was in no orders, but all the daies of his life liued like a temporall man: yet if he shall auouch and vow himselfe to be a clerke, to the intent to haue more expedition at the clergies hands, and to escape vnpunished; the clergie will incontinent giue to the laytie in commandment to restore vnto them the malefactor, or else suspention to be denounced throughout the whole towneship where the said malefactor shall be so imprisoned. And for auoiding the leopardie which might arise of the said fealsement; the secular iudge of necessitie is compelled to deliuer them the offender, to the great preiudice of the kings temporall iurisdiction, to whom the cognition thereof might appertaine, in case of refoat and prerogatiue.

Reformation.

33 Item, when any offender is deliuered by the temporall magistrates to the clergie, as their clerke; his friends will make sute to the bishops officials for him, and compound with them; by reason whereof they dismisse them vnpunished, and so do worse and worse, although their fact was neuer so notorious.

34 Item, so some as any married clerke being a merchant or of whatsoeuer other science he be of, for any his offence by him committed, is called before the secular iudge: the said clerke obtaineth of the officials a monition, bringing with them some priest, who doth inhibit the secular iudge vnder paine of 100. or 200. markes, yea and of excommunication to, not to proceed further, nor to meddle in such causes, and not to molest such parties, neither in bodie nor goods: But if the iudges obey not, they shall be suspended from hearing of masse in that place, although the matter concerneth the fact of merchandize.

35 Item, the said officials grant citations without number against the laytie in cases of warrenties personally to ascite before them persons vnknowne. But if they be knowne, it is contained in the citation, that in no wise, and that vnder a great paine, he cause his aduersary to be called before a secular iudge, during the returne of the citation.

36 Item, when one is excommunicated in any place, the officials grant out personall citations against them, which do participat and are conuersant with the excommunicat: causing a whole countrey by the space of eight miles about to be cited together. And further, the friends and acquaintance of the partie so excommunicat (sometime by 40. sometime 60. yea and sometime by a 100. at once) are compelled to make their purgation before them, that they do not participat nor keepe companie with their friends the excommunicats. Whereby infinite that many honest, old and ancient men, for auoiding of troubles and vexations, do pay some twelue pence, some two shillings. By occasion whereof many vines are vnlaked to, much ground vntilled, yea and many good men constrained to lay the key vnder the doore, and run away.

37 Item, the said officials do burden many persons of good name and fame, to be vsurers; whereby they are constrained to agree with them, for auoiding the infamie that thereby might insue.

38 Item, the foresaid officials call by citation afore them, the honest wedded (as well man as woman) charging them, that they haue committed adulterie to the perpetuall infamie of their husbands and wiues. And for nothing else but by extortion to wring money from them.

39 Item, mention must be made of the multitude and number of notaries, which cast and deuoure vp all the wealth with their exactions: catching vp clients, and keeping abroad in the countrie courts and assises, who for money returne not the citations, which by extortion they receiue of them which are cited.

40 Item, there be manie other grieues and enormities, which the Chapters, Abbats, Priors, Priouors, and other ecclesiasticall persons in the realme of France, practise against the people. As when they cause to be cited before them, many of the kings burgesses, and other in diuers places being priuiledged: that is to say, Baiocenses, Pannetarius in Vitaine, the Lugdons, Pasticons, with other more. But specially the prooust of hospitals, vse more commonly this tricke, then any heare any rich or fat cob to die, or thinke that he will not liue where it is written: Submit your selues vnto euerie creature, for the Lords sake, whether it be vnto the king, as vnto the subilitie ought in manner to prescribe this law to himselfe, to thinke himselfe bound to giue, when he giueth freely: and vn-prouoft of hofpitals, bfe more commonly this tricke, then any other bo: whereby the people is much indamaged, and will be euery day more and more, if remedie be not had therein.

41 Item, eccleſiaſtical magiſtrates labour to haue cognition of cauſes of iniurie, in whatſoeuer cauſe it be: whether the iniurie be committed by word or fact. Likewiſe, they take vpon them to heare the cauſes of married clerkes, and of their wiues although they both vſe merchandize. And if at any time ſuch couples be taken by the ſecular magiſtrates, the officiall cauſeth a ſuſpenſion to be denounced in that parith, by force of the councell Situanenſe.

42 Item, they challenge to haue cognition concerning widowes goods, both moueable and immoueable. And if it happeneth at any time that a merchant widow, in any of the kings peculiars by way of reſt, procureth any temporall man to be conuented before the ſecular iudge: and the matter ſo farre vniſed, that he ſhould haue bin condemned by the ſentence of the ſecular iudge, and then come to the care of the eccleſiaſticall magiſtrates, how and before whom the widow bid conuent him: the ſaid temporall iudge ſhall be conſtrained, to withdraw the ſame. And by their monitions and cenſures to correct the ſame: and this of entimes happeneth.

43 Item, many of the tenants and inhabiters of the biſhops landes, calleth one another to the court of the officials, by a kind of appellation: by vertue whereof, the officials take vpon them to proceed in the ſame, and to haue cognition thereof, to the preiudice of the temporall iuriſdiction of our ſoueraigne lord the king.

44 Item, if any man be apprehended by ſecular iuſtice in the dedding of blod: by them if he be lay, he is to be ordred: if he be a clerke he is to be reſtored to the eccleſiaſticall iudge. But whether he be a temporall man or clerke that is ſo taken, and appealeth to the off cials court; they will be ſo bold to haue cognition thereof, requiring by reaſon amends of the ſecular court, which enterpriſed the foreſaid apprehenſion. If this be ſuffered, the malefactor ſhall neuer be puniſhed. For by and by they will appeale, and immediatly after the appellation flie and auoid away.

45 Item, when they cauſe many of office, to be cited before them, they will admit them to haue no procurs: to whom when they come at the day of appearance, they obiect the crime of uſury. And except they anſuere as the promoters will themſelues, they are trodden vnder feet (although they be mere lay) and ſhall not be diſmiſſed, before they fine euen as the officials liſt themſelues, although they be no vſurers. But if any be vſurers, they take of them ſatisfaction and bribes: and ſo be permitted to vſe their vſurie, no leſſe then before. So that, they may haue their old ſies and bribes.

46 Item, they procure their officers to apprehend clerkes in whatſoeuer ſoile they be found: albeit by iuſtice, they may appeale therefrom. But if by any they be let of their will herein, they do forthwith by ſentence of excommunication, cauſe them to deſiſt therefore.

47 Item, as oftentimes as any temporall magiſtrate doth apprehend any perſon, which afterward being required of the clergie, is quietly deliuered vnto them: yet for all that, the officials cauſe thoſe magiſtrates to be denounced excommunicat by law.

48 Item, the prelats giue order of tonſures as well to men of thirtie yeares vp ward, as alſo to married men, when they come vnto them, for feare of impriſonment and puniſhment due vnto them for their criminall offences, before committed: And this is oftentimes put in practiſe.

49 Item, if it happen any of the kings ſeruants or any other to be excommunicat, and would faine be abſolued, being glad to pay reaſonable for the ſame: the clergie will not receiue but ſuch ſatisfaction, as ſhall pleaſe them, whereby many of them remaine ſtill excommunicat.

50 Item, when two perſons haue bin at ſtrife and law together for the poſſeſſion of land, and the matter contentious be put into the handes of the king by ſome ſeruant or officer of the king, for the taking vp of the matter: then do the prelats adminiſtre vnto one part, not to trouble the other which is in poſſeſſion. Otherwiſe if he do, they do excommunicat him.

51 Item, the foreſaid prelats, deanes, chaplaines, and other the rout of the clergie, put the kings officers to ſo much trauell and expences in trying out the kings vſurped iuriſdiction, as they learne it; that oftentimes many of them ſpend and conſume in the trauell of the right and title thereof, all that they haue and more to.

52 Item, if any ſecular iuſticer in a true and iuſt cauſe, at the requeſt of the partie, putteth in his helping hand concerning the inheritance of clerkes: the eccleſiaſticall iudges and their miniſters, ſend out monitions in writting againſt the ſaid iuſticer: yea vnder paine of excommunication and ſuſpenſure, to take away his hand and leaue off. Enioyning him further to ſuffer the other partie quietly to enioy the ſaid things. Otherwiſe they denounce him excommunicat, and ſhall not be abſolued before he haue well paid for it, euen as pleaſeth maiſter officiall to the high preiudice of the authoritie of our ſoueraigne lord the king.

53 Item, the eccleſiaſticall magiſtrates, ſo ſone as they heare any rich or fat cob to die, or thinke that he will not liue long: ſend out forthwith letters vnder ſeale to their chaplaine, commanding him in any wiſe not to preſume to burie him, although he made his teſtament, and receiued the rites of the church. And when afterward, the friends and kinſfolkes of the dead reſort vnto them to know the cauſe of their inhibition; they declare vnto them that he was an vſurer, and that he kept not the commandements of holy church: and ſo long keepe they the corps of the dead vnburied, while the friends of him buy it out with good ſtore of money, heaping and heaping by theſe meanes abundance of riches.

54 Item, if there be any violent ſhedding of blod in any churchyard, whereby the interdict taketh place: the clergie cauſeth a certaine impoſition to be leuied of the parſhioners there, for the ſalarie towards the reſtoring thereof. Although ſome of the parſhioners be of an exempt iuriſdiction: yea and although he which ſhed the blod be able to pay the whole taxe which they leuied and impoſed.

55 Item, certaine chaplaines affirme to haue certaine apoſtolicall priuiledges, by vertue whereof they may appoint what iudges they will (yea and oftentimes of their owne houſe) and ſo be iudges in their owne cauſe, which is plaine againſt the law. Whereby oftentimes it happeth, that after great proceſſe and expences had and made in any great cauſe of inqueſt (more often about realitie then otherwiſe) when they haue notice by the procters and aduocats that they ſhall haue the ſolle therein; they reuoke forthwith thoſe named iudges, and ſo the kings ſubiects are damaged, and can haue no iuſtice nor redreſſe at their handes.

56 Item, if any temporall man call a clerke before a ſecular iudge in a cauſe of inheritance: the eccleſiaſticall iudge procureth a ſtop to be made therein, attributing to themſelues the cognition thereof: and ſo by adiourning and remouing, the lay man is conſtrained to make ſatisfaction.

57 Item, the clergie challengeth the cognition of ſuch cauſes as married clerkes being merchants and artificers do commence: when by law it doth appertaine to the temporaltie, eſpecially about the trade of merchandiſe.

58 Item, they oftentimes make interdictions in many of the kings townes and holds, and cauſe the diuine ſeruice to ceaſe: againſt the priuiledges granted by many of the high biſhops of Rome to our ſoueraigne lord and maiſter the king.

59 Item, to and for the maintenance and keping of their temporalities, they appoint baſtifes and other officers: who if they do offend, may not condignely be puniſhed according to law and iuſtice.

60 Item, the eccleſiaſticall iudges haue promoters belonging vnto them: who when any man is excommunicated (be it right, or be it wrong) they cauſe to be made, that no man ſhall wooke or do any thing for him that is excommunicate: whereby the lands and vines are oftentimes vnlooked to and battiled, to the no ſmall preiudice of the king and his common people.

61 Item, the foreſaid promoters cauſe citations to be made out, by vertue whereof they call in one citation, twentie, thirtie, fortie perſons to appeare, for participating with ſuch interdicted perſons: taking of ſome ten, of otherſome twentie ſhillings, as much as they be able to make: whereby the common people are much oppreſſed.

62 Item, the eccleſiaſticall iudges cauſe all the aduocats of their courts to be ſworne, that none ſhall retaine them of their counſell againſt any of them, without their licence: whereby oftentimes the poore man quite loſeth his right, and the kings cauſe is delayed: becauſe his ſolicitours cannot freely retaine counſell, without ſpeciall licence.

63 Item, they will make inuentories of their goods which die inteſtate, or without making of Will: and will haue the poſſeſſion of their goods, as well moueable as immoueable in their owne hands to diſtribute to the heires, or to whom they liſt.

64 Item, the execution alſo of teſtaments they take to their owne hands, taking inuentories of dead mens goods, and keping and diſpoſing them to the heires after their pleaſure. And haue officials properly deputed for the execution thereof.

65 Item, they will not giue credit (ſometimes) to teſtaments made before witnelle, vnleſſe they be ſtrift by their owne officials approued.

After he had thus ſpoken, the prelats required to haue time to anſwere thereunto. Whereupon was appointed for the ſame the Friday next inſuing. On the which day, the biſhop Ebrard, and archbiſhop of Senon elect in the name of the whole clergie, anſwered for them all before the king, holding his parliament as that day at Vicennes, and thus he there propounded: For ſo much as the lord Peter Cugner of late propounding againſt the church of France, tooke to his theme that is written in the 22. of Matthew: Render vnto Ceſar, that which is Ceſars, and vnto God that which is Gods: by which words he ſaid, two points were to be noted: Firſt the reuerence and ſubiection of the prelats, that they ought to haue to the king their ſoueraigne: Secondly the diuiſion of the temporall iuriſdiction from the ſpirituall. The which firſt part he proued out of the firſt epiſtle of Peter in the ſecond chapter, where where it is written: Submit your ſelues vnto euerie creature, for the Lords ſake, whether it be vnto the king, as vnto the ſuperiour, or vnto gouernours, as vnto them that are ſent of him: for the puniſhment of euill doers, and for the praiſe of them that do well. The ſecond point he proued by the words of our Sauiour Chriſt in the two and twentith chapter of Luke, where the Apoſtle ſaith: Lord behold, here are two ſwords. And he ſaid vnto them, it is enough, ſignifying by the two ſwords the two iuriſdictions. And in likewiſe out of the ſeuentenith of Matthew, where Chriſt would pay tribute for him and Peter. Giuing hereby an example, how that eccleſiaſticall perſons were bound to pay and yeeld to the temporall power the temporalities; which alſo is proued in the 11. quæſt. prim. cap. Si tributum, & cap. magnum.

And further, becauſe this is proued by mans law, where it is ſaid, two great gifts are beſtowed, prieſthood and empire: the prieſthood to rule ouer matters diuine, the empire to beare domination ouer humane matters. Whereby he concluded, that when theſe iuriſdictions are diſtincted of God; the one being giuen and limited to the church, and the other to the temporalitie: that it no wiſe the church ought to intermeddle, or to haue any thing to do with the temporall iuriſdiction. For it is written in the two and twentith of the Prouerbs, Pou ought not to paſſe the old limits and bounds, which the forefathers haue ſet. And well by the way he bringeth in this word, old and ancient: Becauſe cuſtomes brought in to the contrarie, be of no force, but rather are counted abuſes and corruptions. Neither can preſcription take place, for that ius fiſci is imprſcriptible, neither can the king abrogat from himſelfe ſuch law, nor renounce his right, pronuing the ſame by many chapters contained in the 10. Diſtinct. Wherefore ſeeing the king at what time he was crowned, ware not only not to alienate or infringe the lawes of his realme, but alſo to call in ſuch lawes as were alienated and diſturped either by the church, or by any other: the king was bound by his oth to reuoke the ſame abuſes.

In eſpeciall he did exhibit many articles in writing, wherein (as he ſaid) the church did diſturpe vpon the iuriſdiction temporall. To anſwere theſe premiſſes with conciling of the places (vnder proteſtation whatſoeuer I ſay or ſhall ſay) it is not to ground or make any ſmall iudgement or determination herein: but only to informe the conſcience of our ſoueraigne lord the king and his aſſiſtants here aſſembled, alleaging the firſt epiſtle of Peter the ſecond chapter, where he ſaith: Feare God and honor the king. By which words, the holy Apoſtle Saint Peter teacheth vs two things. Firſt, that loue, feare, and obedience, is due vnto God for the mightineſſe and puiſſance of his Maieſtie; ſaying, Feare God. Secondly, how eſpeciall honor and reuerence is due to the king, for the excellencie of his dignitie; ſaying, Honor the king. But note pon by the way, how the Apoſtle placeth his words: Firſt hee faith, that feare is due vnto God, becauſe principally and in chiefe we ought to feare God: For if the king or any other ſhould command things cotrarie to God, we ought to haue no regard therof, but to contemne the king and feare God. For it is written in the fifth of the Acts of the Apoſtles; We ought rather to obey God then men: and alſo in the ſeuenth chapter of Dachabees the ſecond booke, where it is ſaid, I will not obey the commandements of the king, but the law.

The reaſon whereof S. Auguſtine giueth both in the Gloſſe vpon the Romans, and alſo in the 11. quæſt. 1. He that reſiſteth the ſuperiour power, reſiſteth the will and ordinance of God. But put caſe thou art commanded to do that which thou ought not do, or not to do that which thou ought eſt to do. Doubteleſſe, thou muſt neglect the leſſer power, and feare the higher, learning the degrees of worldly things.

If for example, he it ſo that a proctor commandeth thee any thing, which if the ſame be againſt the Proconſull) thou ought not to follow it. Yea am further, put caſe the proconſull commandeth one thing, the emperour another, and God willeth the third: Thou muſt not care for them, but obey God, for God is the greater power: For they may threaten thee with priſon, but God may threaten thee with hell fire: they may ſlay and kill thy bodie, but God may ſend thee bodie and ſoule to perpetuall hell fire. And therefore worthily it is put firſt, feare God. And here the place in the laſt of Eccleſiaſticus is to be adioyned, where it is written: Feare God and keepe his commandements.

And me thinketh that man is bound to feare God chiefely in three ſorts. That is to ſay: Firſt in the bountifull beſtowing of his gifts and benefits. Secondly, in the prudent promoting of his ſeruants: and laſtly, in the full rendring and reſtoring vnto man that is his.

Firſt, I ſay in the bountifull, &c. and for this cauſe the emperour Iuſtinian writeth: Although there is nothing to be accounted good, which doth exceed and is to great, yet for a prince to beſtow accordingly vpon the church, it is verie good. For why, the king and emperour is bound to beſtow ſo much the more ſubſtance, how much the more God hath giuen to him, and to beſtow the ſame both frankelie, and eſpecially to famous churches, wherein the beſt and greateſt meaſure is of the lords gifts, that is, a great gift. And to this end Gregorie enacteth a law, cap. 1. de extra, de donationibus, that nobilitie ought in manner to preſcribe this law to himſelfe. to thinke himſelfe bound to giue, when he giueth freely: and vnleſſe he increaſe in giuing ſtill, to thinke that he hath giuen nothing.

Wherefore Abel, as appeareth in the 4. chapter of Geneſis, who offered of the beſt to the Lord, was bleſſed of God. And therefore other kings, the more they offered to God, the more they were both ſpirituallie and temporally bleſſed of him: As we reade of Joſua, Dauid, Salomon, and others in the booke of the kings: and therefore it is ſo written in the 18. of Numbers: And ye ſhall ſeparate vnto the Lords treaſurie, things that be cheefeſt and moſt principall. Likewiſe Dauid ſaith in the firſt of Paralipomenon laſt chapter: I haue giuen all this with a glad heart, euen with a good will, and now haue I had ioy to ſee thy people which heere are preſent, offer with a free will vnto thee. And no marueil, for Dauid ſaith in that place: For of thy hand we haue receiued all, and to thee we giue. And therefore it ſeemeth to me, that becauſe the kings of France and barons of the ſame, more then any other haue giuen to God and his church: therefore they were happie and bleſſed aboue all other kings, and the more they did giue to God, the more they receiued at his hands.

Examples wherof we haue of Clodoue, Charles, and S. Lewes: the more one giueth to God, the more he receiueth of him: For he in the firſt of Luke hath promiſed, Giue and it ſhal be giuen vnto you. Wherefore, a gift that a prince beſtoweth vpon the church is requited againe with triple encreaſe, and that no leſſe in time of warre then in time of peace. I ſay in warre time, becauſe victorie proceedeth of no other but only of God, for it is written in the 1. Machabees the third chapter: The victorie of the battell ſtandeth not in the multitude of the hoſt, but the ſtrength commeth from heauen. And likewiſe, in the ſeuenteenth chapter of Exodus it is declared, that when Moſes held vp his hands, Iſrael had the victorie: but when he let downe his hands, Amaleck had the victorie. To this end alſo ſerueth the laſt chapter of Machabees 2. Where Judas being at the point to haue the victorie, thought he law Onion and Jeremie (which had been high prieſts and verie vertuous men) holding vp their hands toward heauen, and praying for their people and all the whole cite, &c. Likewiſe in peace time now, the long dates of the king and of his ſonnes, their peace, proſperitie, and obedience (by the prayer of the church) is maintained and ſupported in the realme. For as long as Salomon was bent and giuen in building the houſe of God, ſo long he had peace: who thus in the ſeuenth chapter of the Prouerbs teacheth vs: When a mans waies pleaſe the Lord, he maketh his verie enemies to be his friends: And alſo in 1. Eſdras the firſt chapter, where it is read, how the prieſts were commanded to offer ſweet ſauours to the God of heauen, and pray for the kings life and his children. And well therefore may it be called a gift both ſauourable and irreuocable, whereby victorie is giuen, life granted, and peace with ſecuritie confirmed. To ſerue therefore God, and liberally to giue toward the worſhipping of him, is the cheefeſt ſigne and token of diuine feare and loue. Eccleſiaſt. chap. 2. Dye that feare the Lord, beleeue him, and your reward ſhall not be emptie.

Secondly, concerning the feare of God, I do put to vnderſtand, that among the precepts of the Lord, the firſt and cheefeſt commandement of the ſecond table is, To honor thy father. Which precept is verie well expounded to the Hebrewes in the twelfth chapter. Where it is not only meant of the fathers of our bodies, but alſo of the father of ſpirits. For as ſpirituall things farre excede temporall matters: ſo much more a great deale the ſpirituall ſonne is bound to reuerence the ſpirituall father, and to be in ſubiection vnto him, that he may liue. And that the prieſts and prelats be the ſpirituall fathers, it is proued in the fourth booke of the kings, the firth chap. Where the king of Iſrael called Eliſeus father, ſaying: My father ſhall I ſmite them? Tinde this effect ſerueth the tenth of Luke, where our Sauiour ſaid to the Apoſtles (whoſe ſucceſſours the biſhops are) He that heareth you heareth me, and he that deſpiſeth you deſpiſeth me. Alſo in the firſt to the Theſſal. the fourth chapter, He that deſpiſeth you, deſpiſeth not men but God. Wherefore Juſtinian the emperour in another place ſaith: We haue great care to the church of God, that therein may be true doctrine and integritie of prieſts life. Which hauing, we truſt that for our great gifts we ſhall receiue ſuch rewards at Gods hands, both as be durable, and ſhall remaine: yea and alſo that hitherto haue not hapned. Bleſſed Saint Hierome in his regiſter writing to a certaine emperour, which is alſo to be ſeene in the decrees. Decret. 11. quæſt. 1. ſaith: Let not the emperour diſdaine prieſts, but haue ſpeciall regard on them for his ſake whoſe ſeruants they be: and ſo let him rule ouer them, that doe and condigne reuerence be giuen vnto them. For they in diuine Scriptures are ſometime tearmed Gods, ſometimes named Angels, Exodus 22. Then ſhall both their cauſes come before the gods. Alſo Malachie the ſecond, the prieſts lips ſhould bee ſure of knowledge, that men may ſeeke the law at his mouth: For he is a meſſenger of the Lord of hoſts. And therefore is it no marueil, if we ſhould vouchſafe to honour them, when God himſelfe in his ſpech attributing to them honour, teacheth them Gods and Angels. And here is to be noted, Honoring of ſpirituall fathers.

Fear of God handeth in three points.

how Constantine the emperour, when certaine of his subiects presented vnto him libels accusatorie against the bishops, receiued them at their hands. But calling before him those bishops which were accused therein, cast in their sight those libels into the fire, saying: depart you hence and discusse these matters with in your selues: For it is not conuenient and meete that we iudge Gods, because it is written: God stood in the synagogue of Gods, and in the middest of them he did iudge Gods. In which chapter it is declared, how that the Pagans who worshipped golden and wodden gods, attributed great honor to the priests: What marueil is it then, if the godly and great and christian emperours doe honor and reuerence the priests of the true God? And doubtlesse, it is their dutie so to do. And it is reason which the lord Peter the last day said, in this point: That there are two powers, priesthood and dominion, the one spirituall, the other temporall: which no lesse differeth one from the other, then the Sunne from the Moone, the heauen from the earth, and gold from lead. And therefore if honor is due to be giuen to the lesser power, by them that be vnderneath him: be that is chefe of the higher power, of right good dutie is to be honored, and reuerenced of all vnder him, as expresselye is declared, Can. Solit. Decim. & ob. In which chapter answere is fully made to the allegation of the lord Peter (alleged by him to make for his purpose) that is to say: Vse yee subiect to all creatures for Gods sake, &c. There hee speaketh of the subiection which standeth vpon the merit of vertue, and not vpon the dutie of necessitie. For else if hee should speake of the subiection which is by dutie of necessitie: then must it needs follow, that euery bishop ought to be subiect to euerie beggerly rascall in the citie of Paris. For the text is, Vse yee subiect to all humane creatures: but a rascall is a humane creature: Ergo, bishops must be subiect to a rascall. Of the dignitie of a bishop Ambrose teacheth in his pastorall. The honor, saith he, and the maiestie of a bishop is without all comparison. If you compare it to the royaltie of a king, it is euen as you would compare mettall or lead to the beautie of gold. For that is to be seene, that kings and princes stooping vnder the knees of priests, and kissing their right hand; thinke themselues to be defended by their prayer. And because the kings of France haue more then other, honored and reuerenced the prelats, they haue aboue all other flourished and prospered. It is said in Ecclesi.4. He that honoreth his father, shall reioyce in his sonnes. And it followeth there, He that honoreth his father, shall liue a long life. This is therefore the signe of the feare of God. And as it is written in Ecclesi. 4. He that feareth God honoreth his parents.

Thirdly I say, that a man ought to feare God, in the full reuerencing and reseruing vnto man that is his: For he that doth not giue to another that is his, but goeth about to vsurpe, doubtlesse he feareth not God. Contrarie, he that reuerenceth all men, he is said to loue and feare God. Ecclesiast. 18. He that feareth God shall do good things. And in the Psalme, I haue been afraid of thy iudgements, and haue done iudgement and iustice. For as the lawyers say, which is true: A thing may be made mine diuers waies, as by succession, connatation, prescription, or any other acquisition, either by law or custome: And so of the rest. And whereas the Lord Peter the last day, by distinction of iurisdiction temporall and spirituall, endeuored to proue that he which had spirituall iurisdiction, ought not to haue temporall; otherwise there were no distinction thereof, but rather a confusion of iurisdictions. I will therefore proue the contrarie, that these iurisdictions are compatible both in one person, especially in an ecclesiasticall man. And this will I proue by the law of God, by the law of nature, canon law, ciuill law, by custome and priuiledge. But first I alleage, that accidentall formes (some of them are so distincted, that they are not cleane contrarie, but dissalike, as whitenesse and sweetnesse. Other formes there be which are so distincted, that they are cleane contrarie one to the other, And are not compatible in one subiect. For one contrarie expels another, and importeth the negatiue of the other. Wherefore these things be contrarie, which one from another are most of all distant and disagreeing, and in one subiect while may come one after the other, but not together, as the philosopher teacheth in the Predicaments. But those formes which are so distincted, that they be not contrarie but dissalike; are compatible in one subiect, as quantitie and qualitie, which being distinacted in respect of their Genus generalissimum, yet may be in one person. And fortitude and temperance being vnder one kind of morall vertue, are found to be in one man, as Logicke and Grammar, which are also species and kindes in one genus, viz. of intellectus. Therefore it is no good argument: These formes be distinacted, Ergo, they be not compatible in one subiect. And therefore that the iurisdictions temporall and spirituall are so distincted, that they are not contrarie but compatible, it is euident hereby, because things contrarie be so that the one cannot be ordained to concurre with the other, but rather confoundeth and destroyeth the other: but in this case iurisdiction temporall is ordained for the spirituall, and contrarie, the spirituall for the temporall. Or rather, the one so dependeth of the other, as the clearenesse of the Moone doth of the brightnesse of the Sunne. Also the one iurisdiction so helpeth and comforteth the other, that there is no contrarietie in them. And therefore it is no good consequence, because they are distincted: Ergo, they are not compatible in one person. This also is to be proued de facto. For the earth is the Lords, and the plentie of the whole vniuersall world, and all that dwell therein. It is proued in likewise by this reason. For if the iurisdictions were not compatible; it should follow, that no ecclesiasticall person should haue any iot of temporall iurisdiction: neither land, tower, castle, lordship, or any other thing else, which is most absurd: and so by this meanes it should follow, that no ecclesiasticall person should bee in subiection vnto the king, which were to the great derogation of the kings maiesties crowne and dignitie. It must needs bee therefore that these iurisdictions bee compatible, notwithstanding the distinction of them one from another. And thus for answere to all these reasons, by the which lord Peter proued the distinction of these iurisdictions.

These things premised, thus I proceed further to proue that a person ecclesiasticall, which hath iurisdiction spirituall, may also haue temporall iurisdiction: and that the iurisdiction temporall may bee in an ecclesiasticall person, I will proue it by the Scriptures: and first out of the old testament: to the euident probation whereof, it is to bee vnderstood: That God, after the creation of the world and man, euen vnto Noes time, would gouerne the world himselfe as king by the ministerie of Angels. By reason whereof he gaue and pronounced sentence himselfe against Cain, Genesis the fourth. Noe also which offered burnt offrings vnto the Lord, and built an altar, as teacheth the eight of Genesis: (which thing appertained onlie vnto the priests) had the gouernment and rule of all things, as well spirituall as temporall, which were in the Arke of Noe. Melchisedech in likewise, the which was the priest of the most high God, and also king of Salem, as appeareth in the fourteenth of Genesis, and had both the iurisdictions in his owne hands. For Magister Historiarum, in the said fourteenth of Genesis declareth, that after the first floud of Noe, euen to Aarons time hee was priest: which at meales and offrings vsed to bless the people, and which only had the Ius primogeniture, whereby the regiment of others was due vnto them. Moses in like manner (of whom it is said in the Psalme, Moses & Aaron in sacerdotibus eius) consecrated Aaron and his children to bee priests, which Aaron did indge the whole people in temporall matters, yea and that in causes of inheritance and more reall, as appeareth in the seuen and twentith chapter of Numbers, and many other places. To which purpose seemeth the seuentenith chapter of Deuteronomie: where it is said; If a matter be too hard for thee in iudgement betwixt blood and blood, betwixt plea and plea, betwixt plague and plague; then shalt thou arise and go vp to that place, that the Lord thy God hath chosen: and thalt come to the Priests, the Leuites, and to the Iudge then being, and shalt aske, who shall shew vnto vs the truth of the iudgement; and follow their sentence. And if any man presumptuously shall refuse to obey the priests commandements and decree of the iudge, the same shall die. Behold how manifestly it doth appeare, how not only the iudgement appertained to a priest, betweene plague and plague, concerning the circumstances and irregularitie of the law: but also betwixt blood and blood, in matters criminall: yea and betwixt plea and plea in ciuill matters: Which thing both appeare to be in many iudges out of the boke of Iudges. For Samuel, which was both a prophet and priest, was appointed iudge of long time ouer the people in matters temporall: And when the people desired a king, the Lord was highly offended with them, and said vnto Samuel: They haue not refused thee but me, that I should not be king ouer them. Furthermore, as long as kings among the people of God, vsed the aduice and counsell of priests and bishops; it was well with them and their kingdome: But when they forsooke and left the counsell of bishops and priests, then was their kingdome diuided, and finally they brought into captiuitie. In which captiuitie, the people were altogether gouerned and ruled by the priests and prophets, as by Esdras and Nehemias: And last of all by the meanes of the Machabees, the kingdome and gouernment was deuoluted and brought into the priests hands, who were the kings and captaines ouer the people: and had the gouernment as well of spirituall matters as of temporall, as is read in the first boke of Machabees the second chapter: Of Mathatia and his sonnes, videlicet, of Iudas Machaby, Jonatha, Simon, and John the son of Simeon ruling in all spirituall and temporall matters, were gouernours ouer the people of God. Moreouer, the first chapter of Jeremie declareth, which was one of the priests, after this manner: I haue set thee ouer the people and kingdomes, that thou maist root out, breake, destroy, and make waste, and that thou maist build vp and plant, Ierem. capite primo. Besides this, in time of Judge Eliach, a priest in like maner had the iudgement of temporall matters. And so much concerning the proofe hereof, out of the old Testament.

Secondlie, I proue my former proposition by authorities taken out of the new Testament. For Christ had not only by diuine nature both the powers, whereby he created all things of nothing, and by consequence was God of all, but but also by his humanitie had both powers. For he was the priest, secundum ordinem Melchisedech (as it is said in the Psalmes, and also is alleaged to the Hebrewes) which had both in his vesture and thigh written: King of kings and Lord of lords. By this vesturient or thigh was meant his humanitie, which was coyned to his Diuinitie, as the garment is to him that is vested with it. He said of himselfe in the last of Matthew: Giuen is vnto me all power both in heauen and in earth. As also to the Hebrewes the first chapter, Whom he made and constituted heire of all vniuersall things. And likewise in the second chapter to the Hebrewes: He hath made him not much inferiour to the Angels: he hath crowned him with glorie and honor, and hath set him aboue the workes of his hands: Thou hast put all things in subiection vnder his feet, sheepe and oxen, and all the whole cattell of the field. When therefore it is said, he made all things subiect to him, he excludeth nothing as the Apostle there saith. Whereby it is apparant, that as concerning his humane nature, in the which he was made lesse then the Angels, all things were subiect to him. Also this appeareth in the second chapter to the Philippians: He humbled himselfe, wherefore God exalted him, &c. And it followeth, that in the name of Jesus should euerie knee bow, both of things in heauen and of things in earth, and of things vnder the earth. Behold here, that by nature by which he did humble himselfe, he was exalted because euerie knee should bow vnto him. This in like manner hath Saint Peter in the tenth chapter of the Acts, where he saith, he was constituted of God the iudge ouer the quicke and the dead: And he speaketh of the nature which God raised vp the third day, as the whole Scripture proueth. And likewise Saint Peter had this power giuen him, whom Christ constituted and made his vicar, who also condemned by sentence iudicially Ananias and Saphira for lying and stealing: Acts chapter 5. Paul also condemned a fornicatour conuicted, 1. Corinthians 5. And that Christ would the correction and iudgement of such matters to appertaine to his Church, a text in the eighteenth of Matthew expresselye declareth, where it is said: If thy brother trespasse against thee, go and tell him his fault betweene him and thee: if he heare thee, thou hast wonne thy brother: But if he heareth not, then take with thee one or two, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses all things may be established: If he heare not them, tell it vnto the congregation: If he heare not the congregation, take him as an heathen man and a Publican. Verily I say vnto you; what soeuer you bind on earth, the same shall be bound in heauen, and what soeuer you loose on earth, the same shall be losed in heauen. Behold how expresselye it is commanded, that whensoeuer in any matter one offendeth the other, he being first charitable admonished, the matter must bee published and referred to the order of the church and congregation. But if the offender do not obey and heare the admonition, he is to be taken as an heathen and a Publican: which is as much to say, like one that is excommunicat by the church and congregation. So that he may haue no communion or participation with it. And that this was the intention of Christ, this seemeth much to proue it, where in giuing the reason hereof, he immediatly addeth: Verily I say vnto you, What soeuer, &c. (where note this terme distributiue, what soeuer) so as the apostle argueth to the Hebrewes the second chapter, that if he ordained all things to be subiect vnto him, he excludeth nothing vnsubiected. Wherefore thus I may argue; If all things that the church and congregation doth lose, be loosed, and euery thing that the church bindeth is bound: There is nothing that the church may not loose and bind. Or by logicke thus I may reason: There is nothing bound by the church, that is not bound in heauen: which argument is good by a certaine rule of logicke which saith: that contraries if the negation be put after, are equiualent. For euery thing and nothing, what soeuer thing, and no manner of thing, be contrarie one to the other. And so nothing not, is as much to say, as all things. Secondly, I do proue it out of another text of Saint Luke, chapter 22. Which place alleaged to make for his purpose. I will strike him with his owne weapon. For where he said, that by the two swords the two powers temporall and spirituall were to be vnderstod, it was so indeed: but to whose hands would he (I pray you) haue these two swords committed? Truly to the hands of Peter and other the Apostles, &c. But the holy father the pope succeeded Peter, and the other Apostles, the bishops disciples, curats, parsons, as in the Glosse appeareth, Luke 10. whereby thus I argue: That by the two swords, the two powers are meant: But Christ willed those two swords to be put into the churches hands: Ergo, he would likewise the two powers. But you may replie and say, that Christ did reprehend Peter because he strooke with a temporall sword and cut off an eare, saying vnto him put vp thy sword, &c. Which reason is of no force. For Christ did not will Peter to cast away quite from him the sword, but to put it into the scabard and to keepe it, giuing to vnderstand thereby, that such power, although it be in the churches hands: yet the execution thereof (as much as appertaineth to bloodshedding in the new law) hee would haue to appertaine to the secular iudge: notwithstanding yet perhaps, according to the discretion and will of the clergie.

Thirdly, I proue this by the intent of Saint Paul in the

1. Corinth. 6. where he saith: that they which haue secular businesse, and contend one against another, ought to be iudged by the Saints. And that they should iudge therein, therefore he made this argument: Know you not that the Saints shall iudge the world? And if the world be iudged by you, are ye not good enough to iudge small trifles? As though he would say, Do yee not know how that yee shall iudge the Angels? How much more then may you iudge things secular? And it followeth: If you haue iudgement of secular and worldly matters, take them which are despised in the church and congregations, and make them iudges. Neither doth it make any thing against, because the Apostle in the same place inferreth: Ad verecundiam vestram dico: I say it to your shame. For that is to be referred to those, where hee saith, Appoint those which are despised. Wherefore the Apostle speaketh ironically in this matter, as meaning thus: Sooner and the rather you ought to run to the iudgement of the despised which be in the church, then to the iudgement of those which be out of the church.

1. Cor. 6. I.

Ergo, the rather to resort to the iudgement of the wise, who remaine in the church and congregation. Wherefore the Apostle by and by added when he said, I speake to your shame: What not one wise man amongst you that can iudge betweene brother and brother? Meaning thereby that there was some. By these therefore and many other like reasons it appeareth (which to breuitie I omit) that both the powers may be in an ecclesiasticall mans hand: and that an ecclesiasticall man is capax both of the temporall and spirituall iurisdiction. Notwithstanding matter fit to be obserued, that Peter and other Apostles and Christ himselfe, bled little the temporall power. For in them was not the like reason as now is in vs, as is proued in the 22. quæst. 1. cap. and in many other places of the law. The Apostles at the first beginning tooke no receit of lands and possessions, but the price only thereof; which now the church with verie good reason doth receiue: and that to the great merit both of the giuer and offerer, as it appeareth of Constantine and others: In the which forsaid 1. cap. the reason of diuersitie is well proued. For that the Apostles did so, for that the church should be among Gentiles, and not one to be in Iudea, &c. And further, at the beguning Christ and his Apostles were vnlolie bent and giuen, to our health, saluation and erudition: little sticking or standing vpon the exercise of euerie churches iurisdiction, hauing regard to that which is written in the first chapter to the Corinthians: All things are lawfull vnto men, but all things are not expedient. And likewise in the eight chapter of Ecclesiastes it is read, that euerie thing hath his time. But now (through the grace of God) the whole people of the realme of France haue submitted themselues to the Christian faith; wherefore the church is certainly minishing of iudices and punishing of vice: for peace shall be the worke of iustice, Esay the 32. chapter. And in these iudgements this only is to be considered, that the life of man bee reformed, &c. Thus you see, how this our conclusion somewhat is confirmed by the Scriptures. Now will I proue it by naturall law and reason, and first after this manner: He seemeth most fit to play a good iudges part, which followeth neerest God: for properly God is the ruler and director of all iudgements, who saith, Prouerb. capite octauo, By me the law-maker shall decree iustice and iust things: but ecclesiasticall persons, follow next to God, and be neerest him: For that they be elected of God into a peculiar people, where of it is said, 1. Peter 2. You are a chosen generation, a royall priesthood, a holy nation, and a peculiar people, that you should shew the vertues of him that called you, &c. Ergo, it is most fit that persons ecclesiasticall, and churchmen, should iudge of such matters. Moreouer, none doubteth, but that the correction and punishment of sinne, belongeth to ecclesiasticall persons; wherefore, when such things be not committed without sinne and offence of the one partie, it is euident that the church may haue cognition thereof. Also, whom hath power to iudge of the end, hath also power to iudge of things ordained to the end; for the consideration of the things ordained to the end resteth of the end. When therefore the bodie is ordained for the life and soule, and temporall things for spirituall, as to the end: the church which doth iudge of spirituall things, may in like manner iudge of temporall things. All which is sufficiently confirmed In extra. c. Iudicijs. Where it is fair, that the Ecclesiasticall followeth the nature of the principall, which appeareth sufficiently by example. For so much therefore as these two iurisdictions be compared to two lights, that is to say, to the Sunne and to the Moone, and all the whole clearenesse and brightnesse of the Moone both in forme and vertue, dependeth of the Sunne, and in the Sunne: And that the brightnesse of the Sunne is not of the Moone, or in the Moone, it is plaine, that spirituall iurisdiction (which is compared to the Sunne, hath in it both in forme and vertue, the iurisdiction temporall: and not contrarie. Manie other like reasons might be brought. But for that the time wareth short, I will omit them.

Secondly, I proue it by the ciuill law. Auth. Desse. Iud. ¶ Si tamen ix. col. where it is said, If a secular iudge be despersed, let the bishop of the citie be ioyned vnto him. But if hee be negligent, then let the whole iudgement be referred to the bishop. In like sort Theodosius the emperour enacted such a law, that whatsoeuer suter being plaintiffe in any kind of matter, whether at the beginning thereof, or after contestation of lain, or when the matter came to confirmation, or to sentence: if the plaintiffe had once chosen the court and iurisdiction of the holy se; there without all doubt, though the defendant resisted and diliented, the matter before the bishops and other ecclesiasticall iudges should bee determined and ended. Which law afterward Carolus the great, who was king of France, confirmed in these words: Wee will and command that all our subiects, as well Romans and Frenchmen, as others vnder our dominion whatsoeuer, bee by law and custome henceforth bound and charged to keepe this for a perpetuall and prescript law: That whosoeuer began or commenced a sute, &c. as is aboue mentioned, &c. 11. quæst. 1. Quicunque, &c. 2. But you may obiect and say, that this law is abrogated, as the Clossе seemeth there to touch. But all will not serue: For although this law is not reuoked into the bodie of the law, yet for all that it is not abrogated. But surely it is a priuiledge honorable granted to the whole vniuersall church, which the emperour cannot take away no more then any other liberties of the church. By the canon law also this priuiledge is confirmed, extra. de iud. c. timor Nouit. and moreouer seemeth to be confirmed by the ciuill law, C. de sacrof. Si quis presbyterum, ecclesiasticum. although it be not expressely, but generally named. And so it is cleare by the ciuill law, that such iurisdiction doth pertaine to ecclesiasticall persons. By canon law in like manner in places infinite: Distinct. 22. cap. Omnes Patriarchæ. 2. quæst. 5. cap. Si quis presbyter. 11. quæst. 1. cap. relatum. 25. distinct. cap. ecce. Extra de iudicijs. Nouit. De competenti foro. cap. licet. With many other places infinit; yea and further the canon law so farre proceedeth, that whatsoeuer goeth about by custome to interrupt or hinder any thing such iurisdiction, incurreth sentence (ipso facto) of excommunication, as is proued cap. quoniam intelleximus de immunitate eccle. lib. sext. Which is most plaine by the notorious custome, time out of mind, in the daies of the good and christian princes, where to violate such custome, it is plaine sacriledge: 11. quæst. 1. tit. 1. &c. 2. For by law, custome winneth and gaineth iurisdiction, especially to him that is Capax thereof: yea and further, custome (time out of mind) is a meanes all persons in place of written and constituted law. Now seeing the church of France, hath in common vsed with the temporalitie to iudge and decide both of actions personall and reall touching the church: it is plaine, that such custome winneth iurisdiction to it. Ergo, &c. But the lord Peter auouched, that the custome could not preuaile in this case, because here lacked true dealing. Besides, the lord lain is called inpossessible; for that it is lus fisci. But this maketh nothing against vs. For the church of France rather challengeth this law by custome, then by prescription. Which custome seemeth rather to be brought in of the free will and election of the people, frequenting more the ecclesiasticall Consistories, then the secular courts. Besides this, custome in that it hath been oftentimes decided in iudgement contradictorie, (many of the barons dilenting, and not consenting thereunto) is much thereby confirmed. This custome I say of the church, hath been fast established by the consent and assent of the prelats, and then confirmed by the kings of France your predecessours, and so peaceable obserued of the church.

And yet may the church challenge this by prescription; For that there are but three things which are required in prescription: that is to say, title, true dealing, and continuance of time. And it is without doubt that the churches hath purely haue, and in time past had a good title, as appeareth by the priuiledge granted of Theodosius the emperour, and confirmed by Charles, who gaue in commandement, to keepe the same inuiolable; which title it hath both by diuine, naturall, and humane law, as before is mentioned. Wherefore it must needs haue true dealing, when so many great and cleare titles are knowne to condescend thereunto. Also there concurreth such continuance of time, that euen against lus fisci, it is prescriptible. For it hath not only continued by the space of 100. yeares, but also more then six hundred yeares last past. Neither is this allwaies true, that this lain is impe scriptible, especially of the church; the which in as much as it appertaineth to the spiritualtie, is not subiect to the king, but is much more noble, and far excelleth: Euen no lesse then the Sunne doth the Mone, gold, lead, and heauen, the earth. And this is certaine, and no lesse reason, that the higher and equall may duely prescribe lain against him, that is either equall or lower in degree. As one king may do to another. Wherefore it appeareth, that the church may prescribe this, although it were lus fisci, as indeed it is not.

Finally, this is proued by priuiledge granted by Carolus the great king of France, as before, and by Ludouike the second, and by Philip your vncle, and Ludouike and Philip your kinsmen, which priuiledges we haue here readie to shew. But perhaps you will say, that these things cannot agree: that the church hath this iurisdiction, both by law, custome, and priuiledge, which all cannot well hang together. For if the church haue it by one of these, it should follow that the church lacketh it by another. But this may I answere two manner of wayes: First, that the priuiledge may be double, one as a confirmation of a new law, and thus it cannot be reconciled: the other as a confirmatiue and declarative of the old law; and this way it may well be agreed: which distinction may also take place in custome. Wherefore it may thus be answered, that although this iurisdiction is due vnto the church by law, it appertaineth also vnto the same by priuiledge and custome; but yet not by both kinds of custome and priuiledge, which indeede a new lain; but which declareth and confirmeth the old law. And if any will replie, demanding wherefore the church of France should more challenge this, then any other churches in other realmes, which haue no such prerogatiue: I can soone answere them. If the kings of France (whom God with singular grace, honor, and priuiledge, farre aboue all other princes, hath blessed and indued them for three speciall causes, to wit, for their great faith and deuotion vnto God, for their honor and reuerence to the church, and for their good iustice thrived vnto the people) haue granted to the church speciall liberties, or haue permitted those which before were granted, peaceably to bee kept and obserued: why then they should haue them, it is no marueil. Yea and further, their deuotion vnto the church hath been such, that the neerer the churches were vnto them, the more liberties they enioyed: and yet had these princes neuer themselfe, therefore, but rather the more: which is cuident, and redoundeth to the great honour and nobilitie both of the king, and his realme.

I haue oftentimes heard of other, how that Saint Lewis fiue things doe especially nobilitate and aduance this realme.

Firstly, their sincere and inuiolable faith: for it was at no time read, that the kings of France (since the receiuing of the faith) did euer swarue from the same.

Secondly, the nobilitie of blood which descended from Priamus the king of the Troians, and succeslively from Carolus and other royall kings.

Thirdly, the vnitie and peace of concord, which especially alone all other reigned and flourished in the realme of France.

Fourthlie, the solemnitie and pompe of the prelats and clergie.

Fiftly, the good disposed readinesse of the barons and subiects to obey.

If therefore the prelats of this realme should not haue this law and priuiledge, but should be deprined thereof: then should the king and his realme lose one of his noble estates, whereby they are highly magnified (I meane the kinarie, sollemnitie, and royalitie of the prelats). For then, they should not only bee neither pompous nor royall, but more beggerlie and miserable then any other, the most part of their liuing consisting herein. I doe conclude therefore, to bee proued both by diuine law, naturall law, canon law, ciuill law, custome and priuiledge; that the right of determining such temporall matters of the church, map of right appertaine to the church of France: so I returne the lord Peters reason against himselfe. Besides this, will I propound that whic is most plaine and manifest: that whatsoeuer things be offered vp to the church, and are conuerted to the dominion and propertie of the same, bee Gods and appertaine to him: for so much as they are said, to be dedicated and sanctified by him, as sufficiently throughout the Leuites map appeare: as is declared in the 21. cap. 1. regum, concerning the bread offered to God, where it is said: I haue no common bread vnder my hands to eate, but holy bread. Wherefore, it was not lawfull for the laitie to eate of the same bread, but in time of great necessitie: which is also proued in Daniel the fifth chap. where it is read: Because king Balthazar and his lords with his queene, dranke in the golden and siluer vessels, which his father Nabuchodonoser had taken out of the temple of Jerusalem; in the same verie houre there appeared fingers as it had been of a mans hand, writing right ouer the candlestickе vpon the plaine wall in the kings palace: And the king saw the palme of the hand that wrote, and that which was written was Mane, Thecel, Phares: the interpretation whereof is this, as there it appereth: Mane, God hath numbred this kingdome and brought it to an end: Thecel, thou art weighed in a balance and art found to light: Phares, thy kingdome is dealt in parts, and giuen to the Medes and Perses. The verie selfesame night was Balthazar the king of the Caldes slaine, and Darius succeeded in the kingdome of the Medes: the Monarchie of the Assirians being then translated vnto the Medes. Whereby it appeareth, that these things which are offered vp to the church, belong to God, and so dedicated to him, that no lay man may vse them: which if they doe, they must looke to receiue vengeance at Gods hand, as Balthazar did. These things noin ended, I will argue out the lord Peters theme (which was) Giue vnto the emperour, that is the emperours, and vnto God, that is Gods. But this iurisdiction, which (as I proued before) is directlie conuerted to the dominion and propertie of the French church, is noto Gods; and therefore to be reserued to and by him. Wherefore, whensoeuer anie goeth about to take away the same: the god and godly ought to answere

The king is to be honoured. Double honour. Alteration breedeth discord. A dreaming fable. 331

Ambrose in case where as Ambrose did to the Gothen souldiers sent to him by the emperour, which was to this effect: If the emperour (quoth he) had requested that which had been mine, I would not haue denied him, albeit that whatsoeuer I haue, all is the popes: But because he demanded those things which belong to God (wherein hee hath no right or interest) I had rather hee should imprison mee, yea and cut off my head, then to condescend to his request therein: alluding to the historie of Nabaoth, which is to be seene in the 21. chapter, 3. Reg. How Nabaoth the holy man, possessor of his vineyard, was requested by the king to giue by his vineyard: who made answer, I will not giue vnto thee the inheritance of my fathers: at which answere the king was maruellouslie offended: wherefore (quoth Ambrose) if Nabaoth would not deliuer his vineyard, shall ine deliuer to you the Church of Christ? No, God forbid that I should deliuer you Christs heritage. Nabaoth did not deliuer the vineyard, no? surely will I deliuer Christs Church. And further he addeth a good saying: I can neither diminish, no? adde any thing to the church of God, for that I take not vpon me the charge of keeping it: besides this, it is my duetie and office to consult with the high emperour of saluation, in this matter what is to bee done: and doubtlesse I may not deliuer any thing to him, no? yet bee receiue any thing of me, as is proued 24. quæstione vltimo capite conuenior. qui. Wherefore by these and the like reasons it appeareth, that not anelie iurisdiction spirituall (as the Lord Peter saidie hath suggested) doth belong to God: but also, all other kind of iurisdiction whatsoeuer touching the Church: whether it be by law, custome, or priuiledge: inasmuch that neither may wee surrender the same to any, no? yet may the king at our hands take the same. Further the Lord Peter affirmed, that Christ for example sake did pay tribute, which is untrue, as appeareth in Genesis the foztie eight chapter. For the land of priests were free from paying of all kind of toll and tribute. And if the lord Peter well considered the seuenteenth of Matthew, hee should haue found there, how that Christ did not only pay tribute for example sake: but rather prooued, how hee was not bound to pay any at all. To conclude therefore, the children be free: but pay, to auoid slander and offence: wherefore the text saith: Lest wee should offend them, goe to the sea, &c. But peraduenture it may bee answered, that by the example of Christ (to auoid offence) wee ought to pay. But this is untrue, because there is double offence of the weaklings and of the Pharisies: for as concerning the offence of the weaklings, which commonly of ignorance was not of malice, some things are bee omitted for a time, while they bee instructed: as the Apostle saith to the Romans in the fourteenth chap. But for the offence of the Pharisies, which commit and offend of a pretensed malice; there is nothing to be omitted, as Christ saith in Matthew 16. Where to his disciples saying: Doo you not know how that the Pharisies hearing this word are offended? answered: Behold, suffer them, they are blind, and leaders of the blind: For that in the time of Christ, the offence then was of verie malice. But now in the absence of the Pharisies? Wherefore, then it was not to be paid for auoiding of offence: but now not so. Now therefore it is apparant that the third token of the feare of God consisteth in the whole true reckoning of goods: And of him, which hath such feare: whereby he refraid to God his owne, it is spoken of in Eccle. 15. chap. The seed of the man that feareth God shall bee brought to honour: but the seed which transgresseth the commandement of the Lord shall be shamed. And thus it is fully appeareth, how louing feare and obedience is due vnto God, for the excellencie of his maiestie: because the words be: Feare God.

Secondly I doe say, that especiall honor and reuerence is due vnto the king, for his dignitie sake: which followeth in the theame. Now if it is said, Honour the king. I will alleage the 10. of Ecclesiast. where it is specified: In the middest of the brethren, the ruler is holden in honour among them. Wherefore it seemeth to me, y there are 2. kinds of honors, one which proceedeth from the lips, and that is named flatterie, wherof it is spoken in Matth. the 17. chap. This people doth honour me with their lips, but their hearts are farre from mee. There is another kind of honour which is real, and commeth from the heart. And this is the very true honor indeed, wherewith the king ought to be honored. But me thinketh that he doth really, and de facto in very deed honor the king: which willeth and counselleth him, to keepe and do these things, whereby his dominion is beloued, his royalty not diminished, his honor and fame preserued, and his conscience not burthened: and he that perswadeth him contrary to these, I thinke doth not honor the king. To proceed therefore further: I say first, that he doth de facto honor the king, who perswadeth him those things, whereby he may be beloued of his subiects. For a prince ought to studie rather to be beloued, then feared. And what more greater treasure can a prince wish, then to haue the hearts of his subiects? According to the saying of Seneca: The loue of the citizens, is a fortresse inuincible, and a bulwarke not saitable. What thing is more to be wished for? what better then to liue and raigne, euery man willing and reioycing therefore? And in my opinion, there is nothing which causeth more a prince to bee beloued, then if hee keepe and maintaine his ancient liberties, and bring into alteration: Wherefore it is said in the 22. chapter of Deu. Thou shalt not remoue the land markes, which thy forefathers haue set. This place the Lord Peter alleaged to make for his purpose: which I will proue to make against him, and that by this reason, he ought not to transgresse the old limites and bounds which the fathers haue set: For mouttie and alteration doth ingender discord. And for this cause in making of new alterations there ought to be both cuident vtilitie, and vrgent necessitie. If therefore the prince will abrogate and take away the liberties granted by his forefathers and predecessours: he shall not be of his Realme beloued, as it appeareth by Roboam in the 11. chapter of the 3. Reg. All which likewise is to be seene in the Chronicles, how that by these meanes many kingdomes and dominions were translated from nation to nation, and from their owne native regiment to the rule of strange people. And now for this time certaine it is, that your grand predecessors Charles the great, Saint Ludouich, Philip the faire, Ludouich and Philip his sonnes, with many others, haue sealed and confirmed this liberrie of the Church. Wherefore for a man to counsell and persuade your highnesse to spoile the Church of any thing: it is euen the next way to spoile and vndoe your selfe, and to bereaue you of that, by which your dominion is beloued. And so for this cause I thought good to put your grace in remembrance of the 20. of Matthew, where it is written: Remember the workes of your forefathers, which they haue done in their generations, and you shall receiue great glorie and renowme for euer. Note heere your highnesse by the way, how that king Philip grandfather to Saint Lewis, suffered and kept in his realme Saint Thomas archbishop of Canturburie: who for that he did stoutly defend the liberties of his Church, was banished out of England. How much more therefore are you bound to defend and maintaine your owne prelates, in their liberties ratified and confirmed by your graces predecessors, according to the saying of Gregorie in 25. quæst. cap. Si. If I should destroy and pull downe those things which my predecessours haue built and ordained, I should not bee called a builder and maker, but iustlie accounted a stroy god and puller downe, as the voice of the Lord saith: Euerie kingdome diuided within it selfe shall bee confounded: All knowledge and learning diuided one against the other, shall bee destroyed: In another place he saith: It is ouer sharpe, and against all good manner and ciuilitie (vpon what reason and excuse so euer) to breake and subuert those things which are well ordained: or by his example, to teach others at their pleasures to subuert old constitutions. Marke here a storie about a castle which was giuen to Saint Remige, to the Churches vse, by Clodouy the king, which afterward king Pipine desired to haue by exchange and recouerie. To whom the said Saint Remige appeared in his dreame, and highly blamed him therefore, saying: A better man then thou gaue it mee, and yet wilt thou take it away from me? And with that hee smote him, who the next day was all blacke. Since which time, no king of France durst euer lie in that Castle. Verily therefore he doth not honour the king, which goeth him counsell to passe the old limits that his old fathers did set. Yea rather the kings maiestie ought to say vnto them, which is written in Saint John eighth chapter; I do honour and glorifie my Father; that is, in keeping the liberties of the Church, as they did which granted them: but you haue dishonoured mee, in counselling mee that, which seemeth best to please your selues, as it is written in Ecclesiast. 4: The worship of a mans father is his owne worship, and where the father is without honor, it is the dishonour of the sonne.

Secondly I say, that hee truelie doth honour the king, who counselleth him: whereby his power and dignitie is not diminished. For as it is great honour to the kings highnesse to encrease and augment his power: so is it as much dishonour for him to diminish any iot thereof. And therefore, the Emperours were wont to call themselues vicarious, of augmenting and encreasing their common wealth. And to say that you and your predecessors could not grant these things to the Church, it were to so absurd, and to the so much derogation of your Maiesties most honorable estate. And therefore you (most soueraigne Lord) who hold and possesse so ample right and title in the realme of France, both by elexion and inheritance; not to grant and leaue this to your posteritie, it were to the great debasing of your maiesties honour, crowne and dignitie. Yea if it were, as God forbid it would follow, that your predecessors lived continuallie in sinne: yea and further, if it were as much to say (which were to vile) that blessed S. Lewis, by whom all France is beautified could not be fully canonized.

For as the Lord scaler declared, if he take his oth at his coronation both to alienate nothing, and also to call in that which was before alienated, which is inseparable from the crowne: it should follow that he was forsworne, and consequently committed deadly sin, so could neuer be canonized, which is to too absurd to bee talked of. And if replie be made, that he might haue repented: It is soone to be answered: That his sinne is read of, but of his repentance it is not found, as it is said of Salemon

Thirdly, I doe affirme, that hee rightfullie honoreth the king, which perſwadeth him that, whereby his honor and renowne is preſerued. For in matters of weight, and of great importance, next after conſcience wee muſt haue regard to name and fame, as it is written in the 22. of Prou. It is better to haue a good name, then riches. A good name farre paſſeth all things, and is about ſilver and gold. And Saint Auguſtine ſaith, two things are neceſſarie for the, conſcience and name: Conſcience for God, and name for thy neighbour. And therefore it is written in the 4. chapt. of Eccle. Labour to get a good name, for that will continue further then the, then a great treaſures of gold. A good life hath a number of daies. Which renowne and name, the Lord (who annointed your grace with the oile of gladneſſe) hath in ſo little time more abundantlie bleſſed you withall, then any other prince; wherefore you ought to be more diligent and carefull, how to keepe and enioy the ſame ſtill: For it is no leſſe vertue, to keepe that which is gotten, then to get and get: whereby not onely while you liue, but alſo when you are dead, your glorious renowne may liue for euer: yea and farther, that by you nothing be done, whereby any blot or foile ſhould creep into that your ſo great renowne: alluding that to your grace, which is ſaid in the tenth of the Prouerbs, &c. The memorial of the iuſt ſhall haue good report, &c. Beware therefore moſt noble prince, and take heed that in your daies and time, the liberties of the Church bee not taken away (which God forbid) or diminiſhed in any iot. For if your glorious name ſhould be blotted therewith, there be thouſands, which would chronicle the ſame to perpetuall memorie. Wherefore moſt Chriſtian prince, if ſuch (as truſted after their death to no other life, but onelie for fame and renowne) liued a life moſt godly and vertuous: how much more ought we Chriſtians, which looke after another life, by our well doings here, to win vs a perpetuall name and memorie after our death? And you beſides, if you ſhould diſhonour your name and fame; that a matter were it for conſecrating vnto the kings of France, were euer counted the moſt chriſtian princes, and moſt bountifull towards the Church, giuing examples to other princes, how to enrich their churches and liberties therof. And now eſpecialie, if your grace, the church in ſome places being in great perſecution (which God forbid) ſhould ſhew light to other to pull and take away that which was giuen by your forefathers to the Church; what might the world ſay? For then by the like reaſon, might the Emperour beginne the church of all, which was giuen to it by Conſtantine the emperour. Alſo other kings would doe the like in their realmes. God forbid that your highneſſe ſhould giue ſuch example. And for my part, I would rather with my ſelfe to bee dead, then giue you ſuch counſell, that in ſo pernicious and naughtie a matter, you ſhould bee example to other: eſpecialie, when the kings of France your predeceſſors, were defenders alwaies againſt ſuch as ſeint about to take away the liberties from the church which is the office of a king. Hieronymus ſaith vpon Jeremie, which is found alſo in the 24. quæſt. 5. cap. Regnum & Cæſar. princeps, after this manner: Let the princes of the world know and vnderſtand, how they are bound to make an account to God for the church which they take vpon them to keep. Note you alſo, and reade ſome examples out of ſtories and Commentaries, what regard the kings of France had in obſerving thoſe things; and ſee you by their example, to follow and doe the like: and then ſhall it bee verified in your grace, which is written in the 27. chapter of Eccle. A wiſe man ſhall obtaine honour amongſt his people: As alſo in the third of the ſame: He that honoureth his mother, is like one that gathereth treaſure together.

24. q. 1. cap. Regnum.

Eccleſ. 27. Eccleſi. 3.

Fourthly I ſay, that he indeed doth honour the king, which perſwadeth him to doe that whereby his conſcience is not hurt. For aboue all things a Chriſtian man ought to behaue boldly to doe that thing, which ſhould bee a grudge vnto his conſcience, becauſe the life is more then is meat: Pſal. 6. chap. And aſſuredlie I beleeue, that your grace would not commit that thing willingly, wherewith your conſcience ſhould bee burdened, for all the worlds good: and that iuſtlie. For the more miraculouſlie God hath called your highneſſe to ſ ſtate of a K. and hath endued you with his grace: ſo much the more care ought you to haue, and take heed that you offend him not. For is it to be doubted, whether in doing the contrary, hee will not bee the more grieuouſlie diſpleaſed with you, as he was with Saul, 1. Kaing. chap. 15. Conſider therefore moſt ſouereigne Lord, that at that time you were crowned, you ſware onelie theſe things following, and no other. Firſt, that you would defend and maintaine the canonical law, priuiledge and iuſtice, granted to the biſhops and the church: and as much as in you did lie, to enlarge and amplifie the ſame. Alſo that by your arbitrement, all chriſtian people at all times ſhould keepe the true peace of God and his Church. Alſo that you ſhould forbid to all nations, all kind of ſacrileges, ſpoilings, and iniquities. Alſo that in all kind of iudgements, you ſhould will and command equitie and mercie. Alſo that throughout your whole territorie and iuriſdiction, you ſhould ſtrenctly with all your endeuour, labor to exterminate and cut off from the Church, the noted heretickes: which all, and no other, your maieſtie ſware to fulfill, at the time of your Coronation: vnder the leaue and correction of the Lord Peter, which affirmed you were ſworne to none other thing beſides. Now therefore, ſeeing it is a canonicall priuiledge of the Church, and in the heart of the whole Cano. 6. qu. 1. Quicunque item habens, incorporate: when alſo by cuſtome which is canonicall, it came in, that the church and ſpiritualtie, may haue cognition in a number of caſes, againſt which diuers articles haue been here laid in: If this amongſt the laitie ſhould not bee obſerued in the church, your graces conſcience thereby might ſomewhat bee burdened. In like manner, if you be bound with all your whole might and power to procure, that all whole Chriſtendome ſhould keepe the true peace of God and his church: much more haue you to procure the ſame amongſt your owne Barons and people, who euermore were all one with the Church. And alwaies where any Church was in honor and eſtimation, there were belonging to it, twentie ſtout barons and knights: whoſe office, as it was to defend the Church, ſo was it the part of the Church to pray for them, and to offer ſacrifice for them vnto God. And to this end, that bleſſed S. Ieroes ſo much laboured in his time, who when the greateſt barons of his realme had conſpired to ſuppreſſe theſe liberties of the Church, and had conſulted to giue him (to that end) the hundreth part of their goods, would neuer condeſcend thereunto, but alwaies diſſwaded them therefrom: and finallie by his authoritie, ſtaied and confirmed theſe liberties of the Church. Conſider heere your maieſtie, how that pope Innocentius at that time proceeded againſt thoſe Barons, &c. I dare be bold to ſay, that if there ſhould be now diſſention betweene the prelates and barons: it would not bee long before the communaltie would ſeeke to rule and beare domination. As by experience it hath been ſeene in many places, and likewiſe by practiſe wee of late time might haue ſeene: at what time the people Romaking the ſpiritualty in the parts of Campania and Burgundie, at laſt role and made inuaſion, and followed a long ſuite therwith all cauſed the officers which brought citations and abſolutions, from the pope and other, to be well banged: and not long after, made inſurrection againſt the lords temporall, and ſerued them with the like ſauce: inaſmuch that by the kings power they were ſuppreſſed, & many of them hanged. And this doubtleſſe was in the dateſe of K. Lewes laſt king of that name. Truelie the noble men ought not to be grieued with that that the Church it ſelfe hath warrantie for. For that there be ſeiſin of them, who haue not their brothers and kinſfolks, which line and are maintained by the goods and reuenues of the Church. Amongſt whom if they ſhould diuide their inheritance, perhaps they would bring a little to nothing at all. Let the barons aſſo conſider how that there are but few, which beleeue not in the church. For the Church is one, as in the ſet of Canticum: By whom and by earthing is one. Wherefore without great perill of tranſgreſſion can they not perſwade and counſell ſuch liberties of the church to be abrogated and taken away.

The oth of the French kings.

Arg. by the peſſeſſions of the church many brethren and kinſmen of the nobles be maintained.

Ergo, ſuch poſſeſſions are not to be grudged at.

To beleeue in the Church, is not in our faith.

That therefore your Maieſties conſcience may remaine pure and immaculate: pleaſeth it your highneſſe by your authoritie, to ſeale and confirme this good ancient and Canonicall priuiledge. And contrary attempts, (if any be made by ſoap of proclamation or otherwiſe) to reuoke and call them in. And further, to keepe your mother the church of France in her ancient franke choice, libertie, and cuſtoms. And then by you in all things God ſhall bee glorified and honoured: to whom be honour and glorie for euer and euer, Amen. Who then will honour you, as is ſaid, 1. Reg. 2. Whoſoeuer ſhall honor me, I will crowne him with that glorie, in which conſiſteth the true honor, and is granted to none vnworthie. Whereunto alſo none is admitted but worthie, as bleſſed Saint Auſten ſaith: which honor, grant he vnto you and his, who eſtabliſhed world without end, Amen. And becauſe a bill of many articles was exhibited, wherein part did infringe the whole eccleſiaſticall iuriſdiction: to the defence therof, we will according to the fourth chapter of Eccleſiaſticus ſtand euen to the death. Where it is ſaid: For the truth ſtriue thou vnto death, and God ſhall fight for the againſt thine enemies. Some other of them containe onely abuſe, which we beleeue none ſuch to be. But if there be, we will ſee redreſſe therein. Therefore for the honour of God, for the vnburdening of our conſciences, for the kings maieſties reuerence, and for the peoples profit and peace: All ſuch here aſſembled, haue concluded to ſee remedie, that the aforeſaid abuſes, if any ſuch be, ſhall be left, to the quietneſſe of the people, and praiſe of almightie God. To whom be honor and glorie world without end, Amen.

the prelats aſſembled themſelues againe together at the kings palace in Paris, where the reuerend father the lord Peter Bertrand, by Gods permiſſion biſhop of Eduen, ſpake openly there before the king, ſitting with his counſellors and Barons about him: taking to his theame that which is written in the 18. of Geneſis, O Lord be not angrie, that I ſpeake yet more, &c. The which he applied to this end: that for the maieſty of the king, the prudencie of his counſell, and inſufficiencie of himſelfe (conſidering the weightines of the cauſe) hee trembled and was afraid to ſpeake: yet neuertheleſſe, truſting vpon his accuſtomed clemencie, take to him audacity, and preſumed that which was appointed to him by the prelats. Beginning with the 89. pſalme: Lord thou art our refuge, &c. Which hee proſecuted in extolling the king his perſon, and his miraculous attaining to the crowne of France: preaching further, how he ought to be the champion and defender of the faith: all which he proued in few words by many reaſons and authorities. Afterward, he touched thoſe propoſitions which were propounded by the foreſaid lord Peter of Cugner, and for no other only cauſe as he proteſted, but to inſome the conſcience of our ſouereigne lord and king, and to aduiſe his grace concerning the ſame: for going about to make any finall iudgement, determination, or anſwer, whereby either ſentence, order, ſtatute, right to any man, or other proceſſe, might thereof enſue or bee grounded. And namelie he firſt beginning with the theame of the lord Peter: firſt affirmed (render vnto the Emperour, which is the Emperours, and vnto God which is his; Mark. 12.) By which words was ſignified the obedience and ſubiection to the king, with the difference of the ſpirituaitie from the temporaltie: whereof the firſt member is prooued by the 1. Peter 2. Sext. Decretal. cap. 22 verum. Shauing of clerks crowns abhorred, 22. quæst. 2.

elite. And besides his other reasons he alleaged the 86. dist. declaring for a truth, that for this intent first the clerkes crowns were shauen; in signe that they should be free from all worldlinesse, and forsake all temporall things. Alleaging to that end the 12. q. 2. Furthermore hee declared, that the bishops had cognition in certaine cases expressed by law. Wherefore, these said causes, mainteined a certaine rule against them, alleaging for the proofe thereof, De reg. iuris ff. de lega. 2. L. licie textoris. Also hee affirmed, that by reason of sinne, the decretall Nouit could not make for them. For the same did speake of the king of France his state, which hath no superiour: but in other persons it was (hee said) otherwise. And these things thus leaning pleased, then said hee, and concluded: That neuertheless, their lord and king was ready to heare the information of them, which would instruct him of any custome: and those customes which were good and reasonable hee would obserue. Which answer, because it did not seeme to please and suffice the prelates, incontinently the bishop Eduen answered for them all in manner following: First, commending the good and generall answer, he spake in this wise: The prince of the people (said he) shall be praised, for the prudence of his tallie, commending therewith as touching the former good generall answer of the king, his purpose and talke propounded. But as concerning the words of the lord Peter, which engendred and brought darknesse and obscuritie, and might giue occasion to their temporall lords, to breake and infringe the rites and customes of the church: Wherefore his answer seemed not full and plaine to the prelats. Speaking moreouer to the said Peter, he alluded to the words of the Virgin speaking in the Scripture thus to her sonne: Sonne why did you so to vs? And so proceeded to the same, both marueiling with himselfe, and yet couertly complaining of his answere. Afterward answering to those things which the lord Peter affirmed, and first to the chapter, Aduerum, he said, that it was before answered, touching the diuision of the two iurisdictions, that they may be in one subiect as before is proued. Neither doth let it which the lord Peter said, these two iurisdictions could not be in one subiect, because that things which be in themselues diuers, and be vnder one Genus, as a man and an asse, cannot bee in one subiect. But if they were vnder diuers kinds, as whitenesse and sweetnesse in milke, they might be well in one subiect. It was answered, that this rule was not true: because iustice and temperance are two diuers vertues, and vnder one kind, and yet be in one subiect. Besides these differing species, a man and an asse be not compatible in one subiect. Also to that which was spoken concerning the shauing of the crowne, it was answered, that the crowne did betoken rule and excellencie: and the shauing did signifie, that they ought not to heape vp store of temporall things, so to applie their hearts thereunto. But that the temporall things ought to be subiect to them, and not they to the temporalitie, as is proued in the said chapter, duo sunt genera. Also as concerning the thing, which was talked of de regula: he answereth, that this maketh for the church, as before was proued: yea also, the custome doth make the rule for the church. Also laws in all kind of sense doe alwaies except the custome. And therefore, his saying makes nothing against it. And now to that place which the lord Peter spake about the decretall Nouit. That the case was onely in the kings person, yet for all that it is expressly said in the same text of euery christian man. And although their law doth speake onelie of the pope, yet the same is applied to all bishops in their dioces. Wherefore the said bishop concluded and beseeched the king that it would please his grace to giue vnto them a more plaine and more constable answere: and that they might not depart from his presence all pensiue and sad, whereby occasion might be giuen to the laitie to impugne the rites and liberties of the church. And that they doubted nothing hereof in the goodnature and conscience of their sourraigne lord and king. In the end it was answered to them in the behalfe of the king, that his mind and intent was not to impugne the customes of the church.

The bishop of Elie doth furre with the king as an Asse.

The gentle answere of the king to the bishops.

The Sunday following the bishops assembled themselues againe before the king at Vicenas, where the lord bishop of Eduen repeated their last supposition, with the last answer made vnto them in the behalfe by the king, when the bishop of Yorke had giuen them to vnderstand how the king willed them not to feare: For that they should suffer no hinderance or damage in his time, yea and would defend them in their rights and customes, because it should not be said that he would giue example to others to impugne the church, adiuring them, that euen the kings grace him willed to declare vnto them. The said lord bishop of Senon in the name of the whole prelates gaue humble thankes to the king therefore, and the said bishop of Senon beseeched that such proclamations which were made to the preiudice of the ecclesiasticall iurisdiction, might be repealed, and called in. Hereunto the king himselfe answereth with his owne mouth, that they were not published at his commandement, neither did hee know of this, nor ratifie them. Thirdly, the bishop proposeth that those abuses which the temporalitie complained of, should be so ordered and reformed, that euery man should bee well contented therewith. Last of all, he beseeched the kings highnes, that he would of his gracious goodnesse giue them a more comfortable and fuller answer. Then answered the lord Peter in the name of the king: That if the prelats and bishops would sir reformation of those things which were to be amended (there abouts he would take respite betweene this and Christmas next following) his grace would ianonate nothing in the meane season. And if in the foresaid space they would not correct and reforme that which was amisse, his maiestie would appoint such order and remedie, that should be acceptable both to God and his subiects. After this, the prelats had leaue of the king to depart and went home.

The finall answers of the king to the prelates.

A briefe recapitulation of the bishops answere, with certaine notes answering to his popish reasons vnto the reader.

Notes vpon the bishops discourse, pag. 330. col. 2.

THe answer of bishop Eduen in the name of the other prelats, to the oration and articles before obiected by the lord Peter, consisteth in two parts. First, in declaring the feare due to God. Secondly, the honour due to the king. Whereof the first is, the feare of God (he saith) consisteth in three things. 1. In giuing to God. 2. In honouring his ministers. 3. In reforming that which hath been taken away, &c. The 2. which is, the honouring of the king, he saith, consisteth in a double sort, that is: In words only, wherein is flatterie: And in deed: which he diuideth into 4. members: First, when a man counselleth a king to that whereby his dominion his loued. 2. When the king is counselled to that whereby his honour and excellency is not diminished. 3. Thirdly, when the king is counselled to that, whereby his fame and renowne is maintained. 4. Fourthly, when a king is counselled to that, whereby his conscience is not wounded, &c. And this is the order of his whole tractation. Now remaineth with like breuitie to recite the reasons and arguments in order, whereby he proueth the premisses, with the subdiuision of euery member and part thereof. Wherein the studious reader may note both the subtile proceedings of these popish prelats, and also the feeble & impotent ground whereupon they build. Whose building (as by this discourse and many other may appeare) is vainly and finally tendeth to this, to maintaine their liberties, pompe, and estimation aboue all other secular princes and persons.

Pa. 327. col. 1.

First, as concerning feare to be giuen to God, which hee diuideth into three parts, in giuing, in honoring, and reforming: for the first, hee prooueth that princes ought to giue largelie and without measure to the church by these arguments.

Pa. 361. col. 2.

By the testimonie of Iustinian: Although nothing is good which is too much, yet, &c, pag. 327. col. 1. Answer, that in the time of Iustinian, goods then giuen to the church, were the goods of the poore. Wherein was vsed faithfull distribution, voluntarie giuing, and necessarie charitie. But now in our popish churches, reuenues and lands giuen, neither are distributed to the poore: and yet are men compelled against their will to giue still. And againe, so little necessitie is now to giue to such, that the most wealth of realmes almost is in their hands and houses: insomuch that they flowing in such wealth, are now woxen so proud, that kings can scarse beare any rule for them, as was prooued before, pag. 320. col. 1. that the popes reuenues heres in England, mounted to more then three times double the stint of the kings crowne. Wherefore by the counsell of Iustinian, it was so then, and then might stand, quod Religio peperit diuitias: But now as the time is altered, so that counsell holdeth not, postquam nunc filia deuorauit matrem: That is, after that the daughter hath deuoured the mother. Finally concerning mens giuing to the church in these our popish daies, foure faults I note.

Religio peperit diuitias: nunc filia deuorauit matrem.

First, that they giue superfluously more then sufficient is to necessitie of life.

Secondly, that they giue to such as abuse it wickedly.

Thirdly, that in giuing to them that need not, noble men in meane time defraud their poore neighbours, which need indeed, and yet doe not complaine.

4. Incommodities that come in giuing to the church.

Fourthly, because of this title of giuing, men haue vsed, and yet doe vse to put great hope of saluation therin, contrary to the testament of God in Christs death, wherof examples are before.

Pa. 327. col. 2.

Pag. 327. col. 2. Abel offered of the best to the Lord, and was blessed of God. Ergo, euery great man, that would be blessed of God, must offer of the best he hath vnto the church. Answere: This argument as it is farre fet: so it is soone answered, wherein three notes are to be obserued.

First, that he which offereth vnto the church of God, doth not therein offer vnto God immediatly as Abel did.

3. Things to be noted, in offering to God, & to the church.

Secondly, neither is this to be granted, that he which offereth to all churchmen, offereth by and by to the church of God. For many times the churchmen are one; and the church of God is another. Laurence the martyr, shewing forth the church of God, brought out the poore of the parish, and not of the priests of the church. pag. 65. col. 1.

Rom. 13.

The third note is this: that if noble persons should offer vnto God (by the example of Abel) that which is the best and fattest of the flocke: then should they offer vnto the Lord, of their flocke only, and not of their lands. Yea, and to note the very truth, they are taught thereby to offer to God, neither cattell nor lands, but that which is the very best, that is, their owne bodies for a liuely sacrifice to God. Hee that offereth vp to God a proud heart, and killed it with the axe of humilitie, giueth vnto him the best and fattest bullocke he hath in all his flocke. With like reason also I answer the place of Num. 18. and of Paral. cap. vlt. that to offer vp, or to separate vnto the Lords treasurie, is not now to giue to priests and chaplaines of the church, which peraduenture haue more then they doe well occupie: but to giue liberally to the communion of Saints, which are needy, and are the true treasury of the church indeed, as Laurence the true treasurer said, supra, pag. 65. col. 1.

Rom. 12.

Pa. 327. col. 2.

Pag. 327. col. 2. By Gods commandement wee are bound of duty to honour our temporall fathers. Ergo, by the same dutie wee are bound much rather to honour our spirituall fathers, that is, priests and prelates. Answer. A father in common speech is diuersly taken, as by age, by nature, by office. And to all these we of dutie, are bound to yeeld honour, reuerence, obedience, submission, albeit not all after one sort, nor in like degree. For as we are bound to honour our fathers and mothers: so aged men and elders haue also their honour and name of fathers: So Magistrates and spirituall teachers in their kind, haue their honour and reuerence. And saint Paul saith, that such are worthie of double honour, qui bene præsunt, & qui laborant in sermone. But in this two things are to bee noted, wherein this honour consisteth, and how farre it extendeth: These spirituall fathers of the church, thinke they bee not honoured enough, vnlesse kings and emperours giue and surrender vnto them all the temporall rule and gouernement, to doe what they list, and none to controll them. And vnlesse noble men and subiects indue them with temporall lands and possessions, so much as they would haue. And this they call honour, which they define onely by giuing temporally: where indeed it rather consisteth in giuing spiritually, as to haue a reuerent opinion of their ministration, to yeeld a prompt obedience to their doctrine, to reuerence them as the ministers of God, and not to despise, defame, or molest their persons, whereof saint Paul also about the same place speaketh, writing to Timothie: Let no man despise thy youth, &c. Also to Titus, Let no man despise thee, &c. And this is to honour our spirituall fathers.

1. Tim. 5. Two things to be noted in giuing honours, wherein consisteth honour giuing to priests.

1. Tim. v. Titus 2.

Qui bene præsunt.

Pa. 329. col. 2.

Secondly, to consider how far this honour extendeth: as no man doth deny, but these pastours are worthie their double honour, which rule well: so if they administer not their office well, they are vnder the ouersight of the king, bearing the temporall sword, worthie of double punishment. And yet to consider this double honor in them that rule well, how farre it doth extend: if it bee compared to the honour due to our parents, case of necessitie will soone decide it. For be it, that our parents, on the one side, and pastor of the other, stand in extreaine need of the somes supportation, wherein he can helpe but the one: nature, I suppose, will and ought sooner run, and the word of Christ will sooner driue vs to our father, then to the priests Corban. Mark. 7. So that this distinction here may haue place: that as the one standeth vpon merite of vertue, so the other standeth vpon mere dutie of necessitie.

How farre honour giuen to priests extendeth.

Mark 7.

Pa. 328. col. 1. These iurisdictions temporall and spirituall are compatible in one person. Answer. I grant pro ratione subiectis: That is, in the subiect it selfe there is no cause to the contrarie, but these vocations may bee exercised both of one person, as they haue bin of the pope, one after the other, (and so may contrary formes also) and yet the popes person hath been able to sustaine them both. But now here is to be considered not what the nature of the subiect is able to beare by Logicke, but what order is taken herein by the wil of God, whose order is this: That they, which with Peter are called to the feeding of the flocke, should leaue their fishing nets, and fish for men: and that they which labour in the warfare of the Lord, should not intangle themselues with the businesse of this life, whereby they may be more free to please him, whose souldiers they are: Tit. 2. &c.

Pa. 328. col. 1.

Pag. 328. col. 1. The iurisdictions temporall and spirituall are so distincted that they are not contrary, &c. Answer. And what let is there then, but our Queene now, and other kings hereafter may haue the gouernment of both states, as well Ecclesiasticall as temporall? Seeing both the formes being compatible, may concur both in one subiect: why not as well in the person of the king, within the realme, as in the person of the pope without the realme?

Tit. 2. Pa. 328. col. 1. Two formes not contrary may be compatible in one subiect.

Pa. 328. col. 2.

Pag. 328. col. 2. God after the creation of the world, &c. vnto Noes time, &c. Answer. If God vnto Noes time gouerned the world as king, gaue sentence himselfe against Cain (as wee say) how then did he that by the ministerie of angels? If he did it by the angels his ministers: whether is more like then that to make for the pope, or rather for kings and princes, whom the scripture thrice in one chapter calleth the ministers of God to execute punishment to him that doth euill, Rom. 13?

Pa. 328. col. 2. How was a priest, and high both in one, diuersus in the Arke.

Pag. 328. Noe also which offered, &c. Answer. If offering of burnt sacrifices to God doe make a priest, then was Caine also, Abel, Abraham, Isaac, and all patriarchs priests. If he had both temporall and spirituall iurisdiction vpon them, which were in his Arke: I maruell why he did not curse then the disobedient crow that returned not to him againe.

And thus much concerning French matters, which because they be Ecclesiasticall, and beare with some vtilitie to the diligent Reader (such as lift to search, note and obserue the acts of men, and course of religion) I thought therefore here to place and adiopne next after the other contention before proceeding betweene Philip the French king and pope Boniface. Albeit as touching the perfect keeping of peeres and time, I am not ignorant that this foresaid parliament thus summoned and commaunded against the French prelats, falling in the yeere of our Lord 1329. was to bee referred rather to the raigne of king Edward the second. Of whom now remaineth (by the grace of Christ) to order of histories to prosecute, declaring first the instructions and informations of his father giuen to him in the time of his nonrising. The yeere of our Lord 1307. and the last yeere of the king, the foresaid king Edward in his iourney marching toward Scotland, in the North fell sicke of the flire, which increased so feruently vpon him, that he despaired of life. Wherefore calling before him his earles and barons, he caused them to be sworne, that they should crowne his sonne Edward in such conuenient time after his death as they might, and keepe the land to his vse, till hee were crowned. That done, hee called before him his sonne Edward, informing and lessoning him with wholesome precepts, and charged him also with diuers points vpon his blessing: first that hee should bee curteous, gentle, vpright in iudgement, faire spoken to all men, constant in deede and word, familiar with the good: and especiallie to the miserable to bee mercifull. After this, hee gaue him also in charge, not to be too hastie in taking his crowne, before hee had reuenged his fathers iniuries stoutly against the Scots: but that hee should remaine remaine in those partes to take with him his fathers bones, being wel boyled from the fleth, and so inclosed in some fit vessel, should carrie them with him till he conquered all the Scots: saying, that so long as he had his fathers bones with him, none should ouercome him. Moreouer, he willed and required him, to loue his brother Thomas, and Edmund also: to cherish and tender his mother Margaret the Quéene. Ouer and besides, he straitlie charged him vpon his blessing (as he would auoide his curse) that he should in no case call to him againe, or send for Peter Gaueston: which Peter Gauestone the king before had banished the realme, for his naughtie and wicked familiaritie with his sonne Edward, and for his seducing of him with sinister counsell. For the which cause, hee banished both Peter Gauestone vtterly out of the realme, and also put the said Edward his sonne in prison. And therefore so straitlie charged his sonne, in no wise to send for this Gauestone, or to haue him in any case about him. And finallie, because hee had conceiued in himselfe a vow to haue returned in his owne person to the holy land (which for his manifold warres with the Scots he could not performe) therfore hee had prepared 32000 pounds of siluer, for the sending of certaine souldiers with his heart vnto the holy land. Which thing he required of his sonne to see accomplished. So that the foresaid monie, vnder his curse and malediction, be not employed to other vses. But these iniunctions and precepts, the disobedient sonne did nothing obserue or keepe after the decease of his father. Who forsaking and leauing off the warre with the Scots, with al speed hasted him to his coronation. Also, contrarie to the mind of his nobles, and against the precept of his father, hee sent for the foresaid Peter Gauestone, and prodigallie bestowed vpon himall that treasure which his father had bequested to the holy land. He was moreouer a proud despiser of his peres and nobles: and therefore reigned vnfortunately, as by the sequell of the storie here following, by the grace of Christ shall be declared. This king Edward first of that name, leauing behind him three sonnes, Thomas and Edmund by his third wife, and Edward by his first wife, whom he had sufficiently thus with precepts instructed, departed this mortall life, An. 1307. after hee had raigned neere 35. yeeres. Of whom this Epitaph was written:

The epitaph of king Edward.

Dum viguit rex, & valuit tua magna potestas,
Fraus latuit, pax magna fuit, regnauit honestas.

In the time and raigne of this king, many other things happened, which here I omit to speake of, as the long discord and strife betweene the prior of Canturburie, and the prior of Douer, which continued aboue foure yeres together: with much wrangling and vnquietnesse betweene them. Likewise an other like contention growing betweene Iohn Romain, archbishop of Yorke, and the archbishop of Canturburie vpon the occasion, that when Iohn archbishop of Yorke after his consecration returned from the pope, and comming to Douer, contrary to the inhibition of Canturbury, passed through the middle of Kent, with his crosse borne vp: although the Pope reporteth, that he had the kings consent thereunto: An. 1286.

Item, betweene Thomas bishop of Hereford, and Iohn Pecham archbi. of Cant. fell another wrangling matter, in the time of this king. Which bishop of Hereford appealing from the archb. to the pope, went vp to Rome, & in his iourney died. Whe with lette coste might haue tarried at home: 1282.

King Edward the second.

King Edward the second.

EDward the second of that name, and sonne of Edward the first, borne, as is aforesaid, at Carnaruan in Wales, after the departure of his father, entred the gouernment of the land, An. 1307. But was crowned not before the yeere next following, An. 1308. by reason of the absence of Rob. Winchelsie, who was banished by king Edward the first. Whereupon the king this present yeere writeth to the pope for the restitution of the said archb. for that by an ancient law of the realme, the coronation of the king could not otherwise proceed without the archb. of Cant. Which Edward as he was personable in bodie and outward shape, so in conditions and full disposition much deformed: As vnstedfast of word, and light to disclose secrets of great counsell: Also refusing the companie of his lords and men of honour; hee much haunted among villains and vile personages: Giuen moreouer, to ouermuch drinking, and such vices as thereupon bee wont to ensue. And as of his owne nature he was to the said vices disposed, so was he much worse by the counsell and familiaritie of certaine euill disposed persons, as first of Peter or Pierse Gauestone before touched. Then after him of the two Spensers and other, whose wanton counsell he following, gaue himselfe to the appetite and pleasure of his bodie: nothing ordering his common weale by sadnesse, discretion and iustice: which thing caused first great variance betweene him and his nobles, so that shortlie he became to them odible, and in the end was deprined of his kingdom. In the first yeere, he take to wife Isabell daughter of Philip king of France: with whom (the yeere after) hee was crowned at Westminster, by the bishop of Winchester: for that Robert Winchelsey archbi. of Canturburie was yet in exile not returned home. Notwithstanding, the barons and lords made first their request to the king to put Peter Gauestone from him, or else they would not consent to his coronation. Whereupon he was enforced to grant them at the next parliament, to haue their requests accomplished, and so was crowned. In the meane season, the foresaid Peter or Pierse bearing himselfe of the kings fauour bold; continued triumphing and setting at light all other states and nobles of the realme, so that hee ruled both the king and the realme, and all things went as hee would. Neither had the king any delight els, or kept companie with any, but with him: with him onlie he wake all his mind, and confirred all his counsels. This as it seemed strange vnto the lords and earles, so it inflamed their indignation so much against this Peter, that through the exciting of the nobles, the bishops of the land did proceed in excommunication against the said Gauestone, vnlesse he departed the land. Vpon the occasion whereof, the king the same first yeere of his raigne, being grieued with the bishops, writeth to the pope, complaining that they had proceeded to excommunication of the said Peter, vnlesse he departed the realme within a time certaine. The which letter of the king, that answer againe the king had from the pope, I find not set downe in Stowe. Ouer and besides, it befell in the said first yeere of the king, that the bishoprike of Yorke being vacant, the king gaue the office of the treasure to one of his owne clerks: whereof the pope hauing intelligence writeth to the king, commanding him to call back the same gift, and withall citeth vp to Rome the said clerke, there to answer the matter to a nephew of one of his cardinals, vpon whom he had bestowed the said dignitie: whereunto the king maketh answere: Quòd citationes huiusmodi, & illarum executio, &c. i. That if such citations and the execution of the same should proceede to the impeachment of our kingdie iurisdiction, and to the preiudice of our lawfull inheritance and the honour of our crowne (especiallie of the deciding of such matters which principallie concerne our estate) should be prosecuted in any other place then within this our realme by any manner of (wales, &c.) Certes, although wee our selues would winche thereat, or through inferiance permit matters so to passe our hands: yet the states and nobles of our kingdome, who vpon allegeance are obliged and sworne to the protection and defence of the dignitie of the crowne of England, will in no wise suffer our right and the lawes of the land so to be violated.

Peter Gauestone or Gauestone exacted bore a-bout the king.

Besides this, the foresaid pope wrote to the king, complaining that by certaine counsellors of king Edward his father lying sicke, vtterlie ignorant thereof, a certaine restraint was giuen out, charging his maniors and legats (whom hee had sent for the gathering of the first fruits of the benefices vacant within the realme) not hereafter to entermeddle therewith, &c. Whereunto the king maketh answer: videlicet: Pater Sanctis. Datum fuit vobis intelligi, &c.

In English thus

Most holy Father, it hath been giuen you to vnderstand otherwise then the truth of the matter is: for most true it is indeed that the foresaid inhibition was ratified by good act of parliament holden at Karlin, vpon certaine causes concerning the execution of such collections (the fault our father not onely being not ignorant, but also writing, willing, and of his owne meere knowledge agreeing to the same) in the presence not only of his owne earles, barons, and states, and commons of the realme, but also your legates and liegers being called thereunto.

Item, vpon other letters brought from the pope to the king, for the enstalling of one Peter de Subaudis his kinsman into the bishoprike of Worcester being then vacant, and withall relating that if the said Peter would not accept thereof, the election should be referred to the prior and conuent of the same place: The king therewith grieued, maketh answer by his letters to the pope and sundrie his cardinals: Quòd cum electiones de futuris prælatis in ecclesiis Cathedral. &c. That for so much as elections of prelats to bee placed in cathedrall churches within his kingdome, are not to be attempted without his licence first had and obtained, &c. Therefore he could not abide, but any such strange and vnaccustomed determinations should or could take place in his realme without manifest preiudice of his kingly estate, requiring further that hee would not cause any such nouelties to be brought in into his kingdome, contrary to that which his ancestors before him haue accustomed to doe.

Thus the time proceeded, and at length the parliament appointed came, An. 1310. which was the fourth of this kings raigne. The articles were deuised by the nobles to bee exhibited to the king, which articles were the same contained in magna charta, and de foresta aboue specified: with such other articles as his father had charged him with before: to wit, that he should remoue from him and his court, all aliens and perilous counsellours. And that all the matters of the commonwealth should bee debated by common counsell of the lords both both temporall and spirituall: and that he should aske no warre out of England in any other foreen realme, without the common assent of the same. &c. The king perceiuing their intent to be, as it was indeed, to sunder Peter Gauestone from his company; and seeing no other remedie, but needs must paid and graunt his consent, agreed that the said Gauestone should be banished into Ireland. And to the parliament beginning vp, the lords returned to their own, wel appeased although of the other articles they could not speed, yet that they had driuen Peter Gauestone out of the realme, at this time, it did sufficethem.

Peter Gauestone.

This Peter Gauestone was a certaine Gentlemans sonne of Gascoine: whom being yong, king Edward the first (for the good seruice his father had done him in his warres) receiued to his court, and placed him with his sonne Edward now raigning. Who, in processe of time growing vp with him, incensed and prouoked him to much outrage and wantonnesse. By whose occasion first he began in his fathers daies, to breake the parke of Walter bishop of Chester, then Chancellour of England, and after executor to the king. For the which so doing, the king (as is partly touched before) imprisoned his sonne, and condemned this Peter to perpetuall banishment. Notwithstanding the yong king after the death of his father (as ye haue heard) sent for this Gauestone againe. And withall, so persecuted this foresaid bishop, that he clapt him in the tower, and seised vpon all his goods. Moreouer, caused most strait inquisition to be made vpon him for guiding his office, wherein if the least crime might haue been found, it would haue cost him his life. And thus much of Peter Gauestone, and of his origine. Now to the matter.

The vnkindnesse of the king to Peter Gauestone.

The king thus separated from his old compeere, (that is, from the company of Peter Gauestone, now exiled into Ireland) continued in great mourning and pensiuenesse, seeking by all meanes possible, how to call him home againe, and conferring with such as were about him vpon the same. Who did insinuate to the king, that for so much as the earle of Gloucester was a man well loued and fauoured in all the realme, if a mariage might be wrought betwixt his sister and Peter Gauestone; it might be a meane both for him to obtaine more friendship, and for the king to haue his desire. To make short, Peter Gauestone in all haste was sent for, and the mariage through the kings procuring, proceded betweene the earles sister, and the foresaid Peter; albeit sore against the earles mind. Gauestone thus restored and ingrafted, wore in furquised in pride and exultation more then euer before: that he disdained and derided all other, whose rule and power more and more encreased. In so much, that he hauing the guiding of all the kings iewels and treasure, conueyed out of the kings iewell house at Westminster a table and a paire of trestells of gold, vnto certaine merchants beyond the sea, with other iewels more to his behoofe: to the great impouerishing both of the king and quéene and of the land. And ouer all that, brought the king (by meane of his wanton conditions) to manifold vices, as aduoutrie, and such other like. Wherefore the lords seeing the mischiefe that daily increased by occasion of this vnhappie man; twise their counsell together at Lincolne, and there concluded to auoid him againe out of England. So that shortly after he was exiled againe, and went into Flanders: for in France nor his owne countrie he durst not appeare, for feare Philip the French king, to whom the quéene of England his daughter had sent once great complaints of the said Gauestone: who had so impouerished her and her whole court, that she had not wherewith to maintaine her state. Vpon which complaint, the French king thought all his dominions laid brait watch to apprehend the said Gauestone: but he not vnwarned thereof, secretly coasted into Flanders, from whence it was not long, but he was set again by the king, as in further procelle followeth: so much was the kings heart infatuated by this wicked person.

Peter Gauestone hated by the kings treasure.

The queene complaineth to the French king her father of Peter Gauestone.

Gauestone again retained out of the land.

About this yeere, or the next before came in first the Crossed friers. And also began first the knights of the order of saint Iohn Baptist, otherwise called the knights of Rhodes: for that they, by manly knighthood put out the Turkes from the Isle of Rhodes.

The Crossed friers. The knights of S. Iohn called the knights of the Rhodes.

In the historie of king Edward this kings father before precedent, mention was made of pope Clement the fifth, who succeeded after Benedict: also of putting downe of the Templaries, which in this yeere hapned by the meanes of the French king: who as he caused to be burned in the citie of Paris this yeare fiftie foure Templaries, with the great master of the same order: so by his procurement, the foresaid pope Clement called a councell at Vienna, where the whole order and sect of Templaries being condemned, was shortly after by the consent of all christian kings deposed all in one day. After whom the French king thought to make his sonne king of Ierusalem, and to conuert to him all the lands of the said Templaries: But Clement the pope would thereto not agree, transferring all their lands to the order of Hospitulers, for the great summe of money giuen for the same. The cause why these inuious Templaries were put downe, was so abominable and filthie, that for the reuerence of chast eares it were better not told, if it be true that some write.

Templaries burned at Paris, to the number of 54.

The order of the Templaries put downe.

The horrible sin of the Templaries.

Another matter worthie to be noted of like abomination, I thought here to insert touching a certaine Nunrie in France called Prouins, within the which at the clensing and casting of a fishpond, were found many bones of yong children, and the bodies also of some infants as yet whole vnconsumed: vpon occasion whereof diuers of the nuns of the said Nunrie to the number of twentie seuen were had to Paris, and there imprisoned: what became of them afterward I find not in mine author. A prodigious Bucket-full sooth.

In the same councel also was decréed by the said Clement, that all religious orders exempted, should be subiect vnder the common lawes as other were. But the Cistercian monks with money and great gifts redeemed their priuileges and exemption of the pope, and so had them granted: Thom. Walf. These Cistercians sped better herein, then did the Minorits of Franciscans in their suite. Of the which Franciscans, when certaine of them had offered vnto the said pope Clement forte thousand florences of gold, before other siluer, that the pope would dispence with them to haue lands and possessions against their rule: the pope asked them where was that money. They answered, in the merchant mens hands. So the space of three daies being giuen them to bring forth these merchants: the pope absolued the merchants of their bond made to the friers, and commanded all that money to be imployed and reuerted to his vse. Declaring to the friers, that hee would not infringe or violate the rule of Saint Francis lately canonized, neither ought he to do it for any money. And thus the beggerly rich friers lost both their money and their indulgence. Ex eodem autore.

The friers Minorites deceiued of pope Clement. Ex Chron. Tho. Walf.

Concerning this pope Clement the fifth, Sabellicus writeth that he excommunicated the Venetians, for aiding and preferring of Azoda, vnto the state of Ferrarie: and wrote his letters throughout all Europe, condemning them as enemies of the church, and giuing their goods as a lawfull prey vnto all men; which caused them to sustaine great harme. But Francis Dandulus a noble man of Venice, being ambassadour from the Venetians to the said Clement, for the obtaining of their absolution and safegard of their citie and countrie, and for the pacifying of the popes furie toward them, was faine to fall to humble himselfe before this proud tyrannicall prelat, that he suffred a chaine of iron to be tied about his necke, and he tobe downe flat before his table, and so to catch the bones and fragments that fell from his table, as it had been a dog, till the popes furie was towards them allwaged: So that after that, he in respect (because he so humbled himselfe for the behalfe and helping of his countrie) was of some called a dog. But the citie of Venice hewed themselues not vnkind against to Dandulus for his gentle good will declared to his countrie. For as he had abased himselfe before in the vile and ignominious condition of a dog for his countries sake: so they extolled him with as much glorie against being returned home, decking and adorning him after the best array, with the chiefe princely ornaments of the citie, to make him amends for his former reproch receiued. Concerning the constitutions of this pope Clement, and of his decretals and Clementines: and how heretikes the conuerse in his daies was poisoned in receiuing of the Sacrament, ye haue heard before. About this time Robert Winchelsey archbishop of Canturburie (whom this kings father had banished before) was released and returned home from Rome.

Robert Winchelsey returned home from banishment. Anno 1311

These things thus declared, let vs proceed (by the Lords grace) to the next yeare, which is of the Lord 1311. and the fifth yeare of this kings raigne. In the which yeare, counting the yeare from Michaelmasse, to the same feast againe, as then the vsage of the realme was: Peter Gauestone, who had wandred the countries about, and could find no safe resting place (notwithstanding he was biterly banished, vpon forfeiting life and goods, out of the realme, yet trusting vpon the kings fauor, and the good will of the earle of Glocester, whose sister he had married) secretly returning into England with a certaine companie of strangers: presented himselfe to the kings sight. At the beholding of whom, the king for ioy ran to him, and imbracing him, did not only retaine him: but also for his sake vndid all such acts as had been in the parliament before enacted. The quéene and the whole court seeing this doating of the king, made an heauie Christmas. After this returne of Gauestone was noised among the commons, the peeres and nobles of the realme were not a little stirred, casting with themselues, what way were best to take. If hee were suffered still, they said not only themselues reiected, but also that the quéene could not enioy the loue of the king, neither could there be any quietnesse in the realme. Againe, to stirre vp war in the land, it were not the best: to here of disquiet the king, also they were afraid. But for as much as they could not abide, all the nobilitie to be thrust out and bie-pended for the loue of one stranger; and also the realme so to be spoiled and impouerished by the same: this way they take, that Thomas earle of Lancaster, should be elected among them the cheiftaine, and chiefe doer in that businesse: to whom all other earles and barons, and prelats also did concordly consent and assent, except only Walter bishop of Couentrie; whom Robert the archbishop therfore afterward did excommunicat. Which Thomas of Lancaster by the publike assent of the rest, sent to the king (lying then at Yorke) humble petitions, in the name as well of the whole nobilitie, as of the commons: Desiring his grace to giue the forfeland Gauestō vnto them, or else according to the ordinance of the realme, that the land might be auoided of him. But the tyrannous king, who set more by the auoure of one stranger then by his whole realme beside; neither would hearken to their counsell, nor giue place to their supplications: But in all hastie furie remoued from Yorke to Newcastle, where he remained almost till midsommer.

In the meane season, the barons had gathered an host of sufficient and able souldiers, comming toward Newcastle: not entending any molestation against the king, but only the execution of the statutes vpon the wicked Gauestō. The king not hauing where with to resist their power; remoueth in all speedie manner to Thirnouth where the queene lay. And hearing there that Newcastle was taken; taketh shipping and sailed from thence (notwithstanding the queene there being great with child, with weeping teares and all instance, desireth him to tarie with her, as safely he might) but he nothing relenting to her, tooke Peter his compere with him, and coasted ouer to the castle of Scarborough, where he leauing Peter Gauestō to the safe keeping of his men, himselfe iourneyeth toward the coast beside Warwicke. The lords hearing where Peter was, bend thither all their power: so that at length Gauestō seeing no remedie but he must needs come into their hands, yeeldeth and submitteth himselfe: requiring none other condition, but only that he might talke but a few words with the king in his presence. Thus Gauestō being apprehended, the king hearing thereof, sendeth vnto the lords, requiring his life to be spared: and that he might be brought to his speech; and so promised, that in so doing he would satisfie their minds and requests, whatsoeuer. About this aduisement was taken: but then the earle of Penbroke hearing the kings promise, persuaded the barons to grant vnto his petition: promising himselfe, vpon losing all his lands, to take the charge vpon him, to be brought vnto the kings speech, and so to be recommitted to them againe. Which when he had obtained, he taketh Peter Gauestō with him, to bring him where the king lay. And so comming to Dedington not far from Warwicke, leaueth him in the keeping of his souldiers, while he that night went to his wife, being from thence not far off.

Peter Gauestō taken of the nobles. The king intreateth for Gauestō.

The same night it chanced, Guido the earle of Warwicke to come to the same place where Gauestō was left: who taking him out of the hands of his keepers, carieth him to the castle of Warwicke, where incontinent they would haue put him to death: but doubting and fearing the kings displeasure, a little they staied. At what time one of the companie (a man of sage and wise counsell, as mine author writeth) standing vp among them, with his graue Oration declareth the nature of the man, the wickednesse of his olune condition, the realme by him so greatly endamaged, the nobles despised and reiected, the pride and ambition of the man intolerable, the ruine of things like to ensue by him, and the great charges and expences they had been at in so long pursuing and getting of him. And now being gotten and in their hands, hee exhorteth them so to vse and take the occasion now present; that hereafter being out of their hands, they afterward might seeke, and should not find it.

Guy of Warwicke.

Peter Gauestō againe apprehended by Guy of Warwicke.

Briefly, in such sort he perswaded the hearers, that forthwith he was brought out, and by common agreement beheaded in a place called Blakelow; which place in other stories I find to be called Gauestead; but that name (as I thinke) was deriued vpon this occasion, afterward. And thus he, that before had called the earle of Warwicke the blacke dog of Arden, was thus by the said dog worried, as ye haue heard, &c. His carcase, the Dominicke friers of Oxford had in their monasterie interred the space of two yeares: but after that, the king caused the said carcase to be taken vp and buried within his olun Sanctuar of Langley.

Peter Gauestō beheaded.

The corps of Peter Gauestō buried in the king's Sanctuary of Langley.

After this, great disturbance began to rise betweene the king and the lords: who hauing their power lying about Dunstable, sent stout message vnto the king at London, to haue their former acts confirmed. Gilbert earle of Glocester the kings nephew (who neither did hold against the king, nor yet against the nobles) with the bishops and prelats of the realme; went betweene both parties with great diligence, to make vnitie. At which time also came the cardinals from Rome, with letters sent vnto them from the pope. The nobles answered to the message of the cardinals, lying then at Saint Albans: that as touching themselues, they should be at all times welcome to them: but as touching their letters (for as much as they were men vnlettered, and only brought vp in warre and feates of armes) therefore they cared not for seeing the same. Then message was sent against, that they would grant at least but to speake with the popes legats, which purposely came for the intent to set quiet and vnitie in the realme. They answered again: that they had bishops both godly and learned, by whose counsell they would be led only, and not by any strangers, who knew not the true cause of their commotion. And therefore they said precisely, that they would no forreners or aliens to be doers in their businesse and affaires pertaining to the realme. Yet notwithstanding, through the mediation of the archbishop, and of the earle of Glocester; the matter at length was so taken vp, that the barons should resigne to the king, or his attourney of Saint Albans, all the treasure, horses, and iewels of the forsaid Gauestō taken at Newcastle, and so their requests should be granted. And so was the matter at that time composed.

The nobles of England cared not for the popes letters. The popes legats not admitted of the nobles of England.

Shortly vpon the same, Isabel the queene was deliuered of a faire child at Windsore, whom Lewes the French kings sonne (the queenes brother, with other Frenchmen there present) would to be called by the name of the French king: but the English lords were contrarie, willing him to be called by the name of Edward his father. At the birth of which Edward great reioycing was through all the land, and especially the king his father so much ioyed thereat; that he began daily more and more to forget the sorowe and remembrance of Gauestons death, and was after that more agreeable to the will of his nobles.

Anno 1312. The king rieth by forren counsell. Strife betweene the king and his nobles.

Thus peace and concord betweene them began to be in a good towardnesse: which more and more might haue been confirmed in wearing out of time, had not Satan the author and sower of discord, stirred vp his instruments (certaine Frenchmen, Mimiallars and make-bates about the king) which ceased not in carping and depraying the nobles, to inflame the kings hatred and grudge against them. By the exciting of whom, the old quarrels being renued afresh, the king in his parliament, called vpon the same, began to charge the foresaid barons and nobles with sedition and rebellion, and so raising Peter Gauestō. Neither were the nobles lesse stout against in defending their cause, declaring that they in so doing had deserued rather thanke and fauour with the king then any displeasure, in vanquishing such a publike enemie of the realme, who not only had spoiled and wasted the kings substance, but also raised much disturbance in the realme. And so as much as they had begun with the matter to their so great labours and expences; they would proceed further, they said, not ceasing till they saw an end thereof. To be short, great threats there were on both parts, and a foule matter like to haue followed. But again through the diligent mediation of the queene, the prelats, and the forsaid earle of Glocester; the matter was taken vp and brought to reconciliation vpon these conditions; that the lords and barons openly in Westminster hall should humble themselues before the king, and aske pardon there of their doings, and euerie man there to receiue a letter of the kings pardon for their indemnitie, and assurance. And so passed ouer that yeare, within the which yeare died Ro. Winchelsey archbishop of Canturburie. In whose rome, Thomas Cobham was elected by the king and church of Canturburie to succeed: but the pope, calling the election, placed Walter Reinald bishop of Worcester.

Mediation for making peace.

The king reconciled againe with his nobles.

In the meane time, the Scots hearing this ciuill discord in the realme, began to be busie, and to rebell of new through the meanes of Robert Buis: who being chased out of Scotland by king Edward the first, as is aboue premised, into Norway, was now returned againe into Scotland: where he demeaned him in such sort to the lords there, that in short processe he was againe made king of the realme; and warred so strongly vpon them that tooke the kings part, that he wan from them manie castles and strong holds, and inuaded the borders of England. The king hearing this, assembleth a great power, and by water entreth the realme of Scotland. Against whom incountred Robert de Buis with his Scots at Estriuelin, where was fought a strong battell: in the end whereof, the Englishmen were discomfited, and so eagerly pursued by the Scots, that many of the noblemen were slaine, as the earle of Glocester, sir Robert Clifford, sir Edmund Saule with other lords to the number of 42. and knights and barons 227. besides men of name, which were taken prisoners: of common souldiers ten thousand, or after the Scottish storie fiftie thousand slaine. After which time, sir Robert Buis raigned as king of Scotland.

Anno 1313. Edward disceiued both in Gascoin wale. The Scots reuelled against the realme of England.

Englishmen ouercome by the Scots.

About which time, and in which yeare, died pope Clement, who keeping in the realme of France, neuer came to the see of Rome: after whose death the papacie stood void three yeares.

Pope Clement neuer sate in the see of Rome.

The Scots after this exalted with pride and fiercenesse inuaded the realme of England, so fore killing and destroying man, woman, and child; that they came winning and wasting the North parts as farre as to Yorke. Besides this, such dearth of victuals, and penurie of all things so oppressed the whole land, such mozaine of chepe and oren; as men were faine to eat horseflesh, dogs, cats, mise, and what else they could get. Moreouer, such a price of corne followed withall, that the king hardly had bread for the sustentation of his olune houshold. Moreouer, some there were that did sceale children and eate them, and many for lacke of victuall died. And yet all this admended not the king of his euill liuing.

Anno 1314. Grieuable dearth & famine in England.

The cause and origen of this great dearth, was, partly the warres and dissension betweene them and the Scots: whereby a great part of the land was wasted. But the chiefest cause was, the vntemperat season of the yeare, which contrarie to the common course, was so moist with abundance of raine, that the graine laid in the earth could haue no ripening by heat of the Sunne, nor growe to any nourishment. Whereby they that had to eat, could not be satisfied with satiritie, but oftsones were were as hungrie againe. They that had nothing, were driuen to steale and rob: the rich were constrained to auoid my dimi nith their housholas: the pope for famine died. And not so much the want of victuall, which could not be gotten, as the vnwholesomnesse of the same when it was taken, so consumed the people, that the quicke were not sufficient to burie the dead. For the corruption of the meats, by reason of the vnseasonablenes of the ground, was so infectious, that many died of the flix, manie of hot feuers, diuers of the pestilence. And not only the bodies of men thereby were infected, but also the beasts by the putrifaction of the herbs and grasse fell into so great a mortalitie: so farre forth, as the eating of flesh was suspect and thought contagious. A quarter of corne and salt, from the moneth of June to September grew from thirtie shillings vnto foztie shillings. The flesh of horses was then precious to the pose. Many were driuen to steale fat dogs and to eat them: some were said in seuerl corners to eat their olune children. Some would steale other mens children to kill them and eat them priuily. The prisoners and theues that were in bands, such as were notable brought in vnto them, so hunger fell vpon them, and tearing them in pieces did eat them halfe aliue. Briefly, this extreame penurie had extincted and consumed (as it was thought) the greatest part of the people of the land, had not the king by the statute of the Londoners giuen forth commandement through all his land, that no corne should at that time be turned to the making of drinke. Such a Lord is God, thus able to do where he is disposed to strike. And yet vse, miserable creatures, in our wealth and aboundance will not surcease daily to prouoke his terrible Maiestie.

But let vs returne to the oder againe of our storie. After the Scots had thus plagued miserable (as ye haue heard) the realme of England; they inuaded also Ireland, where they kept and continued warre the space of foure yeares. But in fine, the Irishmen (by aid sent to them from England) quit themselues so well, that they banquished the Scots, and slew Edward Buis, and many of the nobles of Scotland with many other, and drone the residue out of the countrie.

The Scots driuen out of Ireland.

Anno 1317.

The king about the twelfth yeare of his raigne, assembled a new host and went into Scotland, where he laid siege to Barwicke. But in the meane time, the Scots by another way, inuaded the merchants of Yorkeshire, robbing and harrying the countrie, that they slew much people. Wherefore, the archbishop of Yorke, and other abbats, priors, clerkes, with husbandmen, assembled a great companie, and gaue them battell at a place called Pitton, where the Englishmen were discomfited and many of them slaine: but the archbishop, and the abbat of Selbie, and diuers others there escaped. But because there were so many spirituall men there slaine, it was called therefore the white battell. By reason wherof, the king hearing of this, and partly because winter did approch, was constrained to breake vp his siege, and so returned not without great danger.

The white battell of the spirituall men in Yorkeshire.

Mediation for a truce.

At this time the two Spensers (Sir Hugh Spenser the father, and Hugh Spenser the sonne) were of great power in [illegible] and by the fauour of the king practised such cruelties, and bare themselues so haughtily and proud; that no lord of this land might gainsay them in any thing that they thought good, whereby they were in great hatred and indignation both with the nobles, and the commons, no lesse then Peter Gauestō was before.

The two Spensers.

Shortly vpon this, came two Legats from Rome, sent by pope Iohn the 22. vnder pretence to set agreement betweene England and Scotland: who for their charges and expences, required of euerie spirituall person foure pence in euerie marke. But all their labour nothing auailed: For the Legats as they were in the North parts (about Derlinghton) with their whole familie and traine, were robbed and dispoiled of their horses, treasure, apparell, and what else they had, and with on cull fauoured handling, retired backe againe to Durelme, where they staid a while waiting for an answere from the Scots. But when neither the popes legacie nor his curse would take any place with the Scots, they returned againe to London, where they first excommunicated and cursed as blacke as sat, all those arrogant and presumptuous robbers of Northumberland. Secondly, for supplying of the losses receiued, they exacted of the clergie to be giuen and paid vnto them eight pence in euery marke. But the clergie thereunto would not agree, seing it was their olune quot oulnelle (as they said) that made them venture farther then they needed. Only they were contented to relieue them after foure pence in a marke, as they promised before, further they would not grant. Wherof the king being aduertised, and taking part with his clergie, directeth his letters to the said legats in forme as followeth: Rex magistro Rigando, &c.

This legacie sent from Rome. The popes pitiage. The popes legats robbed of all their ill gotten treasure. The popes excommunicated the Scots.

The clergie of England denied to contribute to the popes legats.

R Ex Magistro Rigando de Asserio, canonico Aurelian. Salutem, &c.

In English thus.

The king to maister Rigand of Asserio, canon of Aurelia; greeting. We haue taken notice of the clamours and lamentable petitions of the subiects of our realme, perceiuing by the same that you practise many and sundrie inconueniences verie strange, neuer heretofore accustomed nor heard of in this our realme, aswell against the clergie and ecclesiasticall persons, as against the laytie, euen to the vtter oppression and empouerishing of many our liege people: which if it should be winked at (as God forbid) may in processe of time be occasion of greater perils to ensue: whereat we are (not without cause) much, and not a little grieued. We forbid you therefore, that from henceforth you practise not, ne presume in any case to attempt any thing within this our realme, either against our clergie or laitie, that may any manner of way tend to the preiudice of our roiall person or of our crowne and dignitie regall. Witnesse the king at Windsour the sixth day of February in the eleuenth yeare of his raigne. Per Concilium.

A prohibition against the legats and their petitions.

A prohibition for paying the popes Peter pence.

Likewise in the same yeare the said king writeth to the same effect to the archbishop of Canturburie, as followeth: Rex venerabili in Christo Patri, W. eadem gra. archiepiscopo Cant.

In English thus.

The king to the reuerend father in God, W. by the same grace archbishop of Canturburie 1. primate of England, greeting. We are credible informed by many our subiects, that certaine strange impositions neuer heard of before within any our dominions vpon lands and tenements, goods and cattels, concerning the testaments and cases of matrimonie, are brought into our realme to be executed vpon our subiects by you or some others, which if it should proceed to execution, would manifestly tend to the disherison of our crowne, impeachment of our crowne and dignitie regall, and the intolerable damage of the subiects of our realme (and to the due preseruation of the which you are bound by solemne oth of alleageance). We therefore command and straitly charge you, that you proceed not in any case to the execution of any such letters, either in your olune person or by any other, nor yet presume by colour of the same to attempt any thing that may be preiudicial or hurtfull to our crowne or dignitie regall. And if you or any other in your name haue done or attempted any thing by colour of the same, that yet you call backe and reuoke the same forthwith without delay. Witnesse the king at Shene the 17. of February the 11. yeare of his raigne.

Per ipsum Regem.

The like letters in effect were directed to the archbishop of Yorke, and to euerie other bishop through England. By force of which letters the greedie legats being restrained of their rauening purpose, taking what they could get, and setting a peace (such as it was) betweene the king and the earle of Lancaster, were faine to packe.

Besides the restraint aboue mentioned for strange impositions, there followed moreouer the same yeare the kings prohibition for the gathering of Peter pence directed to the foresaid legat, the tenour whereof followeth.

A prohibition of Peter pence.

Rex magistro Rigando, &c. In English thus.

The king to maister Rigand of Asserio Canon of Aurelia, greeting. We are giuen to vnderstand that you do demand and purpose to leuie the Peter penie within our realme, otherwise then the said Peter penie hath been heretofore accustomed to be leuied in the time of any our progenitours, exercising herein grieuous censures ecclesiasticall to the great annoiance and banishing of the subiects of our realme: for preuent remedie whereof our louing subiects haue made their humble supplication vnto vs. And for as much as the said Peter penie hath been hitherto accustomed to be gathered and leuied vpon lands and tenements within our realme after a due manner and forme: we not willing that any such vnaccustomed impositions shall in any wise be made vpon the lands and tenements of any our subiects within our dominions; prohibite you, vpon grieuous paine straitly charging that in no wise you presume to exact, gather or leuie the said Peter penie in any other forme or manner then hath been heretofore accustomed to be gathered and leuied in the time of our progenitours, or since the beginning of our raigne: vntill further order to be taken in our high court of parliament by the aduice of the nobles and peres of our realme, such as may well be taken without preiudice of our crowne and damage of subiects. Witnes the king at Westminster the sixt day of March.

Per ipsum Regem & Concilium.

To the same effect letters were directed to the archbishops, deanes, archdeacons and the rest of the clergie.

Touching the first originall of which Peter pence, though mention be made before in the life of king Offa and others, yet to make a briefe recapitulation of the same according to the rolles as they come to our hands, thus it followeth: De Denariis beati Petri sic scripsum, &c. That is to say: It is thus found recorded in ancient chronicles touching the Peter pence of saint Peter, an. 187. Offa king of Mercia trauelled by to Rome in the time of pope Adrian the first, to obtaine the canonizing of S. Albone. And hauing performed his vow, visiting the Colledge of English Students which then flourished in Rome, did giue to the maintenance of the scholars of England students in Rome, one penie out of euerie tenement within this realme that had land belonging to the same, amounting to the yearely value of thirtie pence. And for this his munificence he obtained of pope Adrian, that no person within his dominion publike repenting him for not performing enjoyned penance, should therfore be banished.

Summa. 30. marcæ & dimidi.

Concerning which Peter pence, it is touched in the lawes of king Edward the Saint chap. 10. when, where, of whom, and vnder what paine this Peter pence must be gathered, being but the kings mere almes, as is aforesaid. And thus much touching Peter pence. Now for other letters written by the king to the pope, the same yeare, for other matters, as craning the popes helpe in compounding the variance betwixt the two archbishops of Canturburie and Yorke, for bearing the crosse from the one province to the other, thus it followeth: that the king grieuously complaineth, quòd tantæ dissensiones. 1. that such hurly burly and vproare arose thereof, that they could not meet together in one place through the great multitude of armed men affiliants on both parts in the verie bearing of the crosse, to the great disturbance of the people.

Now after this long digression to turne to our English matters against mention was made before of the variance betweene the king and the earle of Lancaster, and of aptreaty concluded betweene them. But this peace did not long endure: which the king by his owne default did breake, sending to the Scots a priuie messenger (which was taken in the way) to haue the foresaid earle of Lancaster by their meanes, made away.

The pride of the Spensers. In the meane time, the lords and nobles of England detesting the outragious pride of the Spensers, whereby they wrought daily both great dishonor to the king and hindrance to the common wealth: on such wise conspired against them, that gathering their power together, they made a request to the king, that he should remoue the Spensers from his person. For the which, there was a parliament called at London, and the barons came together with a great companie. At the which parliament both the Spensers were banished the land for terme of their lines: and they take shipping at Douer, and so voided the land. But it was not long after, but the king (contrarie to that ordinance made in the parliament) sent for the Spensers againe, and set them in high authoritie, and ruled all things after their sensuall appetites, nothing regarding iustice nor the common wealth. Wherefore, the barons intending against to redresse this mischefe, assembled their powers: but the king (making so hastie speed, and gathering his people so fast) was stronger then they, and pursued them so in diuers places; that the barons not fully ioyned together (some flaine by the way in the end were chased so eagerly, that in short space, the foresaid Thomas earle of Lancaster was taken and put to death with the rest of the nobilitie, to the number of two and twentie of the greatest men, and chiefest captaines of this realme. Of whom only Thomas earle of Lancaster for the nobilitie of his blood, was beheaded: All the other lords and barons, were hanged, drawne and quartered, &c. Which bloodie vnmercifulnesse of the king toward his naturall subiects, not only to him procured great dishonor within the realme, but also turned afterward to his much more greater harme and hinderance, in his forren warres against the Scots: and finally wrought his vtter confusion and ouerthrow of his seat royall, as in the sequele of his end appeared, and worthilie.

Anno 1321. What Thomas earle of Lancaster came of. Edmund, one sonne of king Henrie the third. Thomas two of the greatest nobilitie of the realme put to death by the king.

After the ruine of these noble personages, the king, as though he had gotten a great conquest (who then indeed began first to be ouercome and conquered himselfe, then he so oppressed and cut off the strength and finenes of his chiualrie) began to triumph not a little with the Spensers: And to count himselfe sure as though he were in heauen, to exercise more therye security vpon his subiects, trusting and committing all to the counsell only of the foresaid Spensers: in so much, that both the quéene and the residue of the other nobles could little be regarded. Who as they grew euer in more contempt with the king: so they increased in more hatred against the Spensers: but strength and abilitie lacked, to worke their will. Anno 1321 The cruell re-ioycing of the king.

The next yere, the king being at Yorke, after he had made sir Hugh Spenser earle, and sir John Baldocke a man of euill fame, to be Chancellour of England: he then areared a mightie host against the Scots. But for lacke of skilfull guiding, expert captaines, and for want specially of due prouision of victuals necessarie for such an armie: the great multitude, to the number reckoned of an hundred thousand (wandring through Scotland, from whence the Scots had conueyed all their goods and cattell into mountaines, and marches) were so pinched and starued with famine, that a great part of the armie, there pestenlie perished: and they that returned home, as some as they tasted of meats, escaped not. The king neither hauing resistance of his enemies, and hauing such a destruction of his subiects: was forced without any act done to retire. But in his retiring, Sir Iames Duglas and the Scots hauing knowledge thereof, pursued him in such wise; that they slew many Englishmen, and had well neere taken the king himselfe. After which discresse, the king thus beaten and wearied with the Scots, would faine haue ioyned in truce with the Scots: but because they stood excommunicat by the pope, he standing in feare thereof, desired licence to entreat with them of peace. The said excommunication notwithstanding: which licence being obtained, a treatie was appointed by commissioners on both parts at Neiwcastle at the feast of Saint Nicolas next ensuing; and so truce was taken for 12. yeares. Whereupon this is to be noted by the way (gentle reader) not vnworthie of obseruation, that whereas in former times, and especially of the late king Edward the first, so long as the Scots were vnder the popes blessing, and we in displeasure with his holinesse for dealing with them, so long we preuailed mightily against them, euen to the vtter subuersion in manner of their whole estate. But now so soone as the pope take our part, and the Scots were vnder his curse and excommunication: then gate they greater victories against vs, then any time either before or sithence, in so much as being before not able to defend themselues against vs, they now pursued vs vnto the boiwels of our owne countrie. The king distressed again in Scotland.

The king purposing to erect a house of friers Augustines, within the towne of Boston in Lincolneshire, first prayed the popes licence in that behalfe.

Polydorus Virgilius among other histories of our English nation (which he interweaueth withall, prosecuting also the acts and life of this present king, and comming to write of the quenes going ouer into France: inserteth much varietie and diuersitie of authors and storie-writers, concerning the cause thereof. Otherwise, he giueth himselfe no true certaintie of that matter, neither yet toucheth he that which was the cause indeed. By reason partly, that he being an Italian and a forrener, could not vnderstand our English tongue. And partly a game being but one man, neither could he alone come to the sight of all our Latine authors: One I am sure came not to his perusing, an old ancient Latine historie faire written in parchment (but without name) belonging to the librarie of William Cary citizen of London. In which storie, the truth of this matter without all ambiguitie, is there fully and with all circumstances expressed, as heere briefly is excerpted. Polydorus Virgilius, an Italian writer of our English affaires.

The king of England had been diuers and sundrie times cited vp to the Court of France, to do homage to the French king, for the dukedome of Aquitane, and other lands which the king then held of France. Which homage, because the king of England refused to tender: the French king began to enter all such possessions as the king then did hold in France: whereupon, great contention and conflicts there were on both sides. At length, in this yeare now present, a parliament was called at London. Where (after much altercation) at last it was determined: that certaine should be sent ouer, to wit, the bishops of Winchester, and Norwich, and the earle of Richmond, to make agreement betwixt the two kings. For the better helpe and fortification of which agreement, it was thought good aforeward; that quéene Isabel, sister to Charles then the French king, should be sent ouer. Where to is to be noted first, that the quéenes lands, possessions and castles a little before were the breach betwéene the French king and the king of England, were seised into the kings hands, and the quéene put vnto her pension, &c. Thus the quéene being sent ouer with a few, to attend vpon her, onely Sir John Cromwell baron, and foure knights, take their passage into France: by whole mediation, it was there concluded, that the king of England (if he would not himselfe come to do his homage) he should giue to his sonne Edward the dukedome of Anno 1323 The quéene sent to France.

of Aquitaine, and the earledome of Pontine, and so hee to come to make his homage to the king, and to possesse the same. This being in France concluded, was sent ouer by message to the king of England, with the kings letters patents adioyned for the safe conduct of him or of his sonne. Vpon this, deliberation was taken in the councell of England. But the two Spensers fearing to take the seas either with the king, or else without the king for meanane behind for feare of the nobles; so appointed, that prince Edward the kings sonne was sent, which hapned after to their vtter desolation, as it followed. For all things being quieted and ordered according to the agreement in France, king Edward of England came after. Michelmasse, sendeth for his wife and his sonne againe out of France. But she sending home most part of her familie, refuseth her selfe to returne. For what cause it is not fully certaine, whether for indignation that her possessions and lands were seized to the king, as is before premised: or whether for feare and hatred of the Spensers, as is likelye: or else for loue and familiaritie of Sir Roger Mortimer. For here is to be noted, that the said sir Roger Mortimer, with diuers other of the barons part, which had taken prison in England, were fled before into France, and now reposted vnto the quéene. The king seeing this, giueth forth in proclamation, and limiteth a certaine day to the quéene and his sonne to returne: or else to be proclamed traytors to the king and to the realme. Notwithstanding, the quéene persisting in her purpose, denieth to returne, vnlesse the other nobles which were fled, might be permitted safely also to returne with her. Whereupon, the king immediatly caused them both to be proclaimed traytors, and all them that tooke their parts. The quéene and the prince proclamed traytors in England. The king disswaded from the death of the quéene and of his sonne.

Here then began great hatred betwéene king and king, betwéene the king and the quéene, much preparation of warre, great spoiling on the sea, much sending betweene the pope and them; but that would not serue. Then the king (by the counsell of the Spensers) sendeth priuily to procure the death of the quéene and of his sonne: which should be wrought by the execution of the earle of Richmond, the quéenes familiar. But as the Lord would, that imagination was preuented and vtterly frustrate. Albeit, the quéene yet notwithstanding, whether misdoubting what corruption of money might do in the court of France: or whether the French king being threatned by the king of England, and by the pope, durst not detaine her: she remoued from thence, and was receiued with Edward her sonne in poolle and honorable, in the court or countrie of the earle of Henalude. Where by meanes of such as were about her, a marriage was concluded betwéene the said Edward her sonne being of the age of fourteene yeares, and Philip the foresaid earles daughter. When this was noised in England, diuers men of honor and name came ouer to the quéene. And some after the earle of Hynalude prepared a crew of fiue hundred men of armes, to set ouer the yong prince with his mother into England. Of this, the fame sprang shortly through the realme. Wherefore the king in all defensable waies made prouision to haue the hauens and ports of his land surely kept, for to resist the landing of his enemies. On the contrarie side, the quéene with no lesse preparation prouideth all things to her expedition as necessarie. Who when shee saw her time, speeding her selfe to the sea coast with prince Edward her sonne, lord Edmund earle of Kent the kings brother, Sir Roger Mortimer, the lord Wygmore and other exiles of England, accompanied also with the foresaid Hainaulters, of whom Sir John Hainaulde the earles brother was captaine, of Englishmen and strangers hauing with her, the number of 2757. souldiers: she take shipping in those parts, and had the winde so fauourable, that they landed in England at a port called Dwell beside Harwich in Suffolke, in the dominion of the earle Marshall the moneth of September. To whom after her landing resorted earle Marshall, the earle of Leicester, with other barons, knights, and bishops also: namely of Lincolne, Hereford, Duresme, and Ely. The archbishop of Canturburie though he came not himselfe, yet sent his aid and money. Thus the quéene well furnished with plentie both of men and victuall, setteth forward toward London: so that the further shee came the more her number daily increased, and the kings power contrarie, decreased, in so much that, as mine author affirmeth, not one almost in all the realme could be hired with any wages to fight on the kings behalfe against the quéene. Neither did the quéenes armie hurt any man or child, either in goods or any other thing, by the way. Anno 1324 Anno 1325 Anno 1326 Polydorus Virgilius, an Italian writer of our English affaires. At the arriuing of the quéene, the king was then in London, which shee would not beleeue it to be true. Afterward (seeing and perceiuing how it was) hee afterly helpe of the Londoners. Who after mature daunsement, rendred this answere to the king againe: that as touching the king, the quéene, and their sonne (the lawfull heire of the kingdome) they were readie with all dutie and seruice to honor and obey. As for strangers and trapters to the realme, they would receiue none such within their citie gates. Furthermore, to go out of the citie to fight, that they said they would not, vnlesse it were so, that according to the liberties of their citie, they might returne home againe before sunne set. The king hearing this answere (which liked him not well) fortifieth the tower of London with men and victuall: committing the custodie thereof to John Saltham The answere of the Londoners to the king. his yonger sonne, and to the wife of Hugh Spenser his néece. And leauing Walter Stapleton bishop of Exeter behind him to haue the rule of the citie of London: he hunselfe hearing daily the great recourse of the people that drew to the quéene: for more safegard to himselfe, fled with a small companie westward toward Wales. But before his departing from London, he caused a proclamation to be made: wherein all and singuler persons were charged vpon forfeit of life and goods; to ayde him with all his power to resist and inuade the rebels and destroy them all, only the life of the quéene, his sonne, and his brother reserued. Also, that no man vpon paine pretended, should helpe, rescue, or relieue the said rebels, with goods, victuals, or otherwise. Item, it was also proclamed, that whosoeuer would bring to the king the head and bodie either dead or aliue of sir Roger Mortimer, should haue out of the kings coffers, a thousand pound. The kings proclamation.

In contrarwise, the quéene setteth forth another proclamation, wherein it was forbidden, to take or spoile violently the value of any mans goods against the will of the owner, vnder paine of losing his finger, if it were three pence: Of his hand if it were fiue pence: Of his head, if it were twelue pence. Moreouer, whosoeuer would bring to the quéene the head of Hugh Spenser the yonger, chopt off from his bodie, should receiue for so doing of the quéene, two thousand pounds. This done, the quéene sendeth her letters to the citie of London for aid and succour to subdue the oppressour of the realme: to the which letters sicll no answere was made. Againe, she wrote the second letter, which was then tacked vpon the crosse in Cheape, which was then called the new crosse. The copie and tenour of which letter was this. The quenes proclamation.

The copie of a letter that the Queene sent vnto the Maior and citizens of London.

ISabell by the grace of God, Queene of England, ladie of Ireland, and Counteſſe of Pountif: And we Edward the first sonne of the king of England, Duke of Guyan, earle of Chester, of Pontif, and of Mounstrell, to the Maior and all the comminaltie of London, send greeting. For as much as we haue before this time sent to you by our letters, and how we wee come into this land in good array and good manner, for the profit of holy church and of our right dearelord and king, and all the realme, with all our might and strength, to keepe and maincaine the realme as all good people ought for to doe: Vpon that we pray you and desire you that ye would be helping to vs for the health and profit of the realme; and we haue had none answere of you, nor know not your will in that part. Wherefore we send to you againe and pray you, and charge you, that ye beare you so against vs, that ye haue nor make no cause vs to grieue, but that ye be to vs helping in all the waies that you may. And weet ye well in certaine, that we and also those that come with vs into this realme, nothing for to done, but that shall be pleasing to God, and common profit to all the realme. Not else, but for to destroy the Spensers, ennemies to the realme, as ye well know. Wherefore we pray and charge you in the faith that ye owe to our lord the king, to the crowne and to vs, and vpon all that ye may forfeit, that if Hugh Spenser, both the father and the sonne our enemies come within your power, that yee do them hastilie to be take, and safely kept, till we haue ordained for them our will: and as ye desire profit and honour of vs, and of the realme. Vnderstanding well if be so that ye do our desire and prayer, we shall the more be beholden to you: And also we shall do you profit and worship if that you send vs hastily word againe of our will. Giuen at Baldocke the sixth day of October. The queenes letter.

These foresaid letters being published and perused, the bishop of Exeter, to whom (as ye heard) was committed the rule of the citie: sent to the Maior for their keyes of the gates, causing sharpe words in the kings name, that variance began to kindle betwéene him and the citizens; so farre forth that the commons in their rage take the foresaid bishop and beheaded him and two of his houshold at the Standard in Cheape. Then the king went to Bristow, and ordained Sir Hugh Spenser the father there to kéepe the castle and the towne: and the king with Hugh Spenser the sonne, and Sir Robert Baldock chancellour, and the earle of Arundell went into Wales. And the quéene so pursued them, that first they take the towne ye bord by toher: Then they take sir Hugh Spenser the father, whom being drawne and torne, they at last hanged vp at Bristow in chaines of iron. As the king was thus flying, the quéene caused to be proclamed through her armie, that the king should come and appeare, and so to receiue his kingdome against if he would be conformable to his liege subiects. Who when he did not appeare, prince Edward his sonne was proclamed high keeper of the realme. The bishop of Exeter beheaded in Cheape. The bishop of Exeter hanged in Oxford two Schollers, Exeter Colledge, and Dart taffy, whose name was Shaller Stapleton. Hugh Spenser the father taken and hanged in chaines.

In the meane time Henrie earle of Lancaster, and brother to the good earle Thomas (which before was beheaded), also lord William Souch, and maister Aphowell were sent by the quéene into Wales to pursue the king: and there take him, The king taken in Wales. Hugh Spenser the sonne taken and executed.

and sent him to the castle of Kenelworth: And take Hugh Spenser the sonne, and Sir Robert Walborbe Chancellour, and Sir John earle of Arundell, and brought them all to the towne of Hereford. And anon after, Hugh Spenser the sonne was drawne and hanged on a gallowes fiftie foote high, and after beheaded and quartered, whose quarters were sent to foure quarters of the Realme. Sir John of Arundell was beheaded, Sir Robert Walborbe was put in Newgate at London, where shortly after he pined away and died among the rats. This done, a parliament was assembled at London, and from whence message was sent to the king, that if he would resigne vp his crowne, his sonne should haue it after him: If not, another should take it to whom the lot would giue it. Whereupon the king being constrained to yeeld vp his crowne to his sonne, was kept in prison, and after had to Barkley: where hee is said to take great repentance. After this message being sent, and the king halfe condescending thereunto (the parliament not withstanding praescribing and going forward) there was a bill exhibited and put vp, containing certaine articles against the said king, then in prison in the castle of Barkley, touching his misbehauior and unprudent gouerning of the realme: which bill, openly before all the lords and commons by the speaker of the parliament house was read. After long consultation thereof amongst themselues touching those articles, and also for the better and more circumspect gouernment of the realme from that time forth: it was consulted and agreed vpon by the lords spirituall and temporall, and commons there assembled; that the said Seward was a man not met to bee their king, nor from that time forth any more to beare the crowne royall or title of a king. But that Edward his eldest sonne, who there in the same court of high parliament was present, as he was rightfull heire and inheritour thereunto: so sent, as he was crowned king thereof in his fathers stead, with the se conditions thereunto annexed: That he should take wise, sage, and true counsellers vnto him. That the realme might be better and more circumspectly governed, then before in the time of Edward his father it was: That the old king his father should be honorably prouided for and kept, so long as he liue, according as vnto his estate it appertained, &c. These and other things thus finished and ended, the parliament breaketh vp, and all things necessarie to the coronation of a prince appertaining were in speedie wise prepared, whereof more hereafter (Christ willing) shall be specified.

A bill exhibited in the parliament house against king Edward the second.

King Edward deposed by consent of the parliament house, and his sonne Edward chosen king.

In the meane time as touching the king which was yet in prison, it is thought by some writers, that the next yeare following by the meanes of Sir Roger Mortimer he was murthered, thrust with a Spit (as is said) being thrust vp into his bodie, and was buried at Glocester, after he had raigned nine teene yeares.

In the time and raigne of this king, the Colledge of Cambridge called Michael house, was founded and builded by Sir Henrie Stanton knight, to the vse and exercise of learning: a thing in a common wealth verie profitable and necessarie to be had, the want and need wherof, many sundrie times, is sooner felt in this realme of ours, and other realmes abroad, then is the discommoditie thereof, of most men commonly vnderstood.

In the tractation of this kings historie, before was declared what grudge did kindle in the hearts of the barons against the king, for reuoking such acts and customes, as had been before in the parliament established, both for Peter Gaueston, and for the two Spensers. Also what seuere punishment the king did execute vpon them for the same, in such crauell and tyrannous sort, that as he spared none of them, whom he could there find: so he neuer ceased all his life after to enquire out and to be reuenged of all such, as had been in anie part, or consenting to that matter. For the which his extreame and implacable tyrannie, he was in such hatred of all the people: that as he said, he could not find one of all the Commons to take his part, when need required. Among all other which were for that matter troubled, was one Adam bishop of Hereford: who being impeached of treason with other moe, was at length arreised in the parliament, to appeare and answere to that should be to him obiected. Manie things there were laid against him, for taking part with them that rose against the king, with matters moe and haynous tenbitues, &c. When vnto the bishop a great while answered nothing.

ther ought to answere to these so high matters without the authoritie of the archbishop of Canturburie my direct iudge, next vnder the high bishop of Rome, whose suffragan also I am, and the consent likewise of the other my fellow bishops. After which words by him pronounced, the archbishop and other bishops with him were readie to make humble intercession for him to the king, and so did. But when the king would not be won nor turned with any supplication: the said bishops together with the archbishop and the clergie, comming with their crosses; take him away, challenging him for the church, without any more answere making: charging moreouer, vnder the censures of the church and excommunication, none to presume to lay any further hands vpon him. The king moued with this boldnesse and stoutnesse of the clergie; commandeth notwithstanding to proceed in iudgement, and the iurie of twelue men to go vpon the enquirie of his cause: who finding and pronouncing the bishop to be guiltie, the king caused immediatly all his goods and possessions to be confiscate vnto himselfe: moreouer, made his plate and all his houshold prouision to be throwne out of his house into the streete, but yet he remained so still vnder the protection and defence of the archbishop, &c.

The king pretendeth in iudgement against the bishop. The pointedgces of the church notwithstanding to the contrarie.

After pope Clement the fifth, by whose decease the Romish see stood vacant (as ye haue heard) two yeares and three monethes, next was elected pope Iohn the two and twentith a Gascoigne: who sate in that papacie eight and eighteene yeares. He was stout and inflexible, giuen so much to the heaping of riches; that he proclaimed them heretikes, which taught that Christ and his apostles had no possessions of their owne in this world. At this time was emperor Ludouicus Wanarus, a worthie man: who with this pope and other that followed him, had no lesse contention, then had Fredericus before mentioned in the time of king Henrie the third. In so much that this contention and variance continued the space of foure and twentie yeares. The cause and first origine of this tragicall conflict, rose vpon the constitution of Clement the fifth predecessour to this pope, by whom it was ordained, as is afore mentioned, that emperors by the Germaine princes elected, might be called kings of the Romans, but might not enioy the title or right of the empire to be administred vnto them, without their confirmation giuen by the pope. Wherefore, this foresaid emperour because he vsed the emperiall dignitie in Italie, before he was authorized by the pope: the said pope therefore excommunicated the emperour. And notwithstanding the emperour of intentines did praefer himselfe to make intreaty of peace and concord, yet the pope vnpeaceable would not bend. The writings of both parts yet be extant, wherein the said bishop both make his auaunt, that he had full power to create and depose kings and emperors at his pleasure. In the same time were diuers learned men, which seeing the matter, did greatly disallow the bishop of Romes doings, among whom was Guillerme Ocham, whose tractations were afterward condemned by the pope, for writing against the temporall iurisdiction of their see. And another named Marsilius Patauinus, which wrote the booke intituled Defensor pacis, giuen vp to the hands of the said emperour, wherein the controuersie of the popes vnlawfull iurisdiction in things temporall is largely disputed, and the vsurped authoritie of that see set forth to the vttermost. It is found in some writers, that a great cause of this variance first began, for that one of the emperours secretaries, vnknowing to the emperour; in certaine of his letters, had likened the papall see to the beast rising out of the sea in the Apocalypse. At length, when the emperour after much sute made to the pope at Auinion, could not obtaine his coronation; comming to Rome, was there receiued with great honor, where he with his wife were both crowned by the full consent of all the lords and cardinals there; and moreouer, another pope there set vp, called Nicolas the fifth. After which things done, the pope not long after departed at Auinion in France, after whom succeeded then Vrbanus the twelfth, a monke of Benedicts order, and raigned seuen yeares. Who by the counsell of Philip the French king, confirmed and prosecuted the censures and curssings that Iohn his predecessour had published against Lewes the emperour: Moreouer, deprined him of his emperiall crowne, and also of his duke dome of Bauaria. The emperour vpon this comming to Germanie, and assembling the princes electors, dukes, bishops, nobles, and the learned in a councell at Francfort: there declared before them out of the ancient lawes and customes of the empire, how it standeth only in the princes Electors, and in none other to elect the kings or the emperours of the Romanes (for in both these names was no difference) so that the same Electours in chusing the king of the Romanes, his also elect and chuse the emperour. Which emperour so by them constituted had lawfull right, without anie information of the apostolicall see, to exercise the administration of the empire. And if he were lawfullie elect, ought to bee annointed of the Romane bishop: which if he doe refuse, then might he be annointed and declared emperour and Augustus by anie other Catholike bishop there-unto appointed (as by the old manner and custome hath been) especially seeing these inuentions are but certaine scismatikes added and inuented by the bishops, onely for a token of vnitie betweene the church and empire, to gouerne and defend the faith together. Wherefore in that the emperour sweareth to the bishop of Rome; in that is to be vnderstood no homage or fealtie made to the bishop, but onelie is a Sacrament and a promise giuen to defend the faith. The which oth or sacrament so giuen, giueth no maiestie to the pope in any temporall rule, but onely bindeth the emperor to be prest and readie to defend the faith and church of Christ, wherunto shall require obedience. Wherefore, whereas the pope sought nouelties to the clergie and iurisdictie, to make the king of Romans, and taketh vpon himselfe alone to make the emperour, that as it is newly brought in and deuised a late by pope Clement the 5. so is it contrarie both to all ancient order, and also derogatorie to the libertie and maiestie of the sacred empire. Again, neither is that also lesse absurd and contrarie to all right and reason; that the pope in time of the imperiall seate being vacant, falleth vpon him to haue the whole and full bonds of the empire, as lawfull emperour for time. Which pretogatiue and function, by ancient orders of our fore-elders, should properlie and onely appertaine to the Palatine of Rhene, the Constitution Clementine of the foresaid pope Clement to the contrarie notwithstanding. Then in the end for his owne excuse, hee in the presence of them all reciteth the publike confession of his faith, to auoyde and purge himselfe of those obiections laid to him by the pope. This did the meeke emperour Ludouicke in that councell: Yet all this notwithstanding, the said emperour remained still excommunicate, till time variance fell betweene this pope Benedict and Philip the French king. Wherefore to make his partie good, at least to haue some friends to stie to; he began to pretend fauour and absolution, rather for necessitie, then for any good will he bare vnto the emperour. But not long after, this pope died: of whom this Epitaph was made.

Pope Clement the sixth.

After whom followed pope Clement the sixth, a man most furious and cruell. Who renuing against the former excommunications of his former predecessors, caused his letters to be set vp on church doores, wherein he threatned and denounced most terrible thunderbolts against the said Lewes the emperour, vnlesse within three daies hee should satisfie to God and the church, and renounce the imperial possession of the crowne. The Emperour vpon this, commeth to Francfort, where there readie to him all things to the ordinance of the pope: sent hether his Oratours to the court of Rome, to intreat the pope of his fauour and good will towards him. To the which messengers the pope answered againe, that he would neuer pardon the emperour, before he gaue ouer and confessed his errors and hereses, and resigning vp his empire to his hands, would submit himselfe, his children, and all his goods to the will and pleasure of the bishop, promising that he should not receiue againe any part of the same, but vpon his good grace, as his will should be to restore them.

The other bishops electors, as the archbishop of Colen, which tooke eight thousand marks, with the duke of Saxonie, which tooke two thousand marks, being corrupted with monie by Iohn king of Boheme; elected Charles the sonne of the said Iohn, whom pope Clement elsewhere in his constitute did approoue. Who seeth not here what matter was wrought by the pope of Warre and bloudshed betweene these two emperours, if the patience of Ludouicke had not been more prudent to quench the fire, then the pope was to kindle it? Charles then the new emperour elect, sped him to Aquisgraue, according to the custome, there to be crowned. But by the Citizens there, and the empresse (a Bauarre) his wife keeping thereabout) was repelled. All this happened in the time and raigne of Edward the third, king of England, with whom the said Charles, with the French king, and king of Boheme, set on by the pope, encountred in warre, where the king of England had against them a noble victorie, and slue a great number of the Frenchmen and Almaines, and put Charles the new emperour to flight. In the meane time, among the princes and cities of Germanie what foreknowing what complaints were against pope Clement and those electors, it cannot bee expressed. For as they were al together at Spires congregated in a generall assemblie, so there was none among them all, that allowed the election of Charles, or that cared for the popes processe, promising all to abhere and continue faithfull subiects to Ludouicke their lawfull emperour. But Ludouicke remembring his oth made before to the popes bill, voluntarilie and wilingly gaue ouer his imperiall dignitie, and went to Burgraula, where shortlie after, through the procured practise of pope Clement (as Hieronymus Marius doth write) poison was giuen him to drinke. After the which being drunke, when he would haue vomited out and could not; take his horse and went to hunt the beare, thereby through the chafing and heat of his bodie he sweat in him. And there the good and gentle emperour wickedly persecuted and murdered of the pope fell downe dead, whom I may well recount among the innocent and blessed martyrs of Christ. For if the cause being righteous doth make a martyr, what papist can iustlie disproue his cause or faith? If persecution ioyned thereunto causeth martyrdome, what martyr could be more persecuted then he? hauing three popes like three hand-bogges vpon him, at length was deuoured by the same. The princes then hearing of his death, assembled themselues to a new election: who refusing Charles afore said, elected another for emperour, named Gunterus de Monte Nigro. Who shortlie after falling sicke at Francfoord through his physitions seruant was likewise poisoned, whom the foresaid Charles had hired with money to make that feate. Gunterus falling of the poison, although he vsed practise cast it vp again, yet so much remained within him, as made him vnable afterward to serue that place. Wherefore for concords sake being counselled thereto by the Germaines, gaue ouer his empire to Charles. For else, great bloudshed was like to ensue. This Charles thus ambitiouslie aspiring to the emperiall seate contrarie to the minds of the Estates, and peeres of the empire, as hee did vnlawfullie come by it: so vnaduisedly he vsed the same. By reason wherof, the tribute of the countries of Germanie, which then belonged onelie to the emperour, for the sustentation of his warres; euer since to this day is dispersed diuerslie into the hands of the princes, and free cities within the said monarchie. So that both the empire being dismembred and left desolate, and the emperours treasurie drawne dry; haue neither been able sufficientlie since to defend themselues, nor yet to resist the Turke, or other forraine enemies. Wherevpon a great part, as ye haue heard, may bee imputed vnto the popes, &c. Hieronymus Marius.

OConcerning the acts and storie of king Edward the 2. his deposing and cruell death, wrought by the false & counterfeit letter of sir Roger Mortimer, sent in the kings name to the keepers (for the which he was after charged, drawn, & quartered.) I have written sufficiently before, and more peraduenture then the profession of this ecclesiasticall historie will well admit. Notwithstanding for certaine respects, and causes, I thought somewhat to exceed my limits herein the more, thereby both kings and such as clime to be about them may take the better example by the same, the one to haue the loue of his subiects: the other to learne to flee ambition, and not to beare themselues too brag of their fortune and state, how high soeuer it be: Considering with themselues nothing to be in this world so firme and sure, that may promise it selfe any certaine continuance, and is not in perpetuall danger of mutation vnlesse it bee fastened by God his protection.

After the suppression of this king, as is aboue expressed, Edward his sonne was crowned king of England, being about the yeere of 15. and raigned the space of 50. yeeres, who was a prince of much and great temperance. In feates of armes very expert, and no lesse fortunate and luckie in all his warres, as his father was infortunate before him. In liberalitie also and clemencie worthilie commended, likewise in all princely vertues, famous and excellent. Concerning the memorable acts of which prince, bone both in warres and peace, as how he subdued the Scots, had great victories by the sea, how he conquered France, An. 1332. won Calice, an. 1348. and translated the staple thither, tooke the French king prisoner, and how the French armes first by him were brought in, and conioyned with the English armes; also how the order of the Garter first by the said king was inuented and ordained, an. 1256. also an. 1357. how the king in his parliament at Nottingham, decreed, that all such in Flanders or other where, that had skill in making cloth, should peaceablie inhabite the land and be welcome. For those yeeres before that, it was enacted, that no woll should be transported ouer the sea. Which was to bridle the pride of the Flemmings, who then loued better the sacks of wol, then the natiue of Englishmen. All these with other noble acts of this worthie prince, although in other chronicles they be fullie intreated of: yet according to that order I haue begun (saying somethat of each kings raigne, although not pertinent to our ecclesiasticall historie) I haue here inserted the same, making but few other notes, thereby to compend the fullie abridging them out of diuers and sundry authors together compacted, mentioned in this wise.

The coronation and solemnitie of king Edward the third, and all the pomp thereof was no sooner ended: but Robert of Bruce king of Scotland, vnderstanding the state and gouernment of the realme to bee (as it was indeed) in the queene, the young king, the earle of Kent, and sir Roger Mortimer: And that the lords and barons, as hee was informed, did scarslie well agree amongst themselues (although he greatlie nolo it age, and was troubled with the falling disease) yet thought he this a meet time for his purpose, to make inuasion: Hoping for as good successe and like victorie now, as but lately before he had at the castle of Saltrinkin. Whereupon about the feast of Easter he sent his embassadours with heralds and letters of defiance to the young king Edward the third, the queene and the counsell; declaring that his purpose was with fire and sword to enter and inuade the realme of England, &c. The king, queene, and counsell hearing this bold defiance, commanded in all speedie preparation musters to bee made throughout all the realme: appointing to euery band captains conuenient, and at the citie of Yorke by a day assigned them, commanding euery man to be with all their necessarie furniture readie and threughly prouided. They directed their letters also with all speed to sir John of Heinault, requiring him with such soldiers and men at armes as hee might conuenientlie prouide in Flanders, Heisault, and Brabant, to meet the king and queene vpon the Ascension day next ensuing at their citie of Yorke.

The king and queene made speedie preparation for this expedition: the noble men prouided themselues of all things necessarie thereunto: the English captaines and soulders (their bands throughlie furnished) were readie at their appointed time and place: sir John of Heinault, lord Beomount mustering his men as fast. was readie to take shipping: there at Wpsant (in English Wthons) there lying for him readie) hee went aboard, and with a merrie wind landed at Douer, trauelling from thence by small iournies dailie, till he came within thrée daies after the feast of Pentecost to the citie of Yorke: there the king and queene with a great power of 60000 men (within and about the citie of Yorke) expected his comming: Before whom, in curteous wise he presented himselfe, and mustred his troope, wherein he had to the number of 500. good men at armes well appointed and mounted. His comming and furniture was well liked both of the king king and queene, and was by the Harbinger, appointed to be lodged with his houshold retinue in the abbie of white monks. Mo be sticke, such grudge and variance fell betweene some of the kings souldiers and his, within the suburbes of the towne being together lodged; that from the tilte to the more, whilest the king and queene with diuers other of the nobles, (strangers and others) were at dinner; the said frap so greatlie increased, that the whole armie so many as were in the towne then lodged, stod to their fence; so that there were slaine of the English archers in short space by the strangers to the number of 300. men. Wherevpon grew (after the frap was with much difficultie both of the king and queene ended) such heartburning betweene the parties; as that the number of 6000. conspired together against them: thinking to haue burnt them in their lodgings, had they not ben by the great grace of God and discreet handling, otherwise preuented and let. Whereupon the Heynoulders were faine to take and keepe the field, vsing as diligent watch and ward, as though they had ben among their hostile enemies. After this, the king set forward his armie toward Durham, and encamped himselfe neere about the same: who also sent the lord Mowbraie and the lord Spounley to Carell with a sufficient companie to keepe that entrance: and also the lord marshall of England to keepe the towne of Newcastle with a sufficient companie to defend the same, and the countrie adioyning. For well knew the king, that by one of these two entries, the Scots must passe into England, standing both of them vpon the riuer of Tine, 24. miles distant.

But the Scots priuilie with their armie passed the riuer betwixt the two townes into England, few vnderstanding thereof, till that the great fires which the Scots had kindled and made in England bewraied them: who came burning and destroying the countrie all about as farre as Stanop parke. This thing being declared to the king, hee commandeth his host with all speed to march towards them, which so long trauailed that they came in sight each of other. The king also commanded the passages of the riuer to be so straitly and narrowly garded, that by no meanes the Scots could retire and haue escaped backe againe into Scotland, without battell giuen them of the king. But the Scots vnderstanding the great power the king was of, kept alwaies the aduantage of the hils, retiring in the nights from one to another: that without great odds and aduantage in the one side and hazard to the other, the king could not set vpon them.

Thus in the day time the Scots keeping the aduantage of the hilles, and in the night times retiring to the aduantage of such other like, came neere against that riuer where they first passed ouer, where they made a shew to offer battell to the king vpon the morrow. Whereupon the king being busied in putting his men and battels in a readinesse to fight the next morning, being almost forewearied in pursuing the Scots from place to place: the Scots in the meane season gat ouer the riuer and escaped the danger of the king. Which thing as it could not bee done, without great treason of some neere about the king, so sir Roger Mortimer was grieuously suspected thereof, and after was laid vnto his charge. But to be short, by this meanes the Scots escaped the riuer, after whom it should haue availed the king very little to haue made pursuit, as the wille Scots knew full well. For the loy whereof, the lord William Douglas one of the Scots Generals, with 200. horses gaue a larum in the kings campe: and came so neere, that he cut certaine of the lines of the kings tent in sunder with his sword, and retired to his companie without great losse of any of his men. Then on the morrow the king perceiuing the Scots to be gone, came to the place where ouer night they lodged, where were found 500. great orcn and nine readie hilles: fiue hundred Cauldrons made of brasse skimmes full of flesh, ouer the fire seething: a thousand spits full of flesh ready to bee rosted, and more then 10000. shoes of raw leather (the haire still vpon the same) which the Scots had left behind them: and fiue poore English prisoners tied to trees and their legs broken. All which the king seeing returned with his armie, and left any further pursuing the Scots) to Durham: where hee dismissed his armie, and came againe to London, sending with sir John of Heinault two hundred men at armes for their better safegard against the English archers (with whom at Poyk, as you haue heard, they fraied) till they had taken shipping, and so returned home.

The king then being at London, confirmed the liberties of the Citizens, and ordained that the Maior should sit in all places as cheefe Justice within the liberties of the same. And that what alderman soeuer had ben Maior before, should be a Justice of peace within his alderward.

Then the king, the queene, and the counsell sent ouer to the Earle of Heynault certaine embassadours, touching the solemnization of the marriage betweene the king and the ladie Philip his daughter: who in such sort sped their message, that the was same after conueied ouer to England very honourablie, and at Douer arriued. And from thence came to London (some chronicles affirme to Poske) where vpon the day of the conuersion of S. Paul, the rere above specified, the marriage and cozonation of the queene was with much triumph during the space of three weekes solemnized.

After which cozonation and marriage, the king let common his parliament to be kept at Northampton: whereat by the meanes of sir Roger Mortimer and the old queene, a peace was purchased for the Scots (who had so that purpose sent their embassadours, so foure peeres to indure. Also the king (then being within age) granted to release the Scots of all their homage and fealtie which vnto the realme of England by their charter enfeoffed they were bound: as also their indenture, which was called the Ragman Role, wherein was specified the foresaid homage and fealtie to the king and crowne of England, by the said king of Scots, nobles, and prelates to be made: hauing all their seales annexed to the same. Also there was then deliuered vnto them, the blacke crosse of Scotland, which king Edward before so: a rich Jewell and relique had conquered and brought from Scone Abbey: with all such rights and titles as any the barons else had enioyed in the said realme of Scotland, with many other things more, to the great preiudice both of the realme and discontentation of all the nobles and barons for the most part, more then the old queene, sir Roger Mortimer, and the bishop of Elie. Who in such sort ruled the roft, that all the rest of the nobles and barons, cast with themselues how best they might redresse and remedie the great inconueniences, that vnto the realme by meanes of them grew and happened. Whereupon the king and queene and sir Roger Mortimer, caused another parliament to be called at Salisbury, where the said sir Roger Mortimer was made earle of March, against all the barons wils, to preuent and disappoint the foresaid purpose of them; but the Earle Henrie of Lancaster with others, would not bee at the same: wherefore it was said vnto their charges, that they went about to conspire the kings death.

And further, for that the king was as well vnder the gouernment of the earle of Kent his vncle, as the queene his mother, and the earle of March: and for that they could not doe in all things as they listed for the said earle the kings vncle, who tuned the king and the realme: enuie began to rise betweene the earle Mortimer and him, and by Isabell the queenes practise, he found the meanes to perswade the king: that the earle of Kent (to inioy the crowne, as next heire vnto the king) went about to poison him. Whereunto the king giuing light credit, caused his said vncle to bee apprehended: and without anie making to his accusation and accusers, to be beheaded at Winchester, the third of Maober, and third yeere of his raigne. But the iust iudgement of God not permitting such odious crimes in him to be vnpunished, nor detected, so in fine fell so:th, that Isabell the old queene the kings mother, was found and vnderstood to be with child by the said Mortimer. Complaint hereof was made to the king, as also of the killing of king Edward his father, and of the conspiracy of him against the earle of Kent the kings vncle before put to death: Whereupon, diuers other articles laid against him and manifestlie read in the court, he was arraigned and indited, and by verdit found guiltie: hauing his iudgement as in cases of high treason, and suffered death accordinglie at London: where, vpon London bridge next vnto Spenders, his head obtained a place. The queene his mother alsa (by good aduice of his counsell) was restrained of her libertie, and within a certaine castle not permitted once to come abroad: Vnto whom the king her sonne, once or twice a yeere would resort, and visit.

This yeere, prince Edward was borne at Windsocke, who in processe of time and yeeres grew to be a most valiant prince, and was before hee died, accounted throughout the world the follower of chiualrie.

After this, the king prepared another armie into Scotland in the yeere prefixed. But first hee summoned king Dauid of Scotland, who had in the last truce, foure yeeres to continue as you heard, his father then liuing) married the ladie Jane, sister to the king (termed Jane make peace) to do his homage to the king: but that he refused. Whereupon, not forgetting there with all the scalding teares, which daily from that time of truce the Scots had in their mouthes: he did so much, that with an armie well furnished, hee entred Scotland by the riuer of Ewede, for the Scots had then the possession of the keies of Barwicke: the Scottish gigges and rymes were these: Long beards heartlesse, Painted hoods witlesse, Gay coats gracelesse, Gates England thriftlesse. To be short, the king wasted the land, burnt, destroyed, and tooke townes and castles with small resistance or none: in the space of fiue moneths together did in that land what him listed without any battell offered to him. For the king of Scots was but a child and not aboue the age of 15. yeeres, and wanted good captains that should haue defended the realme: insomuch that they were all faine, sauing those that kept in holds for their defence, to take the forest of Godwoorth, and there kept to themselues so long as the king remained in Scotland. Who at length when he had sufficiently wasted, and spoiled, and burnt the same, returned toward Barwicke, about the which he bent his siege, bowing not to remoone the same till he had gotten the towne.

assaults made, were contented vpon certaine conditions to haue deliuer. d vp the towne: But that the king refused, vnlesse that all conditions set apart, they would with bagge and baggage depart. Whereupon they condescended to the king, that if by a certaine time they were not by the king of Scots rescued, they would render vp the towne, and with bagge and baggage depart: and so the time expired, frustrate of all hope and reskue, at the day appointed they did. The king then entred the towne and tarried there the space of twelue daies: the after hee had appointed sir Edward Bailleu captaine ouer the towne, and leauing also behind him other knightes, squires, and souldiers, as well to keepe the same as other holds the king had conquered in Scotland and frontiers thereof; hee returned with his people towards London, permitting euery man to depart and goe what way them liked.

The king entreth the towne of Berwicke and appointeth the captaine thereof.

Then sir Robert de Artois, a noble man of France, and which defended of the bloud royall, being in England vith the king, ceased not at ventimes to aduertise the king, and put him in mnemonic of his god and right title to the inheritance of the crowne of France. This sir Robert for a certaine displeasure that Philip the French king tooke against him for a certaine plea which by him was moued before the king, was fain for the safegard of his life to flee the realme of France, and so come to the kings court. King Edward was not vnwilling at all to heare thereof, but tooke delight at ventimes to reason and debate that matter with him concerning his right, title, and inheritance to the crowne of France. But yet notwithstanding hee thought it not good to make any attempt thereunto without aduised and circumspect counsell, for that it contained matter o&n small, but most difficult importance: neither yet hee tooke it to deserue the fame either of wisdome or prowesse to let so good a title die, or so fit opportunitie to passe. Wherefore hee calling together certaine of his counsell, vsed their deliberate aduices touching the seriousnesse of this matter. In fine, it was by them thought good, that the king should send certaine embassadours our to the earle of Heinault, whose daughter hee had married, as well to heare his aduice and counsell herein: as also of what friends and aid, by him and his meanes, in this so great an expedition hee begun in the empire, to him might be procured. The king hereunto condescended, and appointed for this embassage the bishop of Lincolne with two other Barenets, and two doctors: who in such speedie wise made their voyage, that in short space they returned againe to the king with this answer: That not onely the earle his counsell and aduice, should be herein prest to the king of England their master, but also the whole countrie of Heinault. And further, for that to such an expedition as appertained, hee said, the province of Heinault was but a small matter to make account of; hee would procure for the king greater aid and friendship in the empire, as the duke of Brabant his cosin germane, and a puissant prince, the duke of Guerles, the archbishop of Colovne, the Marques of Iulliers, &c. which are all good men of warre, and able to make ten thousand fighting men, saith he. Which answer well liked the king, and made him ioyous thereof. But this counsell of the king as secret as it was, came to Philip the French kings eares: whereupon hee staied the voiage of the Croise which then hee had in hand, sending forth counternands to stay the same, till hee knew farther the purpose of the king of England.

Embassadours are sent to the Earle of Heinault concerning the matter.

The Embassadors returne with answere from the earle that pleaseth the king.

King Philip of France heareth of the kings purpose and therefore his voiage of the Croisie.

The king herupon himself taketh shipping accompanied as to a king appertained: and when hee had consulted with all the foresaid lords of the empire in this matter and vnderstood their sidelitie; hee made his repaire to the emperour, at whose handes he was well intertained and honorable received, whom the emperor appointed to be his lieutenant generall, hauing thereby more authoritie both to will and command such as for this his expedition hee trusted vnto, and had made conuention with. This hearing Philip, prepared his armie and rigged his nauie, that so soone as the king should enter into the dominion of France, they also might enter into England, requiting like for like.

King Edward appointed lieutenant generall of the empire.

The king of England, after the feast of S. John Baptist, according to his purpose, prepared all things readie to such an expedition, conducting his armie and gathering a greater strength in the empire, as before to him was promised, being the emperours authoritie therein, as his lieutenant generall, the bowbreit at the charge altogether of the king of England. The French king as soone as king Edward had landed his armie at Mackline in Flanders, and hearing of the defiance, which the king and other noble men of the empire had sent vnto him: sent certaine ships lying readie thereunto, and waiting for such opportunitie vpon the coast of England, did so much, that vpon a sunday, whilest the townes men were at the church little looking for any such matter, entred the hauen of Southhampton, tooke the towne and spoiled the same, deflowred maidens, enforced wiues, burnt, kild, tooke captiues, and carried away rich spoiles and great buties to their ships, and so againe departed into France. Further, as the king of England had allied himself with the noble men of the empire, and had the friendly fauour of the emperour also thereunto: so the French king made the like league and alliance with Dauid the king of Scots, whom the king had so hardlie dealt withall in Scotland (as partly before you heard) and kept the most part of Scotland vnder his subiection: Minding the said Dauid as well by writing as oth and pledge, that without his consent hee should make no peace nor concludo any truce with the king of England. Who againe assured him of aid, and reskue, and helpe, and to recouer his kingdome and dominion to his vse: and forthwith sent certaine garisons and bands into Scotland to keepe play with the Englishmen, and there to fortifie diuers places till further opportunitie serued. He also fortified with men, mony, victuall, and munition, the towne of Cambrey: which hee suspected would be besieged, lying so neere vpon the empire as indeed it came to passe. For, king Edward departing from Dacheline, set forward his host towards Heinault, and by the way assembled such power, as in the empire hee looked for, marching forward still till that they came to Cambrey, and it besieged with 40000. men: while that with another companie, the Flemings, Brabanters, and Hollanders, went to S. Quintin. But in effect, neither there, nor at Cambrey nor else where, any thing notorious was atchieued. But the summer being well spent and little preuailing in the siege of Cambrey, being of situation strong and well defenced therewithall with men and munition; brake vp the siege, and marched further into the heart of France towards Sutterell. Which thing the French king hauing vnderstanding of, prepared himselfe to giue battell to the king of England, who with another great armie came to Viromfolle, where daies were appointed to meete in battell: but in the end, nothing was done nor attempted betweene the princes. And the king of England (without any battell either giuing or taking) returned with his armie from thence to Gaunt. Concerning the cause of the sudden remouing of the king out of France, it seemeth most specially to rise of the pope: which at the same time sent downe his legats, for the order of a peace to be taken betweene the kings. At Gaunt were gathered by the kings appointment all the nobles & well of England, as of the empire in counsell together what was best to be done. Where plaine answere was made to the king of England, that vnlesse hee would take vpon him the claime and title of France, as his lawfull inheritance and as king thereof prosecute his warres; it might not bee lawfull for them any further, to aide the king of England, or to fight with him against the French king: for that the pope had bound them in two millions of florences of gold, and vnder paine of excommunication, that they should not fight against the lawfull king of France. Whereupon, the king thought good therefore presently to make open challenge to the realme and crowne of France: and further, to quarter and intermingle the armes of France, with the armes of England in one Scutchen. Whereupon eftsoones king Edward made answere vnto the pope againe, directing vnto him his letters, wherein hee declareth at large his right and title vnto the crowne of France, purging thereby himselfe and his cause vnto the bishop. The copie and tenour of which letter, because it is so long to expresse, it is to be found in the storie of Thom. Walsingham remaining in the librarie of I. Stephenson citizen of London, who so hath list or leisure to peruse the same. Besides this letter to the pope he directed another to the peeres and prelats of France (he remaining yet at Gaunt) in tenour as followeth.

The letter of king Edward to the nobles and commons of France.

King Edward to the nobles and commons of France.

EDward by the grace of God king of France and of England, lord of Ireland. Vnto all prelats and the ecclesiastical persons, to the peeres, dukes, earles, barons, and to the commons of France, greeting. The high lord and king aboue, to whom although his will be in his owne power, yet would that power should be subiect vnto law: commanding euery thing to be giuen vnto him which is his, declaring thereby that iustice and iudgemēt ought to be the preparation of the kings seat. Wherfore seeing the kingdome of France through the prouidence of God by the death of Charles last king of France of famous memorie, brother germane to our ladie mother, is fallen vnto vs by laland and manifest law: And forsomuch that lord Philip de Valois, being the sonne of the vncle of the foresaid king, and so being farre from the crowne by a farther degree of consanguinitie; through force and vsurpation hath intruded himselfe in the foresaid kingdome (whilest wee were yet in our minoritie) and so contrarie both to God and to iustice doth detaine and occupie the same: And left wee should seeme to neglect our owne right and the gift giuen vs of God, or not to submit our will to Gods ordinance: We haue thought good to acknowledge the title of France, and by supportation of the almightie king haue taken vpon vs the defence and regiment of the said kingdome: Firmely purposing with our selues (as euery good man ought to doe) great iustice to minister iustice to euery one, according to the rites and laudable custome of the foresaid kingdome. Also to renew the good lawes and customes which haue been in the time of Ludouicke our progenitour, adding to moreouer, that which shall seeme expedient according next about the king, bid Salsonie his fole, to insinuate the vnderstanding thereof by subtilties of couert words, which was thus: As the foresaid fole being in the kings presence, and was talking of many things; among other talke, hee sodden-ly brast out (being prompt by others) into a vehement railing of the Englishmen, calling them cowards and dastards, with many such opprobrious words tending to that effect. The king not knowing whereunto the words of the foole did appertain; asked the foole, why he called the Englishmen such weaklings and cowards, &c. Why, saith the foole: Because the fearefull and cowardlie Englishmen had not the hearts to leape into the sea so lustilie, as our Normans, and gentlemen of France had. Whereby the French king began to vnderstand the victorie of his part to bee loss, and the English men to bee victorers.

The words of the foole to the French king.

This victorie atchieued, the fame thereof spreading abroad in England, first was not beleeued till letters thereof came from the king to prince Edward his son, being then at Walsham, directed to the bishops and prelats of the realme: the effect of which letters here followeth vnder written.

The letters of king Edward to the bishops of England.

THe bountifull benignitie of Gods great clemencie powred vpon vs of late, for your true certification, and reioycing wee thought good to intimat vnto you. It is not vnknown (we suppose) to you, and to other our faithfull subiects, which also haue been partakers with vs of the same, with what stormes of boysterous warres of late we haue been tossed and shaken, as in the great Ocean. But although the rising surges of the sea be marueilous, yet more marueilous is the Lord aboue: who turning the tempest into a calme, in so great dangers, so mercifully hath respected vs. For whereas we of late did ordaine our passage vpon vrgent causes, into Flanders: the lord Philip de Valois our bitter ennemie vnderstanding therof, laid against vs a mightie nauie of ships, intending thereby either to take vs, or at least to stop our voyage. Which voyage if it had been staid, it had been the cutting off of all the great enterprises by vs intended and taken in hand, and moreouer wee our selues brought to a great confusion. But the God of mercies seeing vs so distressed in such perils and dangers, hath graciously and beyond mans expectation sent to vs great succour and strength of fighting souldiers, and a prosperous wind after our owne desires. By the meanes and helpe whereof, wee set out of the hauen into the seas, where wee eftsoones perceiued our enemies well appointed and prepared with a maine multitude to set vpon vs, vpon midsummer day last past. Against whom notwithstanding, Christ our Lord and Sauiour hath rendred to vs the victorie, through a strong and vehement conflict. In the which conflict, a mightie number of our enemies were destroyed, and well neere all their whole Nauie was taken: with some losse also of our part, but nothing like in comparison to theirs. By reason whereof, we doubt not but our passage by the seas hereafter shall be more quiet and safe for our subiects, and also many other commodities shall ensue thereof, as wee haue good cause to hope well of the same. For which cause we deuoutly considering the heauenly grace so mercifullie wrought vpon vs, do render most humble thanks and praise to Christ our Lord and Sauiour. Beseeching him, that as he hath been and alwaies is readie to preuent our necessities in time of opportunitie, so he will continue his helping hand euer towards vs, and so to direct vs here temporally, that wee may raigne and ioy with him in heauen eternally. And in like sort we require your charitie that you also with vs rising vp to the praise of God alone, who hath begun so fauourable to work with vs to our goodnesse, in your prayers and diuine seruice doe instantlie recommend vs vnto the Lord, trauelling here in these forren countries, and studying to recouer not onely our right here in France: but also to aduance the whole catholicke Church of Christ and to rule our people in iustice. And that also yee call vpon the clergie and people, euery one through his diocesse to doe the same, inuocating the name of our Sauiour, that of his mercie hee will giue to vs his humble seruant a docible heart, so to iudge and rule hereupon rightly, doing that which hee hath commanded: that at length wee may attaine to that which he hath promised, &c. Which letter was written to the bishops and prelats, an. 1340.

The French men drawn vpon the sea.

After this foresaid victorie vpon the sea, and newes thereof, with due thanks to our Sauiour, sent into England: the king striking into Flanders, came to Gaunt in Brabant where hee had left the queene, who in safelie receiued him, being a little before purified & churched, as wee terme it, of her fourth sonne, whose name was Iohn, and commonly called Iohn of Gaunt, and was earle of Richmond, and duke of Lancaster. At Antwerpe the king assembled his councell, whereat the noble men of Flanders, Brabant and Hennalt conioyning together in most firme league the one to helpe and defend the other, with the king of England, against the French king, purposing and determining from thence to march toward Cambray and it to besiege. But the French king vnderstanding their counsell fortified and victualled the same before their comming thither. Furthermore the said French king the same time to stop the siege of king Edward, sent with king Dauid of of Scotland a great power, to that intent to make inuasion in England, thereby the sooner to cause the king to remoue his siege. In the meane time while king Edward wrote his letters to Philip de Valois, making vnto him certaine requests, as in the same his letters here following is to bee seene: who for that he wrote not vnto him as king of France, but by the name of Philip de Valois, refused to answer him touching the same, as by their letters hereplaced may be seene.

The letter of the king of England, to Philip de Valois, the French king, going to the siege of Turnaie.

The letter of king Edward to the French king.

PHilip de Valois, of long time we haue gently requested you by our embassadors (yea al the reasonable meanes we might) to that intent you should haue rendred vnto vs our lawfull right and inheritance to the crowne of France, which from vs a long time you haue by great wrong and force detained. And for that we will perceiue you meane to persuere in the same your purpose and iniurious detinue, without making any reasonable answere to our demand: Wee let you vnderstand, that we are entred into the countrie of Flanders, as the soueraigne lord of the same, and so passe through the countrie. And further signifie vnto you, how that by the helpe of our Sauiour Iesus Christ and our righteous cause therein, and with the power of the said countrie, our people, and allies; we purpose to recouer the right which wee haue to that inheritance you detaine from vs by your iniurious force, and therefore approch we towards you to make a short end of this our rightfull challenge, if you also will doe the like. And for that so great an host assembled which we bring with vs on our part (supposing you also on the other part to doe the like) cannot long remaine together without great destruction both to our people and countrie, which thing euery good Christian ought to eschew: especially Princes and others which haue the gouernment of the same, auoiding by as short an end as may be, the mortalitie of Christian men, according as the quarrell is apparant between you and me. For the which causes heere touched, let the challenge (if you thinke meet) betweene our owne persons and bodies be discussed, that the great nobility and prowesse of each other, may of euery one be seene. And if you refuse this way, then let there (to finish this challenge) be an hundred of the best souldiours you can chuse out of your part, matched with so many of our liege subiects to try the same. And if of these two waies you refuse both the one and the other, then that you will assigne vnto vs a certaine day before the towne of Turney, to fight with vs power against power, which may be within ten daies next ensuing after the date of these our letters: offering the said conditions vnto you aboue specified (as we would all the world to know and vnderstand) not vpon any egeoile, presumption or pride wee take therein, but for the causes before alleaged, and to the end that (the will of our Sauiour Iesus Christ betwixt vs two herein declared and shewed) rest and peace might grow amongst Christian men: the power and force of Gods enemies abated and in fine, the limites of Christianitie enlarged and entranchised. And therefore hereupon consider with your selfe what way you will take concerning our foresaid offers, and by the bearers of these our letters send vnto vs herein quicke and speedie answere. Giuen vnder our great seale at Chyn in the plaine of Leee the 27. day of this present month of July.

The answer of the lord Philip de Valois vnto the letter aforesaid.

The answere of the French king to king Edwards demands.

PHilip by the grace of God, king of France, to Edward king of England. We haue seene the letters which you haue sent vnto our court to Philip de Valois, wherein are contained certaine requests which you make to the said Philip de Valois. But for that the said letters came not as directed vnto vs, neither yet the said requests seeme to bee made vnto vs (which thing clearely by the tenour of the said letters appeareth) wee therefore write vnto you no answere touching the same. Notwithstanding, this sufficeth, that we vnderstand by the said letters of yours, as also otherwaies, that you are entred into our realme of France, to the great damage both vnto vs, our realme and people (more proceeding of will, then reason) and not regarding that which a liegeman ought to doe vnto his lord. For you are entred into our homage by you lieged vnto vs, acknowledging your selfe, as reason is, a liege man vnto the king of France: and haue promised vnto vs such obeisance as men are wont to doe vnto their liege lords (as more plainely by your letters patents appeareth, enseald with your great seale) the which wee haue with vs: for the which thing wee will you to vnderstand; that our purpose is (when it shall seeme good vnto vs) to driue you out of our realme, to the honour both of vs and our kingdome, and to the profit and commoditie of our people. And this thing to doe we haue firme and assured hope in Iesus Christ, from whom we haue all our power and strength. For, by your vnreasonable demand more wilfull then reasonable, hath been hindred and staied the holy voiage to those parts of beyond the seas, where a great number of Christian men haue been slaine: the diuine seruice diminished, and the seruice of the Church lesse reuerenced. And as touching that where you say, Ye intend to haue the obeisance of the Flemmings, we thinke and beleeue that the good people and commons of that countrie will behaue themselues in such sort toward our cosin the Countesse of Flanders their Ladie, as it be not to their reprochand to vs their soueraigne lord, they will respect their honour and loyaltie. And that thing wherein they haue done otherwise then well hitherto, hath bin by the euill counsell of such people, as neither regard the weale publike, nor honour of their countrie, but their owne onelie gaine and commoditie. Giuen in the field neere adioyning to the priorie of S. Andrew, vnder our priuie seale, in absence of our great seale, the 30. day of Iulie, Anno 1340.

The Scots inuade England.

Mention was made a little before of Dauid king of Scots, whom the French king had supported and stirred vp against the king and realme of England: which Dauid (with the aid of the Scots and Frenchmen) did so much preuaile, that they recouered almost against all Scotland, which before he had lost, and was constrained to line in the fastest of Gedworth many yeeres before. Then inuaded they England, and came with their armie, waisting and burning the countrie before them, till they came as far as Durham, and then returned againe into Scotland, where they recouered all their holds again, sauing the towne of Barwike. Edenbrough they took by a stratagem or subtill deuice practised by Douglas and certaine other: who apparelling themselues in poore mens habite, as victuallers with come, and prouender, and other things, demanded the porter earlie in the morning what need they had thereof. Who nothing mistrusting opened the outward gate, where they should tarrie till the captaine rose: and perceiuing the porter to haue the keies of the inward gate, threw downe their sackes in the outward gate, that it might not be shut againe, and slew the porter, taking from him the keies of the towne. Then they blew their horne as a warning to the bands, which priuilie they had laid not farre off: who in haste wise comming, and finding the gates readie opened entred vpon the sudden and killed as many as them resisted, and so obtained against the citie of Edenbrough.

Edenbrough recouered from the Englishmen by the Scots.

The Scots thus being busie in England, the French king in the meane season gathered together a puissant power, purposing to remoue the siege from Turney: and among other, sent for the king of Scots, who came to him with great force, besides diuers other nobles and men of France: insomuch that the French king had a great armie, and brought himselfe able enough to raise the siege, and thither bent his host. But the French king for all this his so great huge power and force, durst not yet to neere approch the king, as either to giue him battel, or else remoue his siege: but kept himselfe with his armie aloofe, in a place for his better defence. And notwithstanding the king of England hasted, burnt, spoiled and destroyed the countrie, twentie miles in manner compasse about Turney, and take diuers and sundrie strong townes and holds, as Mortois, Arses, Grency, Archies, Odint, S. Amand, and the town of Lille, where he slew aboue three hundred men of armes. And about S. Omers, he slew and tooke of noble men, the lord of Dufluine, of Mauritelor, of Kelie, of Chastillon, of Pellie, of Fenis, of Hamelar, of Mountfaucon, and other barons, to the number of fourteene, and also slew and killed aboue 130. knights, being all men of great possessions and prowesse, and take other small cities and townes to the number of three hundred: yet for all this, Philip de Valois the French king durst neither rescue his townes, nor relieue his owne men: but of his great armie he lost (which is to be marueiled at, being in the midst of his owne countrie) by famine and other inconueniences, and for want of winter, more then twentie thousand men without any battell by him giuen. Whereupon at the treatie of the said Philip by his embassadors to the king sent, and by the mediation of the ladie Jane, sister to the said Philip, and mother to the earle of Henault, whose daughter king Edward, as you heard, had maried: a truce cotaining the number of fifteene actes for one yeere was concluded, the king of England being very vnwilling and loath thereunto. Yet notwithstanding, partlie by the instance of the forsaid ladie, but speciallie for that the king was greatly disappointed, through the negligence of his officers in England, which sent him not ouer such monie as hee needed for the continuance of his warres and paiment of his souldiers wages, the articles being somewhat reasonable) hee agreeth to the truce thereof: the conditions of which truce there concluded, here follow vnder written.

Turney besieged.

Articles of truce.

1 First, that during the said truce, no takes or mistrust of either part shall bee a detriment or cause of breach of the same.

2 Item, that during the said respite or truce, either of the princes, their helpers, coadiutors and allies whatsoeuer, shall remaine and bee in the quiet possession of all such possessions, holds, territories and lands, as at this present day they keepe and enioy within the realme and Dominion of France, in what manner soeuer they haue atchieued the same, during the said truce.

3 Item, that the said princes, their aiders, coadiutors, and allies whatsoeuer; shall passe safely from one countrie to an other, and all merchants with their merchandis, as well by sea as by land, as accustomable they haue been wont: except such banished men as haue been banished out of the said realmes, or any of them for other causes, then the warres betweene the said princes.

4 Item, that the said two princes shall not procure either by themselues or any other, any practise or other molestation to be made the one to the other, by the bishop of Rome or any other belonging to the holy church whatsoeuer: either for the wars begun, or any other cause, nor for the feruice of any of their allies, coadiutors, and aiders, or any of them. And that our holy father the pope nor any other, shall disturb or molest either of the said two kings during the said time.

5 Item, that immediatly after the truce bee proclaimed in both the hosts, that they may stand bound of either side, to keepe and obserue all and euery such article as shall be therein contained.

6 Item, that within 20 daies next and immediatly ensuing, each of the princes shall cause to bee proclaimed in Calcoyne and Guyen, and other their lands these articles of truce, to the intent they may be the better obserued, kept and knowne.

7 Item, if by any the said princes, their allies, people or coadiutors, any siege bee laid in Calcoyne, or the Duchy of Guyen or any other iles of the sea Gernesey or Oerser, or any other: that the same sieges be raised so soone as they shall heare of this truce.

8 Item, that such as are theeues and fugitiues out of the countrie of Flanders, shall not returne during the truce: and if they do, that then such as apprehend them, shall be iustice done vpon them, and forfeit all the goods they haue in Flanders.

9 Item, it is recorded, that the debts due to Arras, Tresponois, or other titles of France, shall neither bee demanded, nor executed during the said truce.

10 Item, that all such prisoners as haue been taken during these wars, shall be released out of prison and sent home vpon their faith and oth to returne, if they bee not ransomed during the said truce. And if any shall refuse so to doe, that then the Lord vnder whom hee is, shall constraine him to returne againe to prison.

11 Item, that all the bands whatsoeuer they be, which be made before this said truce in the time of war (whether they be of goods spirituall or temporall) be released without restitution, during the said truce.

12 Also, that these conditions of truce immediatly may take effect betweene the English and Scots, their lords, aiders, and allies: and the same to endure vntill the natiuitie of saint Iohn Baptist. And that certaine persons bee appointed by a certaine day to be at the marches of England and Scotland to confirme the said truce, vnder such conditions as haue been accustomed in those parts. And if the said Scots refuse so to doe, that then they to haue no aid out of France, during the said truce.

13 Item, that this said truce bee proclaimed in England, and in Scotland, within 26 daies after the date thereof.

14 Item, it is accepted that within this truce be contained Espaniels, Chatellon, Geneuous, the bishop and the towne of Cambzey, and castles of the same, &c.

In witnesse whereof, we Iohn by the grace of God king of Bohemia, and earle of Luxemburge, Adulph bishop of Liege, Raoule duke of Lozeine, Ayemes earle of Sauoy, and Iohn earle of Darminache on the one partie: And Edward duke of Beauant, C. duke of Geire, D. marques of Juliers, sir Iohn of Henault, and sir Beawmount on the other partie, betwixt the high and puissant princes of France and England; haue sealed this instrument of truce and peace, and deliuered the same accordingly in the church of Espleteline, on monday the 25 day of September, the yeare of grace 1340.

K. Edward returneth from Tourney.

This truce thus finished, king Edward haste by his camp, removing his siege from Tourney, and came againe to Gant. From whence (very early in the morning) hee with a small companie tooke shipping, and by long seas came to the tower of London, very few or none hauing vnderstanding thereof. And being greatly displeased with diuers of his counsell and high officers (so that though their default hee was constrained against his will, not hauing money to maintaine his wars, to condescend vnto the foresaid truce) he commanded to be apprehended and brought vnto him to the tower, the L. Iohn Stonhow chiefe iustice of England, and sir Iohn Poultnei with diuers others. And the next morning, hee sent for the lord B. bishop of Chichester and the lord Wake, the lord treasurer and diuers other that were in authoritie and office, and commanded them all to be kept as prisoners in the said tower, only the said bishop excepted: whom for feare of the constitution of pope Clement, which commanded that no bishop should bee by the king imprisoned, hee let at libertie and suffered him to goe his way, and in his place substituted sir Roger Bourcher knight, lord chancellor of England.

The bishop of Winchester deposed from his office.

The bishop must be imprisoned by the popes law.

Tyrannous effects.

The bishop intreating of this matter, reporteth thus: that the king had at this time vnder him euill subdistitutes, and couetous officers: who attending more to their own gaine then to the publike honour and commoditie of the realme, left the king destitute & naked of mony. With which crime also Iohn Stratford archbishop then of Canturburie, was behemently noted and suspected, whether of his true deserts, or by the setting on of others, hereafter shall more appeare. Insomuch that the king ardently incensed against him, charged him with great falshood vsed against his person, as by these his letters written and directed to the deane and chapter of Paules against the said archbishop manifestly appeareth; the tenor of which letter here followeth vnder written.

Thon. Stratford archbishop of Cant.

Edward by the grace of God king of England and France, and lord of Ireland: To his welbeloued in Christ the deane and chapter of the church of S. Paul in London, greeting in the Lord.

The kings letter to the deane and chapter of Paules.

IT is manifest by ancient histories, but more plainely appeareth by those which daily are practised amongst vs; that many men abusing (through pride) the fauour of princes, and honour bestowed vpon them, haue maliciously gone about to depraue the laudable endeuour of kings. And now that the words which we speake may be more manifest vnto our subiects; wee suppose that neither you nor they haue forgotten, that wee being established in our kingly throne in younger yeares, and couseting euen then to guide this our regall charge taken vpon vs with wholesome counsels, haue called vnto vs Iohn the bishop of Winchester, now archbishop of Canturbute, whom we supposed for his fidelitie and discretion to exceed others: whose counsell in matters appertaining vnto the health of our soule, as in matters also respecting the augmenting & confirmation of our kingdome both spiritually and temporally we vsed: he was receiued of vs into all familiaritie. We found in him also such humanitie, that he was faluted by the name of father, and of all next vnto the king had in honor. Now afterwards, when by right of succession the kingdome of France should haue defended vnto vs, and was by violent iniurie by the lord Philip of Valois holden from vs: the said archbishop by his importune instancy perswaded vs to enter league of amity with the princes of Almaine, against the said Philip, and to commit our selfe and ours vnto the hazard of warres, promising and affirming that he would bring to passe, that the reuenewes of our lands and other helpes by him deuised, should suffice abundantly for the maintenance of our said warres. Adding moreouer that our onely care should bee for the furniture of strong and able soldiers, such as were fit for the purpose, and expert in warfare: for the rest, he himselfe would effectually procure, for money conuenient to suffice our necessitie, and the charges thereof. Whereupon (intending great exploits) wee conueied our army beyond the seas, and with marueilous great charges (as behoued) we set forward: wee became also bound in great summes of money, making sure account of the aide aforesaid promised vnto vs. But alasse, vnhappie is that man that reposeth confidence in mans deceitfull staffe of brittle reed: whereunto (as saith the prophet) if a man leane, it breaketh and pearceth the hand. Thus being defrauded of our long looked for subsidie, for very necessitie sake, wee were constrained to take vpon vs importable charges of debts by grieuous vsurie. And so, our expedition being stayed, we were compelled to retire into England, desisting from our enterprises so valiantly begun. Now when we were returned into England, we laid before our archbishop our manifold calamities and misfortunes before rehearsed, and thereupon called a parliament: wherein the prelats, noble men and other the faithfull subiects of our dominions, granted vnto vs a new subsidie of corne, lambe, woolle, &c: besides the tenth granted by the clergie: which subsidie (if it had been faithfullie collected and obtained in due time) had greatly availed for the expedition of our said warres, the paiment of our debts, and confusion of our enemies. Our said archbishop promised diligently to doe his endeuour, as well in collecting the same, as also in procuring other necessaries to serue to our purpose. Whereupon trusting vnto these faire promises, hauing all things in a readinesse, both men and furnished ships, we made saile toward Flanders, and by the way vpon the dangerous seas buckled with our enemies (sworn to the destruction of our English nation, of whom we triumphed and were victors, not by our merits (their multitude farre exceeding ours) but by the mercifull clemencie of him that ruleth both wind and sea. Which being done, we passed from thence with a mightie power for the recourie of our right, and pitched our tents neere vnto the puissant citie of Tourney: where being detained for a time in the siege thereof, wearied with continuall toile, our charges still encreasing, awaiting with silence our promised aid; day by day wee hoped from our archbishop to receiue succour in these our so great necessities. At length being frustrate of all conceiued hope, we signified vnto our said Archbishop, and other his adherents, by diuers messengers and sundrie letters, our great necessity and perils which we were in for lacke of the said subsidie granted vnto vs. We added also the vtilitie and honour, which we saw might be atchieued if we had receiued mooney in time. All this notwithstanding, we receiued from them no succour at all, for that, preferring their priuat businesse and proper commodities, they cloaked their sloth, or rather (as I may call it, their fraud and malice with vaine excuses, and painted full counsellers prosecutours of true iustice: openly declaring faith the wise man, concerning counsell in this wise: Good a good iusticer, your grace will cause to be punished according to the law: and inso much as appertaineth vnto vs therein, we sent; whereby we may bring you both to concord and vnitie, and establish betweene you a firme peace to endure, wherunto with willing mind we would applie our selfe and bestow our painefull labour in prosecuting of the same. And herein if you will condescend and agree vnto our counsell, as weetrust you will; it may please you by your letters to giue vnto vs the like authoritie as is aboue said, to entreate peace or ordering of a truce for one yeare or two at least to continue. Neither let it moue you, that betweene vs and the said Philip of France a truce is taken. For seeing that you without our consent tooke truce with him: we by the aduice of our princes which know the bonds, deeds, and couenants betwixt vs, who also thought no lesse, but that sauing your honour we might doe the same; haue also made a league with the said Philip king of France: and for certaine causes doe reuoke and call backe the Lieutenantship which we assigned vnto you by our letters. Neuertheless giuing you for a certaine to vnderstand, that in our said treaties and peace concluded, we haue so brotherly considered you, that if you will agree and condescend vnto our counsell; your cause by our meane and helpe) shall bee brought to good passe and effect. About which things further to conferre with your brotherhood herein, we haue sent a deuout and religious man Fliathardus, reader and brother of the Heremites of saint Augustine, and chapleine of our court: whom about the premisses, we desire with speedie expedition to bee sent vnto vs again. Dated at Francklord the 14. day of Iune in the 24. yeare of our reigne, and 14. of our empire.

The answere of the king of England, to the empereur.

TO the high and mightie prince lord Ludouike, by the grace of God, emperour of the Romans, alwaies Augustus, Edward by the same grace king of France, and England, and lord of Ireland: salutation and prosperous successe.

We haue reuerentlie receiued your highnes letters, amongst other things containing, that the noble Philip de Valois (to the intent a peace and concord betweene vs and him might bee concluded) hath giuen vnto you by his letters full power and authoritie thereunto at your highnesse request: And that if the same might content vs to do inlike sort, your highnesse would trauell to bring the concord to passe: And that it would not moue vs any whit at all, that your highnesse and the said Philip are in league together. For insomuch as wee without your assent and consent (you say) tooke truce with the said Philip, you haue also done the like with him (which thing you might well doe sauing your honour, by the counsell of all your nobles and princes:) and for certaine causes reuoke again the Lieutenantship which you committed vnto vs. Doubtlesse, the zeale and good will you haue to make this concord and agreement, wee much commend; letting you to vnderstand, that we alwaies haue beene desirous, and still are, to haue a reasonable peace with the said Philip; which peace, as much as to vs (our honour saued) appertained, wee haue in iustice and by law prosecuted: and in very deed, it should bee to vs acceptable, and as we would wish, if by such a Mediator as your celsitude is, it might bee brought to passe. But forasmuch as wee vnderstand the same our right and title to the kingdome of France, to be manifest and cleere enough; wee purpose not to cõmit the same by any of our letters to doubtfull arbitrement. But while we well consider and reuolue with our selues, how your highnesse vpon circumspect consideration (manifestly beholding our iust and rightfull doing, and the strait dealing and obstinate purpose and iniurie of the said Philip) with vs and in our behalfe against the said Philip, your graces highnesse made a speciall league, adopting vs of your great and bountifull loue towards our person to be one of your fomes: wherefore thus againe to alter and breake the same, we cannot sufficiently maruell. Seeing your inuincible highnes being instituted of God to the laud and commendation of good men, and reuenge of euill and wicked doers, hath made a league against vs with the said Philip de Valois our notorious and iniurious enemie. And as touching that which you say, without your assignement and consent wee tooke a truce of daies of respit with the said Philip, which wee ought not to haue done: if your grace well consider the circumstance of the matter, we haue done but as we might therein. For when wee laid our siege to Tourney, it was requisite wee followed their aduice, whose aid and societie therein we had. Besides the sudden and imminent necessitie which we there stood in, and the distance of the place betwixt your highnes and vs furthermore was such, as that by no meanes we might attaine the same, nor vse your assent therein. Yea and further, if your grace well remember your selfe, your grant vnto vs was such; that whensoeuer opportunitie thereunto should serue, we might intreate of any peace, and grant what time we thought meet thereunto, without your consent therein: So that to conclude any finall peace with the said Philip de Valois, without either your consent or otherwise making your highnesse priuie thereunto, it might not bee lawfull for vs; which thing without your said counsell, content and aduice, we neuer minded or purposed to farre as by any meanes our power would stretch: hoping likewise, that your brotherlie benevolence for a time would haue more louingly supported vs. It is thought also by some, that the reuoking backe againe, or restraint of your foresaid Lieutenantship, was prematurate or done all out of time: when as according to your promise made to vs herein by your letters imperial, you ought not so to haue done before the realme and kingdome of France (or at the least the greatest part thereof) were of vs obtained & quietly in peaceable wise enioyed. These premised therefore we desire you, according to your nobilitie duly to consider, & hereafter to do that which shall be thought both meet and conuenient, because that (God willing) wee meane to recompence and gratifie both you and yours, according to the measure of your benevolence bestowed vpon vs. The almightie grant vnto your celsitude so much felicitie as your heart desireth. Dated at London the 28. day of Iulie in the 2. yeare of the reigne of our kingdome of France, and of England 15.

In this meane time died pope Benedict the 12. mentioned a little before: after whom succeeded in that roome pope Clement the 6. Of whom it is reported in stories, that he was very liberall and bountifull to his cardinals of Rome, enriching and heaping them with goods and possessions, not of his owne, but with the ecclesiasticall dignities and preferments of th' churches of England. For so recordeth the author, that he bestowed vpon his cardinals the liuings and promotions, such as were or should be vacant in the churches of England, and went about to set vp new titles for his cardinals, heere within this realme. But the king being offended therewith, made void and fruitrat al those foresaid pronsions of the pope, charging moreouer and commanding no person whatsoeuer, to busie himselfe with any such prouisions, vnder paine of pvnishment and losing his life. Which lato was made the nert yeare following, which was Ann. 1344.

Pope Clement 6.

Ex Chron. Adamæ.

The king disturbeth the popes prouisions.

It followed then, that the said pope Clement, against began to make new prouisions for two of his cardinals of benefices and churches that should be nert vacant, besides bishoprickes and abbatships, to the extent of two thousand Marks. Whereupon the procurators of the said cardinals were sent downe for the same. But the king and nobilitie of the realme not suffering that, vnder paine of imprisonment caused the said procurators forthwith to depart the realme; whereupon the nobles and commons shortly after writeth a fruitfull epistle to the pope, for the liberties and maintenance of the English church. Whereunto, as saith the author, the pope and the cardinals were not able to answere. The argument and tenor of which letter out of French, we haue caused to be translated into English, as ensueth.

The letter of the king of England and nobles of the same, to the pope, against the reservations and prouisions which he had in England.

TO the most holy father in God, lord Clement, by the grace of God of the holy church of Rome, and of the vniuersall church, chiefe and high bishop: his humble and deuout children, the princes, dukes, earles, barons, knights, estates, burgesses, and all the communaltie of the realme of England, assembled at the parliament holden at Westminster the 15. day of May last past: Deuout kissings of his holy feet, with all humble reuerence and humilitie. The kings answere to the popes message.

Within the time of this yeare, pence, halfe pence, and farthings began to bee coyned in the tower. And the nert yeare following, which was An. 1344. the castle of Windsor (where the king was borne) began to bee repaired: and in the same, the house called the round table was situate, the diameter whereof from the one side to the other, contained 200. feet, to the expenses of which house weekely was allowed an hundred pound, for the maintaining of the kings chiualrie, till at length by the occasion of the French warres, it came downe to nine pounds a weeke. Wherby the example whereof, the French king being prouoked, began also the like round table in France, for the maintaining of the knighthod. At which time the said French king moreouer gaue free liberty through his realme to fell downe trees for making of ships and maintaining of his nauie, whereby the realme of England was not a little damnified.

The kings letters of defiance against the French king.

TO all and singuler, to whom these presents shall come, publike greeting. We thinke it is not vnknow vnto you all, that after the decease of Charles late king of France of famous memorie brother to our neuer doubted lady mother Queene Isabell, Queene of England: That the crowne of France, by iust inheritance hath fallen vnto vs, as to the next heire male now liuing after the said king. Now Philip de Valois, being sonne but onely to the vncle of the foresaid king Charles: and therefore by degree of consanguinitie being further off removed from the same (we being in the time of our minoritie) hath violently by force and power contrarie to God and iustice vsurped, occupied, and yet doth occupie the same, inuading further and spoiling our lands in the dukedome of Aquitania, and ioyning himselfe with our rebellious enemies the Scots, seeking our subuersion both by land and by sea, to the vttermost of his endeauour. And although we to preuent the damages which might rise by war, haue offered to the said Philip diuers friendly waies of peace: to the intent we might better intend our purposed voiage against Christs enemies the Turkes: yet could nothing preuaile with him in obtaining any peaceable way of reformation, driuing vs off by craftie dissimulation, through false pretensed words, but performing nothing with heart and deed. Whereupon, we not neglecting the grace and gift of God, to defend the right of our inheritance, and to repulse the iniuries of our enemie, haue not refused by force of armes comming downe to Britanie to encounter with him in open field. And so we being occupied in our warres, there repaired vnto vs the reuerend father bishop of Preuest, and of Tusculane Cardinals, and legats from pope Clement 6. to entreat some reformation of peace betweene vs. At whose requeste we consented, agreeing to such formes and conditions of peace as then were taken betweene vs, sending moreouer our embassadours to the court of Rome, specially to entreate of the same matter. And thus while some hope of truce seemed betweene vs to appeare; newes suddenly came vnto vs, which not a little astonied our mind, of the death of certaine of our nobles and adherents, whom the said Philip vniustly and cruelly at Paris, commanded to be executed. Beside the wasting and spoiling our lands and subiects in Britanie, Gascony, and other places, with innumerable wrongs and iniuries deceitfully intended against vs both by sea and land. By reason whereof, the truce on his part being notoriously broken, it is most manifest to haue beene lawfull for vs, forthwith to haue set vpon him with open warre. Yet notwithstanding to auoide those incommodities that come by warre, we thought first to proue, if by any gentle meanes some reformation might be had touching the premisses. And therefore sundrie times, haue sent embassadors to the popes presence for the treatie of a peace, and reformation to be had in those aforesaid excesses: requiring also for the tractation thereof, certaine termes of times to be appointed, alwaies referring to our selues notwithstanding free libertie to resume warre at our pleasure, according as the doings of the said Philip shall constraine vs thereunto. And now forsomuch as the foresaid termes be already expired, and yet no reasonable offer of peace appeareth, neither will'd said Philip come to any conformitie, being required and monished notwithstanding by the popes letter thereunto (as the pope by his letters hath written vnto vs) but alwaies hath multiplied his conspiracie and obligations, vsing extremities against vs: and to omit here to speake of the excessiue enormitie of the popes legate, who being sent by the bishop of Rome for the keeping of truce, and whose part had beene rather to haue quenched and stayed the discord; hath stirred vp our enemie more eagerly against vs. In the which doing, neither hath the bishop of Rome (sauing his reuerence) as yet prouided any remedie, albeit he hath beene diuers times required of vs so to do. Which things being so, we ought to bee excused both before God and man, if for the defect of other remedie to be had, we shall be constrained our selues to find remedy against such wrongs and iniuries: the case of iustice and necessitie constraining vs to giue out these our letters of defiance against the violator of the truce, and the vniust inuader of our kingdome. Protesting that this we doe, not vpon any displeasure to the bishop of Rome, or to the apostolike see, but only for the moderation of equitie, standing vpon the defence of our owne right and lawfull inheritance, intending alwaies rather to haue peace, if by any reasonable way it might be had. And thus much for the stopping of slanderous fame and the mouthes of backbiters, We thought good to signifie, first to the high bishop of Rome, and the foresaid cardinals; that by them as persons indifferent, and mediators, the same may be insinuated to the contrarie part; and also vnto your whole Vniuersitie in generall: recommending vnto you all the innocencie of my cause and the communitie of iustice. Dated at Westminster the 14. of Iune, the 19. yeare of our reigne in England, and of France the sixth.

The popes legate diuerted by warre. The legat, the pope.

And thus much for the kings letters. Now let vs againe returne to his passage, from whence a little we haue digressed. Concerning the which passage of the king, with the order of his acts archieued in the same, from the writing of Cadane or Cardoine, vnto the towne of Puisake, is sufficiently described by one of the kings chaplaines and his confessor; who being a Dominicke Frier and accompanying the king through all his iourney, writeth thereof as followeth.

A letter of the kings confessor to shewe his acts being at Cardoine.

Benedicere debemus Deum Cali, &c. Great cause we haue to praise and laud the God of heauen, and most worthilie to confesse his holy name, who hath wrought so his mercie to vs. For after the conflict had at Cadane, in the which many were slaine, and the citie taken and sacked euen to the bare wals, the citie of Bais immediately yeelded it selfe of his owne accord, fearing lest their counsels had been bewrayed. After this the lord our king directed his progresse toward Roane: Who being at the towne of Lexon, there came certaine cardinals to him, greatly exhorting him to peace. Which cardinals being curteously entertained of the king for the reuerence of the popes see, it was thus answered to them againe: That the king being much desirous of peace, had assaied by all waies
